

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

CASE OF THE IRISH CIVIL SERVANTS—RESOLUTION—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “the ‘Civil Service (in Ireland) Commissioners’ having reported that the dissatisfaction on the ground of ‘the general inadequacy of the present scale of salaries, having regard to the great increase which has taken place in latter years in the cost of living,’ is well founded; and that ‘there is no reason, based on local considerations, for giving salaries to Civil Servants stationed in Dublin less in amount than those assigned to persons in London performing analogous duties,’ this House is of opinion that such general inadequacy of the present scale of salaries of the Civil Servants serving in Ireland should as soon as possible be redressed, and that they should be placed upon an equality as to remuneration with those performing duties in England corresponding in difficulty and responsibility,”
—(Mr. Plunket,)—instead thereof .. 1805

POLLUTION OF RIVERS BILL—(No. 59.)
(The Duke of Northumberland).

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
(The Duke of Northumberland).

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, there could be no question as to the evils with which the Bills proposed to deal—indeed the whole subject had already been inquired into and reported upon by a
VOL. CCXVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Royal Commission—and the Government were so impressed with the necessity of doing something in the matter, that last year his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board introduced in the Sanitary Bill clauses which were almost identical with those in the Bill which the noble Duke asked their Lordships to read a second time; but so many objections were urged against his propositions, and so great would have been the interference with several branches of industry by the provisions against the pollution of rivers, owing to their necessary stringency and the difficulty of carrying them out, that the Government felt obliged to abandon them. By way of illustration he might mention the difficulty which presented itself in reference to the definition of a "polluted liquid"—definitions had been attempted, but they were so minute that the utmost difficulty would have been found in putting them into practice. Again, one of the most important considerations in connection with the subject of sanitary reform was that of the re-organization of the local authorities. It seemed very questionable that a river should be under the care of so small an authority as a local sanitary authority—it would seem better to place it under a large authority, such as that which managed highways. But as the whole subject of sanitary reform was receiving the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and bearing in mind the fate of the clauses having reference to the pollution of rivers in the Bill of last year, he could not, on behalf of the Government, promise that this Bill would receive their support in the other House of Parliament.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, he was far from opposing the second reading of the Bill, because there was much that was good in it, and in all these matters it was necessary to make a beginning: but before passing the Bill through a future stage it would be necessary to pause and consider very seriously whether its provisions were such as could be carried out. In his opinion they went too far. At any rate, the fate of the Government measure of last Session showed how necessary it was that the country should have time to consider provisions that so largely affected local and industrial interests. He did not know that even Parliament was in possession of sufficient information to enable them to legislate on the subject.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, there did not appear to be any objection to the principle of the Bill. The objections that had been urged were rather against precipitancy in consenting to such stringent provisions as were contained in the clauses of the Bill. The pollution of rivers was so great that the interference of the Legislature was urgently called for. Many rivers in the North of England with which he was acquainted were in such a state of pollution as to be absolutely poisonous. He knew rivers which even at a very considerable distance from the source of pollution were in some cases of the colour of deep indigo, and in others of the colour of dirty sulphurous yellow. The water was thus rendered noxious to vegetation and poisonous to fish, and if poisonous to fish, noxious also to cattle and deleterious to man. The provisions of the Bill might be stringent, but such details could be dealt with by a Select Committee if not by a Committee of the Whole House, and he hoped the noble Duke would persevere with his measure.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought that before their Lordships read the Bill a second time it would be well that they should do actually what they had already done formally—read it a first time. On reading the Bill their Lordships would find that it enacted the imposition of heavy penalties on any person who caused or permitted any “polluting liquid” to flow into a river. There were very few of their Lordships who were not the owners of a ditch, and all persons who had ditches would do well to look to one of the definitions which Clause 7 in this Bill gave of a “polluting liquid:”—

“Any liquid which exhibits by daylight a distinct colour when a stratum of one-inch deep is placed in a white porcelain or earthenware vessel.”

But that was not all. The liquid might be as clear as crystal, and yet under this Bill it would be a “polluting liquid” if it contained

“In suspension more than three parts by weight of dry mineral matter, or one part by weight of dry organic matter, in 100,000 parts by weight of the liquid.”

It was his impression that he had often seen ditches the liquid in which would come under the prohibition in this Bill. But what was the case with some of the principal rivers? In the Thames there were 50 parts of the objectionable matter in the 100,000 parts by weight of the liquid; in the Rhine, at Bonn, 20; in the Meuse, 47; in the Mississippi, 80; and in the Ganges, from 20 to 200. He was afraid that those of their Lordships who possessed many ditches would be nigh ruined by the Bill, for it imposed upon anyone who, whether knowingly or negligently permitted any “polluting liquid” to run into any river the penalty of £5 on the first conviction, for the second conviction, a penalty of £10, with a continuing penalty of £2 per diem, and for the third or subsequent conviction £20, and a running penalty of £5 per diem. This was rather severe upon the poor land owners, considering that they would incur these penalties if they did not keep their ditches very much cleaner than some of the principal rivers of the world. The two eminent scientific gentlemen who had acted as Commissioners had directed their attention to the stopping of the evil; but there was always the danger of attempting too much by legislation, and before undertaking so large a subject, it would be well to have the question considered by practical men. Such a Bill as that now before their Lordships would have to encounter powerful opposition from manufacturers; and for those and other reasons, he thought it ought to be referred to a Select Committee if their Lordships agreed to give it a second reading.

VISCOUNT PORTMAN hoped the noble Duke would not press the second reading of the Bill until after more mature consideration, for if it should become law it would be almost impossible to carry on the mining industry of the country.

LORD VIVIAN said, that legislation on this subject was much needed, and therefore hoped the Bill would be read a second time.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE concurred in thinking that legislation was required. There would be no difficulty in detecting noxious matter at the mouth of the drain coming from the factories before it was mixed and diluted by the water of the river. He lived in the neighbourhood of two rivers—the White-water and the Blackwater. You might stand on the bridge and see the salmon shooting up the first of those rivers like lightning—without stopping for an instant; but when they got about 20 yards up the other river they suddenly stopped, turned up their noses, and made a rapid retreat. This was the Blackadder or Blackwater.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, there was no intention on the part of the Government to deny that something ought to be done. There was no question of the extent and mischief of the evil—the only question was whether the Bill before their Lordships afforded the best means of remedying it. He thought that the practical objections to the present Bill were such that their Lordships ought certainly not to consent to it without careful consideration of its provisions by a Select Committee. What they had to consider was, whether the prohibitory clause of the Bill would not lead to an amount of public inconvenience, which would be even less endurable than the evils which it was desirable to remove.

His own impression was that it would be better not to press the second reading; but if the noble Duke (the Duke of Northumberland) thought otherwise the Government would not divide against him.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR wished to direct their Lordships' attention to a difficulty which his experience in the Court of Chancery had made him aware of—that nothing could be more inconvenient than to pass a measure which simply forbade people to do certain things, without ascertaining, or enabling them to ascertain, in what manner it would be possible for them to avoid doing those things. Nothing was more familiar in the Court than an application to restrain nuisances on a large scale. Some towns had sent all their drainage into a river—Birmingham for instance—and when an application was made to the Court of Chancery the Court had not hesitated to grant an injunction; but when the injunction was granted the embarrassing question arose how was it to be obeyed? It might occur that in obeying it as best they could the authorities of the town would do something, which would create another nuisance quite as great as that for the putting down of which the aid of the Court of Chancery had been invoked, and then another suit, by other parties, became necessary. In all cases which arose in connection with the pollution of rivers it had to be considered whether any means could be found for abating the mischief, for it would not do to stop manufactories and works off-hand; especially in cases where legal rights to discharge refuse matters into streams existed, so far as private persons were concerned, and where, according to the existing law, there was no public nuisance. If prohibitory enactments, such as those contained in this Bill, were adopted by Parliament, a sufficiently long time must be allowed for those whom the prohibitions would affect to devise means by which obedience to the law would be practicable.

After a few words in reply from the Duke of NORTHUMBERLAND, Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.

And, on Tuesday, May 20, the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

CRIME IN IRELAND.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he had given Notice of a Motion for certain Returns, because he thought they were necessary in order to supplement others that had already been ordered. He must, however, remark that there was such a delay in the production of Papers after they were ordered that when they were laid before Parliament it was too late in the Session to take any action on them. In this way the House had been excluded from considering the Alabama Treaty till too late and had been prevented altogether from considering the case of the Galway Election Petition. With regard to the Police Returns, he thought the Government would not object to them, for they had been referred to in the other House as already existing; and the failure of justice had of late been greatly exaggerated by the operation of the unfortunate Jury Act, which had introduced a class of jurors whose impression was that they were exposing themselves to opprobrium if they were to convict men tried for capital offences. The remarks of the Judges at the last Spring Assizes would not be very voluminous, but they were extremely important, and would carry far more weight than the evidence adduced before the Select Committee of the other House.

Moved that there be laid before this House, Police Returns of all Crime in Ireland, showing where perpetrators have not been discovered and where they have been prosecuted and convicted, since the 1st of January 1872:

Any remarks of Judges at the last Spring Assizes and of Assistant Barristers at Quarter Sessions since the new Jury Bill came into force as to the competency of Jurors.—(The Lord Oranmore and Browne.)

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that though Her Majesty's Government had no desire to refuse information on so important a subject, still he would submit that their Lordships would not do well to agree to a Motion couched in language of so ambiguous a character. The noble Lord moved for "Returns of all Crime committed in Ireland." Did this expression include summary convictions, or also indictable offences? Or did it mean only the more serious offences specially reported by the constabulary. The noble Lord further asked for Police Returns "showing where perpetrators have not been discovered." Here again the language was ill chosen. What he conceived the noble Lord did intend to move for was the number of felonies and misdemeanours committed since January, 1872, distinguishing between the cases of persons summarily convicted or committed for trial, and those in which no conviction had taken place. He believed that the whole of the information which the noble Lord sought to obtain would be contained in the Judicial Statistics annually presented to Parliament. It was possible that those Returns would not be presented to Parliament until late in the Session; and if so, there would be no objection to supplying this particular information, so far as it at present existed. With regard to "Any remarks of Judges at the last Spring Assizes and of Assistant Barristers at Quarter Sessions since the new Jury Bill came into force as to the competency of Jurors," what machinery had Her Majesty's Government by which they could obtain any trustworthy records of such remarks? It was not likely that the Judges and Assistant Barristers would keep a record; nor was it reasonable that Her Majesty's Government should depend on newspaper reports. He hoped that his Lordship would if he still considered it necessary to obtain information on the points referred to, re-consider the terms of his Motion.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he would withdraw his Motion; but stated that the Returns referred to by the noble Marquess were now on the Table of the House till the end of the Session.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC BILL.
(The Lord President.)

(Nos. 84, 112.) REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON proposed to add to Clause 20 (Power to Commissioners to fix terminal charges), the words—

"Any decision of the Commissioners under this section shall be binding on all Courts and in all legal proceedings whatsoever," and to transpose the clause to follow Clause 14. The effect of the alteration would be to make the decision of the Commissioners in any dispute between a Railway Company and the public as to rates and charges binding on all Courts and in all legal proceedings whatsoever. The Amendment would remove the concurrent jurisdiction which it had been thought the clause as framed established.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND claimed an apology from the Government for dividing against him in Committee on this point; and still thought, even when these words were inserted, there would yet be concurrent jurisdiction. The parties would not be compelled to go before the Commissioners, but would still be at liberty to apply to a Court of Law.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, that in the debate in Committee he promised to consider the point, and he had redeemed his promise.

LORD REDESDALE suggested that some words might be added which would make it appear that the Commissioners alone should have power to decide these questions. He thought it was extremely desirable that the power should be confined to them, and he believed it was so intended by the Bill.

Amendment agreed to; Amendments made.

Clause 26 (Orders of Commissioners).

On Motion of Marquess of RIPON, Amendments made for the purpose of making the decision of the Court to which a case may be transmitted final and conclusive on all parties.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY proposed a clause enabling the Commissioners, on the application of three justices, to institute an inquiry in cases where it was alleged that owing to the absence of a bridge over or passage under any railway or canal, the public traffic was incommoded; and after inquiry by Provisional Order to direct the remedy, and to apportion the expenses to the parties by whom, in their judgment, the expense ought to be borne. It was not fair, he maintained, that a Railway Company should be put to the whole expense involved in purchasing for the purpose adjacent property the value of which had been increased by the railway, and that the burden ought to be shared by the public and by private owners.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, this matter did not come properly within the scope of the Bill, because the functions of the Commissioners were confined to questions relating to traffic upon railways, and they had nothing to do with traffic on roads. It was not quite accurate to say the Commissioners would have to deal with all railway matters, because questions of safety would still be dealt with by the Board of Trade.

Clause withdrawn.

Bill to be read 3^d on Monday next; and to be printed, as amended. (No. 120.)

ALTERATION OF COLLEGE STATUTES.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY wished to ask his noble Friend the President of the Council, Whether any proposals for the alteration of College Statutes without the sanction of the Visitors have been submitted to the Privy Council; and, if so, what course the Council has taken in respect to them? Perhaps the noble Marquess would be able to tell them how many such applications had been made, from what Colleges, and what course it was proposed to take with respect to them?

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON was understood to say, that his noble Friend's Question did not mention dates, but he presumed it referred to applications made recently. The matter stood in this position. In 1871 the question was raised whether alterations in College Statutes could be proposed without the consent of the Visitor. The question was referred to the Committee of Privy Council, where it was argued, and the conclusion came to was that Her Majesty should be advised that the consent of the Visitor was not necessary. The mere fact that the Visitor had not consented would not of itself be a bar to an ordinance making alterations in the College Statutes. Since then the Commission presided over by the noble Duke (the Duke of Cleveland) had been appointed; and he had received a letter from his noble Friend the noble Marquess, pointing out that, pending the inquiries of the Commission, it would be very desirable that no alterations in Statutes affecting the Fellowships and revenues of any particular College should be made. The Government fully recognized the reasonableness of that view, and it was their intention to act upon it with regard to the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, pending the Report of the Commission. He might add, as he did in his written reply to the noble Marquess, that there might be special cases with which the Commission had nothing to do, in which it might be desirable that changes should be made. He proposed, for the information of the House, to lay the two letters on the Table. That was the exact position of the matter at present. The applications sent in for more than a year were only three—one from Brasenose College, Oxford, where the Visitor, the Bishop of Lincoln, had intimated that he entertained serious objections to the alterations proposed to be made in the Statutes. The other two Colleges were Oriel College, Oxford, and Trinity College, Cambridge.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, this was a matter of very great interest in the Universities, and there were two points on which a little further information was most desirable. The first was, whether the noble Marquess's attention had been drawn to the distinction between the original Statutes of Colleges, and the ordinances made of late years under the authority of the Parliamentary Commission. He thought it was contended by his right rev. Brother, the Bishop of Lincoln, to whom allusion had been made by the noble Marquess, that the power to alter the original Statutes stood on different grounds from the power to alter Statutes made of recent years under the authority of the Parliamentary Commission; and it was contended that to alter the former without reference to the Visitor would be going beyond the powers which had been conferred. The other point to which he would call attention was this—it might have been decided, and no doubt after a patient hearing, that the Visitor's consent was not required for an alteration of the Statutes; but what he should like to know was, whether it had been decided that the Visitor should be passed over and altogether ignored?

The Marquess of Ripon

For example, if such a case as this should occur—suppose there had been a division in a College as to some matter in the Statutes, and the Head of the College, being in a minority, applied to the Visitor to direct his attention to the point; the next day, perhaps, the Visitor went to the Privy Council to bring the matter before them—would it be quite in accordance with the rules that he should find the matter had been decided without the slightest communication with him, and that the alterations proposed had been made in the College over which he presided? He hoped he might receive some information on these points from the noble Marquess, or from his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, who, he believed, was cognizant of all that had occurred on this subject.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that with regard to the points mentioned by the most rev. Prelate his impression was that the decision of the Privy Council as to the power of the Crown in Council to give assent to alterations in College Statutes where the majority of the Governing Body of the College were in favour of them had reference only to the alteration of ordinances made by the Commissioners under the particular clause which dealt specially with that case. He did not apprehend that the question as to any alteration of the ancient Statutes had been determined by the Privy Council; and the most rev. Prelate must see that it would not become him to express an opinion now on a matter which he might possibly, at some future time have judicially to consider. With reference to the other point, after what had fallen from the most rev. Prelate, no doubt the Council would take into consideration how far it might be expedient, in cases of this kind that notice should be communicated to the Visitor, so that the Council might have the benefit of any representation, which he might think it his duty to make to them before deciding upon the advice to be offered to Her Majesty.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, it certainly was not the practice of the Privy Council to give notice in such cases, but he was quite sure it was far from the intention to ignore the Visitors.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he was very glad to hear what had fallen from the noble Marquess, but the impression had gone abroad that the Privy Council had come to a decision that as the consent of the Visitors was no longer legally necessary it should therefore be entirely dispensed with. That would clearly be a most improper and unjust decision, because in that case the consent of the Privy Council would be given to the action of a majority of the Fellows without any legal authority on their part to make a change of themselves without the consent of the Visitor. He looked on the office of Visitor as a connecting link between successive generations of Fellows; and though on the one hand it might be improper to allow the opinion of a Visitor to overbear the opinion of the majority of the Fellows, where that opinion might be deliberately formed, on the other hand it would be disregarding the wishes of the Founders and transgressing the ancient constitution of the Colleges to allow the mere passing fancy of a particular majority of the Fellows to over-ride those judgments, which the Visitor, in obedience to his official duty, was compelled to give. He was therefore glad to hear that the opinion of the Visitor should have its full weight.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR apprehended that the duty of the Crown under the Act of Parliament would be to consider every application made to it from the majority of the Fellows on its merits, and it would not be right for the Crown to give the effect of a veto to the Visitor's disapproval. On the other hand it might be very proper that the Visitor should have the power to state the objections which he might entertain. But the Crown could act on the dissent of the visitor only if the reasons for that dissent appeared to the advisers of the Crown to be such as ought to influence its decision.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTORS BILL—QUESTION.

MR. C. E. LEWIS asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether, in the event of the repeal of the Act 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 36, as contemplated by the Register for Parliamentary and Municipal Electors Bill, any enactment will remain providing for the hours of polling at Parliamentary Elections in English boroughs?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, that the hon. Member had undoubtedly pointed out a defect in the Bill; but that, as also one or two others would be remedied by further Amendments.

ARMY—CASE OF LIEUTENANT ROBINS. QUESTION.

MR. SCOURFIELD asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would state to the House under what charge, under the denomination of discreditable conduct, was Lieutenant Robins, Senior Lieutenant of the 60th Rifles (and who had passed for promotion), placed under arrest on the 6th of June 1871, and removed from the Army after having been kept in arrest until the 22nd of March 1872, and refused a court martial though repeatedly applied for; and, whether he was not twice offered the price of his Commission, which he declined, feeling that he had committed no act to justify his removal from the Army?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the charge was disrespectful and insubordinate conduct towards his commanding officer. The Commander-in-Chief, Lord Napier of Magdala, ordered a Court of Inquiry, and, after reviewing its Report, considered Lieutenant Robins to be unfit to remain any longer in Her Majesty's service. He therefore recommended his removal, unless he should anticipate the decision by retiring with the sale of his commission. His Royal Highness confirmed the recommendation, giving him a further opportunity of retiring by sale. The time is explained by the time occupied by the inquiry and the necessity of the references to and from India. In order to save unnecessary delay, His Royal Highness's decision was conveyed by telegraph.

LICENSING ACT IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. COGAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any measure to amend the Licensing Act, so as to enable borough magistrates to adjudicate in cases of drunkenness, and apply the fines inflicted for these offences to local purposes, as hitherto they were empowered under the Towns Improvement Act of 1854?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON in reply, said, that some inconvenience had arisen in connection with the Licensing Act, so far as Ireland was concerned, and a Bill had been prepared for the purpose of remedying an apparent defect in the Act, so as to enable borough magistrates to adjudicate in the manner proposed by the Question of the right hon. Gentleman. It also proposed to amend some other slight defects which had been found to exist in the working of the Act. He proposed to introduce the measure soon; but he had no hope of carrying it that Session, unless the House would consent to limit the discussion upon it to the practical inconvenience which had been felt, and to resist the introduction of any Amendment which might have for its object the re-opening of the principle of the Act of last year. If any such course were taken, he feared he should have no alternative but to withdraw the Bill.

THE SUPERANNUATION BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. MELLOR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If, after the names of the persons intended to be provided for by the Superannuation Bill which was recently passed by this House, he will consent to add the dates of their respective appointments?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that there would be no objection whatever.

BUILDING SOCIETIES—QUESTION.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS desired to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, a Question of which he had given him private Notice. He might say, by way of explanation, that there were two Bills on the Paper standing for Monday, relating to the question of Building Societies; one brought in by the Government, and the other standing in his own name. He desired to learn, What course it was proposed to take with regard to the Bill brought in by the Government? He was desirous of an answer upon this point, because he had been informed that there was some likelihood of the Government bringing in another Bill on the subject. If that information was correct, he should be glad to learn also how soon the new Bill was to be introduced?

MR. WINTERBOTHAM, in reply, said, that as much apprehension existed among the building societies as to the effect of the Bill introduced by the Government, and as strong objections had been urged against its supposed principles, he had thought it better not to proceed with it. He proposed, however, to introduce another Bill, respecting which he would confer with the hon. Gentleman opposite, and the result would, he hoped, be a measure satisfactory to the hon. Gentleman and the societies themselves.

DISESTABLISHMENT OF THE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.—RESOLUTION.

MR. MIALL, in rising to move the following Amendment—

“That the Establishment by law of the Churches of England and Scotland involves a violation of religious equality, deprives those Churches of the right of self-government, imposes upon Parliament duties which it is not qualified to discharge, and is hurtful to the religious and political interests of the community, and, therefore, ought no longer to be maintained.”

said, * Sir, I am quite aware, that in moving the Amendment of which I have given Notice, I am taking a step not very likely to secure the concurrence of a majority of this House. But my experience of the kindness of the House in times past warrants my confidence that in discharging a duty I would gladly escape, but which my sense of what is due to the trust reposed in me by others will not permit me to evade, I may count upon that forbearance which this House always shows to any of its Members who have a specially difficult task to perform, and who but seldom, and then most unwillingly, trespass upon its patience. I am going to submit to its consideration an abstract Resolution—abstract, that is to say, in its verbal form, but not in its bearing upon ulterior legislative results. Happily for the country, I lack an advantage which the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government had when he brought forward—with what practical effect we all know—his abstract Resolution on the question of the Irish Church. No crime of violence, no atrocious outrage, such as the attack, in broad daylight, upon the prison van at Manchester, or the blowing in by gunpowder of the walls of Clerkenwell gaol, has been perpetrated by the friends of Disestablishment in England—or has stimulated Parliament, whether consciously or unconsciously, to that high degree of susceptibility to the claims of justice which, in 1868, after many years of persistent negligence, spontaneously recognized a clear political obligation. There is no dark background of Nonconformist sedition—and I am devoutly thankful for it—to set off, with artificial vividness, the practical meaning of my Resolution. Perhaps, Sir, this is one main reason why the prospect of religious equality in England appears a far-off thing, or, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman—

"So remote from the wishes of the people of England . . . as to deprive it of much of that interest and reality which we recognize when we are dealing with questions that have relation to results, and are within our power and faculty of calculation."—[3 Hansard, ccxii. 576.]

Still, the House, and the right hon. Gentleman who leads it with such well-deserved authority, will forgive me, I trust, if I suggest the propriety of a division of labour, to this extent at least—that whilst it is the special duty of statesmen in office to deal with questions made ready to their hands whether by their own work, or by the work of other men, it may also be the duty of hon. Members occupying, like myself, a private and unofficial position in this House, to spend their days in preparing for official statesmen the materials which, when opportunity serves, or necessity impels, are required for building up a great national policy. It is true, Sir, that I do but ask the assent of the House on the present occasion to sundry propositions of a theoretical description; but it does not necessarily follow that I am, on that account, as "one that beats the air." That is a low view of the functions of Parliament which assigns to it the framing of new laws or the passing of annual Estimates as its sole or even its chief business. I am fortunate in being able to plead the high sanction of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire in claiming for the deliberations of this House a wider sphere. It is the supreme Council of the State. No small portion of its work consists in the discussion of those principles by which the policy of the nation should be guided. To a very considerable extent the debates of this and the other House of Parliament serve to enlighten the judgment and sway the will of the constituent bodies. It savours of pedantry to assume that because a question is placed before the House in an abstract form, it must necessarily be a sheer waste of time for the House to consider it in a practical spirit. No doubt the natural—I was going to say the inevitable—bent of this House—for we are all more or less sensible of it—is to underrate any Motion which does not lead on forthwith to legislative action. Yet, Sir, some of the grandest passages in our national history took their rise in the Parliamentary discussion of abstract principles. It is my hope, Sir—a hope which I trust we shall all strive to realize—that every word contributed to the present debate will help on action hereafter, and that the speeches of hon. Members will do not a little to ripen public opinion on the greatest question of the age. That question, Sir, is one the immense importance of which, I presume to believe, is fully appreciated by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. He does not do himself justice, he does not fairly represent the feeling with which he has long been wont to look upon this subject, when, as was the case last year, he resorts to banter, good-humoured though it be, to push it aside from his path. I am confident he concurs with me in thinking that the relation in which the civil power should stand towards the organizations of Christian life in this country, presents a political problem the solution of which will demand the highest efforts of modern statesmanship. To harmonize the constitutional and legal expression of that relationship with the sentiment of justice, and with the irrepressible instincts of spiritual manhood, is an enterprise worthy of the loftiest, the purest, and the most patriotic ambition. The right hon. Gentleman will not deny, I imagine, that there is something anomalous, startling to one's reason, and manifestly out of keeping not less with the spirit of the age than with the genius of the Christian faith, in the existing forms of contact between the secular and the ecclesiastical authority in this country. He will hardly base his support of the English and Scotch Churches upon the intrinsic merits of the Establishment system. He may say that there is no obvious necessity for disturbing the relative position of these ancient institutions to the State, merely because they are incapable of a logical defence. But, Sir, does the right hon. Gentleman hope—does the House hope—do either of the Established Churches hope—to wall out by any such plea the pressure of opinion which is rapidly closing in upon this question? Why, Sir, what is it which so steadily and so irresistibly moves it to the front? Not hostility, nor even indifference to religion on the part of either of the contending bodies. On the contrary, it is their deep interest in religion. It is their wish to do it homage. It is no spasmodic outburst of political restlessness which may be expected to exhaust its strength, and then pass away. If it were, the right hon. Gentleman might be justified in encouraging the House to pooh-pooh the whole question, to evade it, to dismiss it with banter and raillery, as abstract, visionary, and beyond the domain of practical politics. But a question of such inherent importance, of such ever-increasing and all-pervasive moral pressure, and which is certain to change, more or less, the mutual position of parties at the next General Election, will not, I trust, be refused serious discussion on the pretext that it is an abstract proposition, fit only in its present stage to enlist the functions of a debating society.

Well, Sir, the position I am going to ask the House to recognize is that the establishment by law of the English and Scotch Churches is unjust, impolitic, and practically injurious, both in regard to the temporal and spiritual interests of the nation. I pledge myself to the House that in endeavouring to substantiate the propositions affirmed in my Motion, I will keep a keen look out both in regard to its time and its patience. When, towards the close of last Session, I gave Notice of the Resolution which you, Sir, will presently put from the Chair, as an Amendment on the Order of the Day, the first question that was levelled at me from every loophole of Church Defence Associations was—"What is religious equality, and in what respect is it violated by our State establishments of religion?" I frankly confess, Sir, I was wholly taken aback by the question. I had not expected to have been assailed by it. It seemed to me very much like a sudden return to the use of bows and arrows after the adoption by the nation of rifled musketry and cannon. Sir, I do not mean, by attempting a logical analysis of the phrase, to lay myself open to the thrust of so obsolete a weapon. After the time spent by Parliament in putting on the Statute Book, in a grandly elaborate and practical form, the nation's reply to this question, why should I be catechized with regard to it? Religious equality has precisely the same meaning in relation to the English and Scotch Churches, as it had in the first Session of the present Parliament to the Irish Church. The best answer I can give to the question, "What is religious equality?" and, to all practical purposes, the sufficing answer is, "Vide the Irish Church Act passim." I do not say that it may not be plausibly contended that it is possible to connect the religious institutions of a people with the supreme authority of the State in such wise as not to raise the question of religious equality at all. The possibility I do not admit, but I have no need whatever to contest it. It lies outside the scope of my Motion. My contention is that, as a matter of fact, the two Church Establishments against which my Motion is directed, and more emphatically the Church of England, do violate the principle of religious equality. Surely, the allegation will not be denied in this House. The clerical mouthpieces of Church Defence Associations may challenge the assertion; but very few men who care to look back to the General Election of 1868 will do so. No Dissenter, for instance, is equal in the eye of the law, in respect of his religious aspirations and sympathies—I speak now not by way of complaint, but of illustration—with, say, the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope). The ecclesiastical community to which the hon. Member is attached is represented by upwards of a score of Church dignitaries. The creeds of his Church are stamped with the authority of the nation. In every parish of the kingdom a minister of his Church is maintained, out of national resources, and speaks to his parishioners on religious topics in the name of the State. The Dissenter, on behalf of whose Church the State has done nothing, but which in every parish it has set and supports a man pledged to oppose, and lacking for his religious convictions, beliefs and interests the prestige which is given by law to the Churchman—is he to be told that he is on an equal footing with all others in this matter? Sir, our so-called national churches may plead that they satisfy the demands of piety, of charity, of policy, but it can hardly be pretended that they embody the sentiment of religious equality. So far as law is concerned, they may perhaps be as tolerant as law can make them. Even in regard to religious liberty, some people may say that our State Churches trespass across the frontier only here and there, and then merely in pursuit of comparative trifles. But, Sir, these ecclesiastical establishments, in their conception, in their structure, in the spirit and modes of their working, ignore, and in ignoring trample upon, the more recently developed sentiment of equality. Do not let the House make light of the sentiment, because it is only of late that it has been fully developed. It has always existed as an aspiration of conscience, even when prevented by the unripe condition of society from asserting itself. There have been times, it should be borne in mind, reaching down to a late period in the world's history, when the natural right of a man, even to personal freedom, was commonly regarded as too flimsy an abstraction to claim serious recognition at the hands of ruling statesmen. Our forefathers not only held slaves, but subjected them to the lash, without any compunction, not because they were more cruel in their disposition or despotic in their temper than we, but because they had not passed under the refining operation of the same civilizing agencies. Religious equality, it is true, is the last discovered of human birthrights, but it is not, on that account, the least valuable of them. Very probably, Sir, I shall be told that religious equality amounts to nothing more than a mere sentiment, and that the violation of it by the law of the land is but the enactment of a policy to which that sentiment is hostile. In which of their material and tangible interests, I may be asked, are any of Her Majesty's subjects injured by the existence of State Churches such as that of England or of Scotland? Even admitting that the system is not without theoretical offence, what does it hurt but the fancy of those who object to it? What practical grievance can they allege against it? In what respect does it cripple their religious freedom? What motive can prompt them to demand what they are pleased to call "religious equality," but what in reality means the disestablishment and disendowment of the established Churches, but jealousy, or envy of their superior position? What do they want but to drag down those Churches to a level with their own? Sir, it is easy enough to impute mean and despicable motives to opponents; but it is not always logically safe. There is only one way in which Parliament can drag down the Churches established by law to a level with the sects not established by law. Their piety, their learning, their spiritual zeal, their religious aptitude to do their work—why, inasmuch as State favour never gave them these qualifications, so the withdrawal of State favour cannot take them away. No Legislature can deprive them of any superiority over the non-established Churches which in regard to such things they may really possess. No, Sir, but the protest which is urged by State Churches against being dragged down to the level of the sects, represents, in its vehemence, the tenacity with which they cling to their exceptional privileges. It is nothing less than an unguarded confession by the members of the Establishments that, in respect of their religious affairs, the laws of the Realm have placed them in a position of assumed advantage above that conceded to the members of any other religious community. Well, now, is our grievance a whit more sentimental or fanciful than their privilege? Does not the one correspond with the other in that respect, as the obverse and reverse faces of the same coin? But, Sir, even if I were to admit that in upholding its present ecclesiastical policy, Parliament abets nothing worse than a sentimental grievance, there might be, and, as I contend, there would be ample ground for sustaining the Resolution which I am about to submit to the House. Sir, the violation of religious equality by the Constitution of the Realm, inflicts a double injury. It wraps up in itself the germ of a twofold cause of discord. It worsens those whom it favours; it depresses and angers those whom it wrongs; and it does both in the name of Christianity. As to its deteriorating effect upon the class lifted by it into ecclesiastical ascendancy, the House, perhaps, will permit me to avail myself of an illustration pictured by the vivid insight into the workings of human nature of our unrivalled and immortal dramatist. The character of Antonio, "The Merchant of Venice," as drawn by Shakespeare, is conspicuous for its eminently noble generosity, its disinterestedness, and tenderness of affection. And yet it is to him that, in response to a request for a loan of money, Shylock replies—

"Shall I bend low, and in a bondsman's key,
With 'bated breath and whispering humbleness, Say this—

Fair sir, you spat on me on Wednesday last;
You spurned me such a day; another time
You called me dog; and for these courtesies
I'll lend you thus much monies."

The reply of the Venetian merchant shows him to have been utterly unaware that his whole demeanour and bearing towards the Jew had been one of impertinent, intolerant, and intolerable assumption. Nevertheless this is one of the most natural results of State favouritism in religion. It breeds in those who are patronized by it—even in the kindest of them, and, often too, without awakening their consciousness—the spirit of caste, than which nothing ought to be more steadily frowned upon by statesmen—because nothing more surely saps the moral vigour of a State. "Only a sentimental wrong," forsooth, in the case of those whom the system casts into the shade and ignores! Sir, let me give greater exactness to the phrase. The truer way of putting it would be—"Only an affront offered by law to religious sentiment," and felt to be such by one-half of Her Majesty's subjects in Great Britain. Well but, Sir, are we to infer that it is not worth our while to protest against and resent any inequality inflicted by law but such as may affect us in a matter of bread-and-cheese, or of taxation, or of commerce, or of our physical interests? Surely, Sir, history must have taught every one of us that the policy—whatever may be its other recommendations—which tramples upon the religious sentiment of any large portion of the people, is the most dangerous which a Cabinet can favour. It drives the iron into the soul. If it be a mistake, it is a mistake in that region in which thought is most in earnest, and feeling is most sensitive. "Sentimental wrongs," indeed! Why, Sir, what wrongs of a grosser and more material kind have ever evoked so passionate a resentment? Sir, I will go one step further. I will venture to ask what wrongs are there which men in general are so disposed to resent with a spirit regardless of personal consequences? At any rate, it does not behove prudent and far-seeing statesmen to deal with them as if they were merely the ignes fatui of a disordered imagination. The sense of religious equality, having been once recognized and responded to by Parliament, cannot now be outraged, whether sportively or in earnest, without kindling a resentment, which, at no very distant time hereafter, will be extremely embarrassing to the ruling power of the State.

One word more, Sir, before I quit this part of the question. What religious equality means, and how it is disregarded in the maintenance of State Establishments of religion, are matters pretty clearly comprehended by the constituencies, and, in the course of a year or two, will be thoroughly understood. Hon. Members on the other side of the House may fairly do their utmost to obstruct the further development of this principle; but to those who sit on this side I may be permitted—I hope without offence—to suggest that religious equality is in strict keeping with the entire framework of Liberal policy which they have helped by past legislation to construct, and that, unready as they may be just now to give it the sanction of their vote, they will find themselves obliged before very long, either to fight against the natural and logical outcome of their own political principles, or man-fully go with them to their ultimate issues.

I pass on to another topic. Once more I crave your forbearance—not so much on account of the time I shall feel it necessary to occupy, as on account of the delicacy of the subject to which I shall invite your consideration. As I have said, the establishment by law of the Churches in question carries with it State favouritism to one section of the community, and injustice to the rest. Well, from the wrong done to the people at large in their political capacity, I go on to make a remark or two upon the helplessness inflicted upon the Churches themselves, as spiritual organizations. For the time being, and for convenience' sake, I shall confine my observations to the Church of England. Not a word will pass my lips disrespectful to that Church, as a Church—not a word disparaging any of the parties or “schools of thought,” as I believe they are now called, which remain within her pale. In certain points of doctrine, as well as discipline, and by shades of belief more or less marked, it is true, I dissent from her standards. But the area of belief, worship, and practice, over which I sympathize with her members, is much broader than that over which our differences extend. It is for the sake of her own future, for the sake of religion in the land, I would call upon the House to help her out of a position which neutralizes her proper authority, and cripples her powers of usefulness. Am I alone, Sir, in cherishing this desire on her behalf? Are there not large numbers of her own devoted members—High Church, Low Church, and Broad Church—who deem it impossible for her to do, as she would, the work she is especially qualified to do, so long as she is tongue-tied and hand-bound by legal restraints? Why, what is the meaning of the cry for Church Reform, as against Disestablishment—in which Episcopal voices may be heard mingling with those of the clergy and laity—but a confession that the law of the land prevents her from doing the things that she would? She resembles, in fact, a body to which life is returning after a long swoon, whose powers are not yet free to act, and whose sensations of vitality have not yet got beyond the stage vulgarly designated as “pins and needles.” Her groans are as continuous as they are distressing.

Motions in this and the other House of Parliament—speeches in both Houses of Convocation—papers read before Church Congresses, general and diocesan—visitation charges—electioneering addresses, and pamphlets innumerable—all reiterate the complaint that the Church is hampered and shackled by the State in the prosecution of her spiritual enterprise. She cannot organize her own machinery; she cannot increase the number of her episcopate; she cannot select her own chief rulers; she cannot put in force any system of self-regulative discipline; she cannot revise her own formularies; she cannot adopt a new lectionary; she cannot shorten her occasional services; she cannot even utter a prayer for Royalty in anguish; she cannot remove the scandals of patronage, nor prohibit the open sale of advowsons in the market, nor adapt her methods to the ever-varying needs of the population, without having recourse to a secular authority or a secular legislature in which all shades of religious belief and no-belief are represented. Sir, I might enliven my strain of remark by striking illustrations of every allegation which I have made; but, mindful of your time, I advisedly refrain from doing so. I take it to be unnecessary. There are but few members of the Church of England, I imagine, who will not admit that she is prosecuting her spiritual mission under legal restraints, the removal of which would largely conduce to the main objects for which a Church Establishment is supposed to exist. But, Sir, I am likely enough to be told during the course of this debate, and emphatically, perhaps, by my hon. Friend the Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes), that the Church Establishment, deprived of the right of self-government, or, at any rate, greatly restricted in its exercise, by the closeness of its relation to the State, secures a wider freedom of religious thought than would be enjoyed under any other arrangement. Well, I ought to be, and I trust I am, one of the last men to undervalue freedom of religious thought in its utmost breadth—and not of religious thought only, but of religious profession and action. But let us rid our minds of all cant in this matter. In what sense am I, or any other subject of the Realm, more free to think, speak, and act in regard to spiritual affairs, in consequence of the patronage and support given by law to the clergy of the Church of England, even if they should be chartered by judicial decisions to teach anything they please? Is there no other way by which we can obtain freedom of thought, than by first pinning down the professional exponents of that thought to ancient creeds, formularies, and Articles of religion, and then loosening the pin by strained interpretations of their purport. Suppose this nation, convinced of the futility of all its attempts to regulate spiritual thought by means of law, were to resolve, as resolve I feel sure it one day will—to leave religious thought and action to run their own course without aid or interference from the State, wherein would religious thought be less free than now? Is it less free in our Colonies than here at home? Is it less free with us than in the great Republic of America? Is it less free in Ireland since Disestablishment than it was prior to it? Think, for a moment, of the recent controversy, not yet concluded, on the retention of the Athanasian creed in the public service of the Church. On the merits or demerits of that creed I have nothing to say in this House. The memorial subscribed in response to the invitation of the Earl of Shaftesbury proves that a very considerable proportion of the more highly cultivated laity of the Church of England—whether a majority or not I do not presume even to surmise—are anxious to relegate it to a more retired position among the standards of the Church. But, Sir, even if they were ten times as numerous as they are, they could not gain their object but through an alteration of the law. Fancy their coming for such a purpose to this House! What the House would do in the case I will not take upon myself to say. But of this I am sure, that, constituted as it is, and representing what it does, this House is not competent to legislate on any such matter. “In fact,” as the Marquess of Salisbury—with whom I do not always agree—told a public meeting at St. James’s Hall some time since, “the thing might be set aside as being that which, in the present condition of the English Government, and with the present relations of Church and State, it would be wholly impossible to carry out.” Practically considered, the Church “as by law established,” whether we have regard to her teaching or her Government, is what the Legislature may choose to make her. The Legislature, at least in this branch of it, is what the constituencies may choose to make it. The constituencies are more or less divided into Conformists and Nonconformists, with a very liberal admixture of such as stand outside the pale of all religious organizations. But it is with the constituencies, in the last resort, that judgment rests as to what the Church shall be legally authorized to say or do—her subordination to the State has reduced her to a condition of hopeless helplessness in regard to the management of her own affairs. Sir, the work which she has in hand, in common with the non-established Churches, is one of such stupendous and growing magnitude, and is so largely dependent for its success upon the kind of influences she must needs employ in the doing of it, as to require that all such influences should be practically, visibly, and beyond all possibility of suspicion, of her own will, and under her own control. Compelled to come to Parliament for almost every adaptation of her machinery to the changed and changing social condition of the times, she loses by every repetition of the process something of that mingled dignity and persuasiveness which tells most powerfully upon those whom she undertakes to direct in spiritual things. To have her most trivial as well as her most momentous concerns bandied about in both Houses of Parliament by differing ecclesiastical sections and political parties would, one would think, be as wounding to her self-respect, as to not a few who are outside her pale as a religious community, it seems to be humiliating. The result most to be deplored, however, is that to large sections of the population the exalted and beneficent purpose of the Church herself is lost sight of in the notion that she is the creature of State policy, that she is a branch of the Civil Service, and that “her thinkings are below the moon.”

And now, Sir, a word or two as to the qualification of Parliament to perform those duties which the incorporation of the English and Scotch Churches with the State implicitly and actually imposes upon it. Sir, I am not one of those who are inclined to detract from either the dignity or the wisdom of Parliament. Of course, nothing human is faultless. No arrangement devised by the wit of man is without its drawback of disadvantages. Within its proper sphere, there is no institution in the world, I believe, that secures a larger amount of good government—or, in other words of order combined with freedom—than this Imperial Legislature. But, Sir, the true dignity of Parliament lies in its fitness to do its own work, and not in the height or the breadth, or the universality of its pretensions. The swan, which is the most exquisitely graceful of aquatic birds when floating on the surface of the pool, is also the awkwardest, the most helpless, and the most ridiculous in its movements upon dry land. Sir, Parliament has never excelled in ecclesiastical legislation. No one can be moved to contemplate with patriotic pride, the fruit of its wisdom in that department of work. How should it be otherwise? It belongs to the State to command and to coerce—it belongs to the Church to convince and to persuade. The spirit, the methods, the machinery of the one differ toto cælo from those of the other. Why is it that this House exhibits such a strong distaste for religious discussions? Not because its Members are devoid of religious sympathies, but because it feels that religious discussion is outside the range of its proper business. It was not elected for any such purpose. It is not representative of any such purpose. It is not specially qualified to pursue any such purpose, and in attempting to further any such purpose, it is aware that in all likelihood it would do more harm than good. It therefore wisely abstains—at least to a large extent—from taking active part in engagements which would lower it in its own self-respect. But, Sir, the theory of the constitution imposes upon this and the other House of Parliament, the responsibility of making such laws as may be required for the well-being of the Church. And what is the practical outcome of that theory? Why, that in regard to all serious matters affecting her welfare statesmen have wisely judged it to be expedient—at least for a long time past—to avoid making any appeal to Parliament at all. In these days, changes of vital moment, such as the state of parties in the Established Church, appears from time to time to demand, are legalized, not by the declared will of the Legislature, but by the interpretations of the Judicial Committee. We shirk the duties which we claim to be ours, and we devolve them upon a virtually irresponsible tribunal. We do well, Sir. Silence best becomes us in respect of these transcendental questions. But might we not do still better by giving up pretensions which we do not, and cannot, sustain? It is only in petty affairs—affairs which might be much more suitably transacted by vestries—that Parliament is called upon to intervene in consequence of the connection of Church and State. Little Bills there have been in plenty to clog the Orders of the Day, to waste our time, and to try our tempers. It will be unnecessary to run over, even in the most cursory manner, the several objects of these proposed measures. Some of these may be good, others of them may be doubtful, but none of them do more than touch the skirts of our ecclesiastical policy, the darning and mending of which where they are frayed, seems to be thought a suitable occupation for the Imperial Parliament. Sir, the broad effect of the policy of Church Establishments upon the community, civil and religious, can only be roughly estimated. I do not deny that as a spiritual organization the Church has done much work for which the country has to be thankful; but I do say that the incorporation of the Church with the State, and the exclusive civil privileges conferred upon her by law, would be unfairly credited with those beneficial results by which even an imperfect inculcation of Christian truth is sure to be followed. On the other hand, it is not to the Church, but to the invidious and exclusive position in which her Establishment places her, that her opposition to almost every movement for the extension of popular freedom may, I think, be distinctly traced. In the efforts of Sir Samuel Romilly to soften the severities of the criminal code; in the denunciation of the slave trade by Wilberforce; in the first attempts made by Lancaster to provide education for the poorer classes; in the abolition of the Test and Corporation Acts; in the concession of Catholic emancipation; in the almost revolutionary struggle which culminated in the Reform Act of 1832; in the repeal of the corn laws; in the promotion of free trade; in the admission of Jews to this House; and in the measures deemed necessary for the pacification of Ireland, the influence of the Established Church, as a whole, was uniformly hostile—and if it could have prevailed over the sounder judgment of the public would have largely obstructed the progress of the kingdom in civilization and material prosperity. No doubt, within the last half-century the clergy have made great sacrifices in the work of popular education, thereby more than making up, perhaps, for that attitude of distrust which they originally displayed. But even now the Establishment stands in the way of a complete system of national education. One might be disposed to condone these untoward facts if the Church had been successful in compassing the primary object which it should have had in view. But, Sir, there is no concealing from ourselves the fact that the vast mass of the lower stratum of our population has been, and is, estranged from the public ministrations of religion, both in towns and in the country, to an extent which casts an ominous shadow over the future. Sir, with the best of intentions we have gone the wrong way to work. We have tried to substitute manufacture for growth. We have laid our main stress upon the perfection of our machinery, and have depended too little upon the spirit, the life, and the energy with which it should have been worked. We must reverse our policy if we would really gain our end. Not all of a sudden, indeed. That is not the meaning of my Resolution. But it is not too early for us to know our own mind, nor too precipitate for us to express it with decision. Let us determine upon the principle upon which to base our policy for the future, and wise statesmanship will, of course, choose the most fitting opportunity and means for carrying it into effect.

And now, if the House will kindly bear with me for a moment or two longer, I shall thankfully relieve it from the strain I have most reluctantly put upon its patience. This House, Sir, if I may so say, is the foremost representative of the State; and in temper, in spirit, in law, is designed to express its matured judgment and will, in all matters which involve justice between class and class, or between man and man, and therefore to guarantee all that protection for freedom—intellectual, moral, and religious—which it is qualified to secure. Sir, in matters of religion, justice to all is equivalent to freedom for every individual. To see justice done to all, is the primary duty of the State. No institution, however good its purpose, however consecrated by its age and its historical associations, which does not rest upon an ultimate basis of justice, can, at least in these days, hope to achieve the ends which it is the duty of the State to contemplate. Above and beyond all, that institution whose mission it is to dispel ignorance and prejudice in regard to the truths of the Christian revelation, parts with the most potent arm of its strength when it ceases to exhibit a sensitive regard to justice. Failing in this, whether in its structural basis, its method of support, or its bearing towards such as are outside its pale, it will necessarily fail in getting or keeping hold upon the deepest sympathy of the nation—for where the claims of justice are considered, human perceptions are all but intuitive. Well, Sir, in advocating Disestablishment, we look to the law, and, consequently, to the Legislature, for nothing more than justice. Tell us that the State ought to recognize religion, when you have first done homage to that justice which has its source and its home in the bosom of the Supreme. Justice, in the name and for the sake of our common Christianity, is the foundation on which I rest my demand. You may postpone it for a while; but in the end, here, as in Ireland, you will yield to its force. With unfeigned thanks to the House for having borne with me so indulgently, I beg to move, Sir, the Resolution which stands on the Notice Paper in my name.

Mr. M'LAREN, in seconding the Motion, said, the principle of disestablishment had been so clearly laid down, and its advantages shown by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall), that he should say nothing on that part of the question. The feeling in Scotland was very strong respecting disestablishment and disendowment. That feeling was held by nearly all the Dissenting Bodies, and many lay members of the Established Church were equally in favour of it. The Free Church, which was the most important Body in Scotland, was divided on the subject, the minority supporting the theory of a State Church, coupled with entire independence. The next largest body, the United Presbyterians, had been for many years in favour of disestablishment. The matter was put in the very shortest possible compass respecting their views in a Petition which he presented a few days ago from the Presbytery of Edinburgh, and which he read to the House—

“That it is not the province of civil government to provide for the religious instruction of the subject, but that religion should be maintained by the voluntary liberality and exertions of religious men: That Established Churches are unjust and oppressive, adverse to civil freedom and an equitable distribution of political power; that they are a fruitful source of uneasiness, jealousy, and strife among subjects, and prejudicial to the best interests of religion.”

The other Dissenting Bodies generally held very similar views. For the Episcopal and Roman Catholic Churches he did not profess to speak; but seeing that their creed refused to believe that the ministers of the Scotch Church were a properly constituted ministry, or that their Church was a true Church of Christ, it might be inferred that they would not be grieved by its abolition. The disestablishment and disendowment question began to be vigorously advocated in Scotland 40 years ago, and was continued up to the Free Church disruption in 1843. It had permeated nearly every Dissenting congregation. At that time, a strong feeling of sympathy for the seceding Free Church ministers who had taken the opposite side in the controversy induced the Dissenters to proclaim a truce as soon as they had seceded. But the agitation had commenced again in right earnest, and he was persuaded that it would never cease till the Church of Scotland was placed in the same position as the Church of Ireland. He would now, with the leave of the House, state some facts respecting the relative strength of the different religious Bodies in Scotland; and he did so because mere general assertions were always less valuable than facts. The Established Church of Scotland, at present, numbered 1,290 ministers; and he preferred to state the number of ministers, because the number of churches would not give the Episcopal and Roman Catholic Churches the fair position to which they were entitled, because in some of them there were two, three, and even four ministers. The Free Church had 957 ministers; the United Presbyterians had 610, exclusive of their English congregations; the Episcopalians, 193; the Roman Catholics, 172; Congregationalists, 82; other Presbyterian

Bodies, 76; Baptists, 75; Evangelical Union, 68; and smaller Bodies, 50; making a total of 2,183, or 893 more than the Established Church. There was thus a difference of 70 per cent in favour of the non-Established ministers. It seemed to him that the whole argument rested on the question as to what progress was being made by the Established Church, and what progress was being made by the non-Established, for it was only in that way that the facts of the case could be seen, and in that view he thought that the figures would be interesting to hon. Members. In 1836 a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the religious instruction of Scotland; and in 1839 they reported that the number of ministers in the Established Church was 1,072; hence the increase since 1839 had been only 218: but the Free Church was altogether an increase, and even since the disruption, there had been a great addition. It began with fewer than 500 ministers, and had now 959. Taking an average, he estimated that the increase in other Bodies since 1843 had been one-fourth part, or 543. There was thus a total increase of 1,500 Dissenting ministers since 1839. Comparing that with the increase of 218 in the Established Church, he thought nothing could show more clearly the direction in which the current was running, and he contended that it was merely a question of time when that Church should be disestablished. It might be interesting to know that these congregations were not merely small bodies of people who could do nothing for themselves. He was prepared to show that the amount contributed by them for religious purposes was so great that it would probably astonish the House. Since 1843 the Free Church had raised, by voluntary contributions, the incredible sum of nearly £10,250,000. It might be supposed that, at the commencement, great efforts were made, and large sums of money raised, which it had not been possible to keep up after the excitement of the disruption was over. The very opposite was the case. During the last 12 years, with the exception of one year, the annual contributions had steadily increased. Last year that Church raised £432,000. That was not far short of half a million of money, a sum which, even as regarded national taxation for the whole of the United Kingdom, was considered important. Of its ministers, 897 received an average stipend of £234, and most of them had houses in addition. That Church supported hundreds of schools, and a large number of missionaries on foreign stations, all over the globe. ["Divide."] Hon. Gentlemen who were impatient might as well cease to cry "divide," for he should tell his story to the end. The next largest Body in Scotland as regarded its ministers was the United Presbyterians, and that Church was equally liberal in proportion to its numbers. Last year, with the aid of its English congregations, it raised £330,000 for home and missionary objects. It had missionaries in all quarters of the globe, and during the last 20 years it had raised £659,009 for missionary purposes alone. Adding the contributions of the Free and United Presbyterian Churches together, it appeared that during the last year, they amounted to upwards £750,000. That, he thought, must inspire great confidence in the friends of the Voluntary principle, and it showed they were actuated by principle. The other non-Established Churches—he would not go into detail—but, generally speaking, he might say, that they had raised large sums for similar objects, as had also the Established Church. But it was a remarkable fact, that the richest body, the Episcopal Church, which included most of the large landowners in Scotland, contributed proportionally much less for these purposes than the Free and United Presbyterian Churches. To show how easily the Established Church in Scotland could become self-supporting, he might state that it appeared from the Report of the Royal Commission to which he had referred, that the whole of the legal stipends of the 1,072 ministers in 1839 was only £231,451, exclusive of manse and glebes. Now, if the congregations of two Dissenting Bodies could raise three-quarters of a million of money yearly, it could be no hardship for the Established Church to raise sufficient to pay the stipends of their own ministers, as the other denominations did. As regarded the voluntary collections of the Established Church for religious and benevolent objects, it might be stated that the Royal Commission, in 1839, ascertained that during the preceding year the ordinary collections made for the poor, together with the extraordinary collections for other religious and benevolent objects, amounted only to £58,120. Since that period the amount of their stipends had been increased in many cases by legal decisions, but no certain record of the aggregate results existed. Probably they might now amount to £50,000 more than in 1839. One thing, however, was certain, that, stimulated by the zeal of other religious Bodies, the Established Church had very largely increased its voluntary contributions for religious and benevolent objects and for Church extension. In these circumstances every argument formerly used against the Irish Church would most forcibly apply to the Scotch Church; and there was one additional argument of great force applicable to the Church of Scotland which could not be applied to the Established Church of Ireland. Hon. Members would recollect that persons of strong Protestant feelings urged against the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, that its churches and ministers were like detached forts in the regions of Popery, from which what they considered the true faith could be best defended, and that if they were removed, Protestantism would be greatly injured if not entirely destroyed. Such an opinion was held by thousands of serious men. That argument, however, would not apply to Scotland, where the same religious faith, creed, and form of worship prevailed in the great majority of the un-Established Churches as in the Established Church. It therefore followed that if the Scotch Church were disestablished and disendowed, none of the evils which were predicted as to Ireland could possibly happen in Scotland. He would now give a summary of the different Bodies holding the same faith to prove this, and then conclude. There were 1,290 ministers on the one side; on the other there were 957 Free Church ministers, 510 United Presbyterians, and 301 of the smaller Presbyterian Bodies, and others holding similar views, making a total of 1,768, all of whom adopted substantially the same creed and the same form of worship as the 1,290 endowed ministers; and their ministrations were, to say the least, as acceptable to the people as those of their Established brethren. Their congregations were generally as large, and in many cases much larger, and he apprehended no disturbance or other evil could arise from the Scotch Church being placed on the same footing as the Irish Church. Having believed and publicly advocated these views for more than 30 years, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion, and he hoped to live to see the day when the Scotch Church would be disestablished.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the establishment by Law of the Churches of England and Scotland involves a violation of religious equality, deprives those churches of the right of self-government, imposes on Parliament duties which it is not qualified to discharge, and is hurtful to the religious and political interests of the community, and, therefore, ought no longer to be maintained,"—(Mr. Miall),—instead thereof.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I rise at this early period of the debate to claim the attention of the House for a short time, not because I have ventured to take into my own hands the decision how long the House shall think proper to discuss a question which is, undoubtedly, of the greatest importance, and which presents a most copious supply of matter for consideration, but because I do not desire that there should be even the slightest appearance of delay or hesitation on the part of the Government in declaring the course they mean to take with respect to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall)—a Motion on which, abandoning the indirect method of approach, he has spoken out with the utmost plainness the purposes which he has in view; indeed, with so much plainness, that I think he leaves us nothing to regret, except the fact that, as his Motion happens to be made, by no fault of his, as an Amendment to an original Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," we have not, therefore, an opportunity of giving it that direct Aye or No which we should have been able to do, if he had happened to move it upon a day allotted to independent Members. As a prefatory statement, I may be allowed to state, that I am very sensible of the great interest which attaches to the facts which have been stated by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. McLaren). No man has more laboriously considered the statistics of the religious condition of Scotland than he has, and I hope he will not think I undervalue them, if I forbear to notice them upon the present occasion; but I pass them by for a reason of which I think he will feel the force—that we all know very well this question will not be decided upon a reference to the specialities of the case of Scotland, but rather upon that far larger interest before us in the case of the Church of England, and by a reference to those general conditions on which my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford founded himself in the course of his argument. With respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford himself, I have often had the pleasure of hearing him; and must admit that whether on occasions on which I could cordially agree with him, or on occasions when I could not, I found, and am always certain to find in his speeches great ability, careful examination and research, transparent sincerity, and evident and palpable goodwill towards all men. That is an assemblage of qualities which we must all appreciate, and which this House appreciates. I do not, therefore, find fault with the Resolution, which, although an abstract one, is yet of so drastic a character that, if my hon. Friend could persuade the House to take the prescription which he recommends to us, undoubtedly there would be no room for the objection, that the prescription would be likely to remain without effect upon the patient. Let us consider what the Motion of my hon. Friend is. He invites us to assert five propositions. The first is—that the establishment by law of the Churches of England and Scotland involves a violation of religious equality; the second is—that it deprives those Churches of the right of self-government; the third is—that it imposes on Parliament duties which it is not qualified to discharge; the fourth is—that it is hurtful to the religious and political interests of the community; and the fifth is—that, therefore, they ought no longer to be maintained. I am not prepared to adopt these propositions; I feel it impossible to discuss them in the manner in which they ought to be discussed. They are propositions with an enormous sweep and volume, on which he has entered at some length, but not at a length nearly sufficient to do justice to the vast importance and immense complications of the matters involved. They have been, and may be again, the subject of lengthy and comprehensive treatises. They may occupy for months and years, at some period or other, the attention of this House; but I do not think that we are qualified at this moment, any more than we are disposed, to attempt to deal with them in the manner which their importance and difficulty would demand. My hon. Friend has stated one side of the case. He has founded himself, for the most part, not on the violation of religious equality, but upon the sufferings of the Church of England itself, upon the difficulties that it undergoes, upon the "hopeless helplessness" of its condition, and upon the proposition which he asserts, that there are but few members of the Church of England who are not convinced that the purposes for which she exists are now pursued by her under many disadvantages, from which she would be relieved if she were dissociated from the State. Well, the members of the Church of England are perfectly sensible of the many difficulties in the prosecution of her work in the condition in which she now stands; but my hon. Friend must not overlook the fact that these difficulties are not to be got rid of by the simple fact of dissociation from the State, even if the dissociation were as agreeable to the wishes of the people, and as easy in itself, as I believe it to be opposed to the wishes of the people—if not almost impossible. I can only slightly illustrate one or two points upon the subject. My hon. Friend says it is sometimes argued that the established condition of the Church is highly favourable to freedom of thought, and he points triumphantly to Ireland, and says—"Will you assert that thought is less free in Ireland now than it was before disestablishment?" Well, I am not going to recant anything I have said heretofore on the subject of the disestablishment of the Irish Church; but I am bound to say with reference to the present moment and the present circumstances, if my hon. Friend asks me, from what I read in the newspapers, that thought is now less free in religious matters in Ireland than it was before disestablishment, that I accept the challenge, and tell him that I think it is. I earnestly hope that the dangers, if there be dangers, which the Irish Church is encountering or provoking may pass away; but I must honestly confess that if, as an individual member of the Church of England, more than as a Minister, my hon. Friend thinks to lure me or whistle me out of the position in which I find myself in the Established Church, by pointing out the felicity or tranquillity which our brethren in Ireland are now at this moment enjoying under schemes which they have taken in hand, I am entirely deaf to lures of that character or kind, and would rather remain where I am. I do not treat this question as one that can be disposed of by banter; it is one which goes deep down into the religious convictions of men. Neither do I treat my hon. Friend as a visionary enthusiast in the doctrines which he urges, although I think those doctrines are not adapted to the country or the present time. I do not deny that there is much to provoke and encourage and facilitate a movement like this of my hon. Friend. In the first place, he represents a large body of opinions in the country. In former times the differences of the Nonconformists, in their separation from the Church of England, turned mainly upon specific differences, either of doctrine or discipline between the two. They have now, I think, gone deeper. My hon. Friend is accustomed to represent—I believe with truth—the position of the Nonconformists as one resting upon the conviction that establishment itself is essentially injurious to religion, and that, therefore, the establishment of their own religion, were it to be taken as it is, would be just as objectionable and as offensive in their eyes as is the establishment of the Church of England. The fact that the opinion of Nonconformity in this country is gradually verging in this direction is of considerable weight and importance. In the next place I do not deny that the disturbances and distractions of the Church of England greatly incite discussions of this kind. They are disturbances and distractions which probably we all view with deep regret. Not, however, on account of those disturbances and distractions must we be led to precipitate conclusions, for those differences are not confined to the Church of England, but affect Christianity generally. We see other churches passing through the most fiery trials; we see the intellect and conscience of man awakened, or, at any rate, agitated, with regard to the question of religion, in a manner which, perhaps, has no example for several centuries past. But before concluding that, on account of these differences which we feel exist among ourselves, we are to adopt the remedy offered by my hon. Friend, we must require much more careful, much more searching proofs that such differences could be composed by the method he propounds. We have in this country a number of Nonconforming Bodies which, although considerable in themselves, are yet of limited extent as religious communities, and I must say that most of these Nonconforming Bodies appear to me to exercise the principles and powers of self-government with very considerable success. They have, I admit, avoided many controversies which in larger churches in the world are rife, and they appear to attain, in no inconsiderable measure, the great ends of religious activity and religious peace. But it will not do for my hon. Friend, even if that admission is made, at once to attempt to draw from it the conclusion that the same state of things would prevail were you to take a great historical and National Church like the Church of England and place it in the condition of a private religious community. I would illustrate what I mean by a reference to the forms of Government in Europe. You take the case of Switzerland, a small isolated country, and you find that there has been no difficulty whatever in discharging almost all important purposes of government for centuries under a Republican form of Government. When, however, you go into the great countries of Europe and there supplant and overthrow the ancient forms of Government the effect is altogether different, and I think it is a moderate assertion, if I confine myself to this—that it requires caution and recommends circumspection. My hon. Friend has, I admit, other allies. He has allies in the sense of religious indifference, which, at any rate, upon the Continent of Europe, greatly tends to widen the chasm existing between religious and civil affairs, and he has yet one more ally more powerful than all, in what I must call the violent assertions of ecclesiastical prerogative, which have been so singularly and painfully characteristic of the present age, which have produced and will produce vehement re-action on the part of the human mind and intellect, and which are undoubtedly tending on a large scale, in the opinion of the civilized world, to sever religious and civil affairs. However, questions of this historical character we should not discuss in a cowardly manner, or even in a narrow sense, but rather endeavour to lay fairly the grounds for the conclusion at which we should arrive. Having made these admissions, and in no niggardly spirit, I still must contend that the proposition of my hon. Friend is a proposition which we are not prepared to adopt; and that, if we were prepared to adopt it, it would be attended by results from which the courage even of my hon. Friend himself would shrink. If my hon. Friend were to induce the House of Commons to adopt his Motion, what does he think would be the sentiment of the country to-morrow morning? What would be the condition of the Parliament which had affirmed his proposal? As my hon. Friend says, it is undoubtedly the constituencies which have to decide whether the Church of England is to remain an Established Church or not. But what does my hon. Friend think would be their decision? Some time ago, when he made a somewhat similar Motion to this, I ventured to point out to him that there were no signs of public concurrence in the views which he recommended, and that statement of mine has frequently been described as a challenge. My hon. Friend has given no sanguine account of what he himself believes to be the state of feeling in the country. When he has asked the judgment of the House, upon a division, he has found himself supported by limited numbers; and equally, when the views he has urged have been urged with attention in different parts of the country, the mode of their acceptance has, to say the least of it, been very equivocal. If we are to look at the local indications which from time to time and from year to year are afforded by popular feeling as evidenced by elections, can we say that they tend to inspire us with the conviction that the opinions advocated by my hon. Friend are spreading? And if we are to suppose that an Election were to occur upon this question, I can but say that for my own part I believe that the people of England, not of one party or of another, but the people of England in the broadest sense of the word, would return to Parliament a still smaller number of naturally interpreted them as promises on the part of the Gentlemen who used them that they would be his allies in destroying the English Church. But he finds now that there is no one of those persons, Commoner or Peer, layman or clergyman, who used that argument in the controversy with respect to the Irish Church, who is not a most resolute opponent of my hon. Friend with regard to his proposition respecting the English Church. Besides that, I admit that in the very fact of the external resemblance of the two Churches, there was something in the destruction of the one likely, at any rate, to induce attack upon the other. That I admit; but here again my hon. Friend has been misled. The apparent similarity of the cases could not long conceal their essential differences, and I believe that, as factitious and momentary causes have given the movement so well represented by my hon. Friend something of a temporary character, he will find himself in no inconsiderable degree deserted—a desertion of which we shall see increasing evidence from time to time. Sir, my hon. Friend does not deny that it is only a small minority in this House that he represents, and, with the fairness of mind which he possesses, and from which nothing, I believe, could possibly draw him aside, I do not think he would urge that that minority in this House would be increased in number, if it were in our power to take the judgment of the country upon this great subject. And that judgment of the country he himself must admit to be the final standard of action. Not thinking that it is possible for me to travel over all the ground that has been trodden by my hon. Friend, and knowing that it would be totally impossible to give in the course of any speech delivered in this House, within a moderate time, any sort of even tolerable picture of the case, yet I must resort to one authority for the purpose of entering my protest against the general character of the representation of my hon. Friend when he speaks of the hopelessness and helplessness of the Church of England. I shall not adopt the language of exaggeration. I do not mean to say that the Church of England is not seriously hampered in her work. Her connection with the State, which is a part of her lot, and which has brought her many advantages in former times, and has been an almost vital incident of her condition, must necessarily bring its disadvantages too. But my hon. Friend has represented the dark side of the picture, and the dark side alone. If the speech of my hon. Friend contained, upon the whole, a just or true description of the Church of England, what a lamentable picture she would present to the eyes of impartial observers! Where, Sir, are we to find impartial observers? Not easily, perhaps, among ourselves, because feeling and affection profoundly enter into the discussion of the question, and prevent us from judging with that perfectly dispassionate calmness which we should ourselves desire. But abroad we may sometimes find those who, with accurate knowledge of the condition of this country, and especially of its religious condition, unite discrimination and perfect impartiality of feeling. Now, the House is usually alarmed at the production of a printed book, but there is no occasion for such alarm now. I am about to read some passages from the work of a very eminent man—Dr. Döllinger—whom for many years I have had the privilege of calling my friend—one who is thoroughly acquainted with the religious condition of this country, and than whom no one has a deeper sympathy with English institutions in general. I shall read from a work published by his authority in this country, entitled Lectures on the Reunion of the Churches. I shall not read all he says about the Church of England, first, because it is too long, and next because my hon. Friend has supplied us with most of what could be said about her calamities and wounds and sores; but I will read what he says on the other side—not garbled passages, but such as convey a fair and just impression of his views. Dr. Döllinger says—

It may still be said with truth that no Church is so national, so deeply rooted in popular affection, so bound up with the institutions and manners of the country, or so powerful in its influence on national character. During the last 40 years it has extended its range, besides strengthening itself internally, by the foundation of numerous colonial bishoprics in all parts of the globe. It possesses a rich theological literature, inferior only to the German in extent and depth, and an excellent translation of the Bible—a masterpiece of style and more accurate than the Lutheran. . . . But what I should estimate most highly is the fact that the cold, dull indifferentism, which on the Continent has spread like a deadly mildew over all degrees of society, has no place in the British Isles. To whatever extent scepticism may have advanced among the younger generation, on the whole the Englishman takes an active part in Church interests and questions, and that unnatural hostility and division between laity and clergy produced by Ultramontaniam in Catholic countries is quite unknown there. . . . What has been accomplished during the last 30 years by the energy and generosity of religious Englishmen, set in motion and guided by the Church, in the way of popular education and Church building, far exceeds what has been done in any other country. Attendance at religious worship on Sundays is not, as in France, the exception, but the rule with the higher and middle classes. The Church Congress at Nottingham in October last (1871), in which 16 Bishops and some 3,000 clergymen and laymen of the most various ranks and classes took part, presented an enviable spectacle to other nations. The weightiest religious questions of the day, and the special events and difficulties of the Anglican Church were discussed with a dignity and thoroughness which suggests to every German the tacit inquiry whether anything of the kind would be possible with us?"

Now, Sir, whatever may be said of "hopeless helplessness," whatever may be said of the loss of self-government, whatever may be said of the difficulty of obtaining from Parliament the measures necessary for the religious development and expansion of the Church, yet I think that those who know how to estimate moral as well as legal forces—those who remember how much the people of this country are governed through voluntary, and not through merely coercive and authoritative agencies—those who can measure the real worth that has been described by Dr. Döllinger will be disposed to think that even if upon all the propositions of my hon. Friend some admissions may be made to him, yet they will also think that his candour, if with candour he could unite a perfect impartiality of view, would compel him also to allow that from every one of these propositions he was bound to make the largest deductions. Sir, my hon. Friend will not deny the great part the Church of England has played in the past history of this country. It is all very well to complain of the Church—and I might, perhaps, complain of the particular course that some of its leading members may have taken upon this question or upon that—but the Church of England has not only been a part of the history of this country, but a part so vital, entering so profoundly into the entire life and action of the country, that the severing of the two would leave nothing behind but a bleeding and lacerated mass. Take the Church of England out of the history of England, and the history of England becomes a chaos, without order, without life, and without meaning. My hon. Friend will not say that the question he proposes to us is a question of the past. If it is not a question of the past, it is certainly not a question of the present. Whether it be a question of the future I will not say; but this I do say, that if it be a question of the future, it is a question of a future which to us is indefinitely remote. If I considered simply the question of the practicability of what is proposed by my hon. Friend—if I adopted the conclusions of my hon. Friend, which I do not adopt—and asked myself in what way I, as one not wholly unpractised in the framing of measures in this House, should endeavour to give them effect by an Act of Parliament, I believe I should not have the courage to face the question. I once made a computation of what sort of allowance of property should be made to the Church of England if we were to disestablish her upon the same rules of equity and liberality with respect to property which we adopted in the case of the Irish Church, and I made out that, between life incomes, private endowments, and the value of fabrics and advowsons, something like £90,000,000 sterling would have to be given in this process of disestablishment to the ministers, members, and patrons of the Church of England. That is a very staggering kind of arrangement to make in supplying the young lady with a fortune and turning her out in life to begin the world. And undoubtedly the spectacle of a voluntary society in the position of the Church of England, altogether independent of the State, and with money available for her purposes that can be only roughly described, or even possibly estimated, by figures like these, does present to the mind rather puzzling problems, so that prudent men, moderate men, and, on my own behalf, Sir, I will say elderly men, may venture to doubt whether they are called upon by any imperative sense of duty to join in such a crusade, even though led by my hon. Friend filling the part of Peter the Hermit. Sir, I invite the House distinctly and decisively to refuse their assent to the Motion of my hon. Friend, because it is a Motion the conclusions of which are alike at variance with the practical wishes and desires, the intelligent opinions, and the religious convictions of a large majority of the people of England.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he wished to state why some, at all events, amongst the Liberal Members not occupying the responsible position of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government could not accept the conclusions of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall). There were considerations upon this subject which seemed to him to involve difficulties of far larger character than those to which the right hon. Gentleman had dealt. He (Mr. Harcourt) did not complain that the hon. Member for Bradford had brought forward propositions of a comprehensive character; but the House had some reason to complain, that he had not explained the whole extent of his propositions, or the consequences to which they would lead. The hon. Member was proposing a Motion not to alter, but to overthrow the whole framework of the Constitution. The fabric of their political and Parliamentary system rested on the Act of Settlement of the Crown, and before the hon. Member for Bradford asked their assent to his proposition, he ought to tell them what he intended to do with the Act upon which the Monarchy was founded. The Act of Settlement contained these words—

“Whereas it is requisite and necessary that some further provision be made for securing our religion, laws, and liberties . . . whoever shall hereafter come to possession of this Crown shall join in communion with the Church of England as by law established.”

His hon. Friend was quite entitled to propose to repeal the Act of Settlement; but it was right that Parliament and the country should know that the necessary consequence of his proposition was the immediate abrogation of what was called the Protestant Settlement. If they abolished that Settlement, were they to introduce some substitute in place of that which the Parliament of William and Mary established; and he thought that they had a right to know what plan for the Settlement of the Crown had been adopted in the conclusion of the Liberation Society? If the hon. Gentleman intended to maintain the Protestant Settlement of the Crown, he (Mr. Harcourt) wanted to know, how he reconciled that Protestant Settlement with the doctrines of religious equality and justice, on which he had enlarged, because to confine the Crown to one particular form of religious opinion was as great a violation of the principles of right as any of those which the hon. Member had brought under consideration? Was the hon. Member prepared to go to the hustings, the penumbra of which was already projecting over that House, and to tell the electors that the policy of the English Nonconformists and of the Liberation Society required as its first and necessary step the abolition of the Protestant Settlement? Was the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) prepared to recommend as Imperial policy that the Protestant Settlement should be changed or abolished? Nor did the difficulties end there. There was an Act which settled the Coronation. It had been thought necessary that the great compact between the Sovereign and the people should be placed on a certain footing. Did the hon. Member for Bradford intend to alter the terms on which the Sovereign succeeded to the headship of the community? At any rate, he ought to let people understand that these things were involved, and to place before them so definite a statement as to the measure in which he proposed to deal with them. If the House thought the time had arrived for coming to a decision by a vote, rather than by a more protracted discussion, he was unwilling to force arguments on their attention. He had never entertained any doubt on the question, and should vote, as heretofore, against the proposal.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. STAVELEY HILL, who had given Notice to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Nitro-glycerine Act (1869), intituled, "An Act to prohibit for a limited period the importation, and to restrict and regulate the carriage of Nitro-glycerine," and the effect of such Act on the manufacture, transit, and use of explosive compounds, said, that Petitions praying for inquiry had been presented from persons employing over 100,000 hands, and that fact would give the House some idea of the large issue involved in the continuance of the Act. Had the forms of the House allowed he would have moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the propriety of continuing it, and it would be a very proper subject of inquiry as to whether gun-cotton was the only safe explodent. The circumstances under which the Act was passed were these—that in 1868 there had been some terrible explosions of nitro-glycerine, and, therefore, it was thought necessary to legislate upon the matter. The Bill brought in was described as one to prohibit "for a limited period" the importation of nitro-glycerine, and, in fact, when the Bill was introduced, there was a clause in it limiting its operation to one year; but during the passage of the Bill through Committee in that House, that clause was, inadvertently, he presumed, struck out; because when Lord Cairns, in the House of Lords, took objection to the Act on the ground of the interference which it would cause to trade, Lord Morley pointed out that the Act would only be in operation for a year, and that in the meantime there would be an opportunity given to scientific persons to inquire whether the compound known as nitro-glycerine was an innocent explosive or not. But the Act had remained in force ever since, and the effect of its passing had been to give a monopoly for compressed gun-cotton as against all other explosives. Now, besides the objection to the Act on the ground of the restraint which it imposed on trade, there was a far more important question involved, and that was, how far persons employed in the Woolwich Arsenal, and who were working with the money of the country, should employ that money and their time in manufacturing, or in obtaining the knowledge of, articles for which they took out patents, and subsequently sold to this country, or to the colonies, or to foreign Governments. One of the principal questions bearing upon the matter was the comparative merits of two explosive agents—dynamite and compressed gun-cotton. The opinion of Professor Abel, chemist to the War Office, seemed to have had great influence upon that matter, though he himself was, in fact, deeply interested in the manufacture of compressed gun-cotton. He had a patent for such manufacture, and he granted the right to make the article to Messrs. Prentice, of Stowmarket, they paying him a royalty, and he recommended to the Government the passing of an Act of Parliament which would give the preference, or a monopoly, to gun-cotton. As to the safety of gun-cotton, on the 11th August, 1871, there was an explosion of gun-cotton at Stowmarket, by which 24 persons were killed and 50 were wounded. Major Majendie was appointed to investigate the matter, and the statements of Professor Abel were those upon which he seemed mostly to rely throughout the proceedings. He came to the conclusion that acid had been put in the gun-cotton, and that the person who had placed the acid there had aimed at doing a commercial injury to the company rather than at anything else. It was an astounding thing that such a deed could have been done by a mere rival in trade; but the Home Office ordered no further inquiry to take place, and so the matter rested. In March, 1872, a Treasury Minute was passed, with the view of preventing persons in the employment of the Government taking out letters patent for any of these explosive compounds, and in the following April, Professor Abel transferred his patent, which had cost him £5,000, to a Mr. Nicholson for £100, and the latter gentleman very recently assigned it to the Gun-cotton Company for £4,000. After the Stowmarket Works were destroyed, in September, 1871, licences were granted by the Home Office for the transmission of nitro-glycerine; but since they were rebuilt, in last April, the Government renewed their prohibition respecting that article. It therefore appeared to him (Mr. Staveley Hill) that this Act then was passed by the Home Office in the interest of Professor Abel. Although he was precluded by the forms of the House from taking a division on his Motion, he hoped the Home Secretary would grant him the Select Committee which he asked for.

Mr. BRUCE said, he came prepared to discuss the policy and administration of the Act, but was utterly unprepared to hear a personal attack made upon Professor Abel gravely affecting that gentleman's character; and, so far as he (Mr. Bruce) was concerned, utterly without foundation. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Coventry (Mr. Staveley Hill) assumed that the Home Office were acting under the advice of Professor Abel. Now, he (Mr. Bruce) was responsible for the Act of 1869, which was passed without any communication with Professor Abel; at all events, the only communication with him was entirely indirect. The subject of the danger arising from the explosion of nitro-glycerine was brought before the House by an hon. and gallant Member, whose statement produced a great impression. The Government, therefore, brought forward a Bill vesting in the Home Office the responsibility of laying down conditions for the use, the importation, or the transport of this article. To whom did he refer for information? Not to Professor Abel, but to Professor Miller, who gave an elaborate Report on explosive substances, and it was entirely on his Report that the first licences were framed. From time to time other explosive substances were brought before the Home Office, and it was represented that the conditions imposed as to nitro-glycerine were unnecessary. He did not know that he had ever witnessed conduct such as that of the hon. and learned Member. His Motion was one of the most reasonable character, and he (Mr. Bruce) should have been prepared to assent to an inquiry into the operation of the Act. But the hon. and learned Gentleman had said little or nothing in favour of his Motion, but had made a laboured attack upon Professor Abel, charging him with having reported in behalf of one invention and against another, because he was interested in the one and not in the other. That was one of the gravest charges that could be made against a public servant. Yet the hon. and learned Gentleman had made it without the slightest Notice, and it was therefore impossible for it to be met by those whose duty it would be to defend or explain the part taken by Professor Abel. A Committee of scientific men had sat upon the subject in the War Office, and Professor Abel was, he believed, a member of such Committee; but when the hon. and learned Gentleman stated that Professor Abel was the adviser of the Home Office in the matter, he said that which had not a shadow of truth in it. When the hon. and learned Gentleman intended to make an attack upon an eminent and an honourable man, he was bound to give the ordinary Notice usual under such circumstances. The Home Office, however, had prepared a fresh form of licence, and if the hon. and learned Gentleman thought its conditions still too rigid, he was prepared to welcome the appointment of a Select Committee. The only difficulty was, that there were a few days ago 19 Select Committees sitting, including 275 Members. Three or four others had since been appointed, and he was about to move for another Committee on a question affecting the metropolis. It would, therefore, be difficult to name another Committee, and he recommended the House to avail itself of the experience of the next six months, and if the hon. and learned Gentleman would renew his Motion for a Committee at the beginning of next Session he should be happy to agree to it.

Mr. ELLIOT said that, being acquainted with the practical utility of this article, and believing that the dangerous properties incidental to it as an explosive, had been to a great extent neutralized, he thought good would result from relaxing the severity of the restrictions. He had been asked to second the Motion, if made, and he should have been glad to do so; but he must say he was rather surprised and shocked that such charges should be made against Professor Abel without Notice.

Mr. HINDE PALMER thought it desirable that the subject should be fully investigated by a Select Committee, and was rejoiced to think that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had adopted that course. In his opinion, the Act was fully justified by the evidence given as to the extreme danger of this material; but it appeared by a lecture of Professor Abel, in February, 1872, that it was now one of the safest, most powerful, and most convenient explosives for blasting purposes that could be used. In Cornwall, it was very generally used for mining purposes, and with perfect security to the men employed. In conclusion, he must say he objected to the personal questions which the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Mr. Staveley Hill) had introduced into the discussion.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present—

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY suggested that the Government should appoint a small independent Committee of eminent chemists, and persons accustomed to the use of explosive materials to investigate the subject, and advise them as to the necessary legislation with regard to it.

Mr. STAVELEY HILL explained that in the remarks he had made with regard to Professor Abel, he had only repeated what had already appeared in print. He should be very sorry had he been led to make any statement reflecting on that gentleman which was not well founded.

Sir HENRY STORKS regretted the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Mr. Staveley Hill) should have been led to make remarks with regard to Professor Abel which were not only unfair but were unfounded. Had the hon. and learned Gentleman given Notice of his intention to bring this matter forward he (Sir Henry Storks) should have been prepared to state the real facts of the case in detail; but all he could now do was to state that Professor Abel had given up his gun-cotton patent unconditionally, and that he now received no royalty whatever on the manufacture of the material. The hon. and learned Gentleman had referred to officers in the service of Government holding patents. He entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman that the practice was inconvenient and improper. One of the first things his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State did on assuming the duties of the War Department was to put a stop to this system, and the Treasury Minute to which the hon. and learned Gentleman had alluded, was issued at the instance of his right hon. Friend. With regard to the main question before the House, he might state that accidents had frequently occurred from the explosion of dynamite, and that to transmit dynamite or any other explosive substance by railway, without due precaution, was a very dangerous thing. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had promised an inquiry into the subject, and he (Sir Henry Storks) thought it was very right that it should be inquired into. He regretted very much that the hon. and learned Gentleman had not given some Notice in order that he might have come down to the House prepared to reply more fully to the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Original Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND)

BILL.—[BILL 145.]

(The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

MR. PIM rose to address the House—

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; House counted; and 40 Members being found present—

MR. PIM again rose, and expressed his intention to move that the Order for going into Committee be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, consisting of the Marquess of Hartington and Mr. Secretary Bruce, together with all the Members who represented Irish constituencies.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member might move to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, but the nomination of that Committee must be made the subject of a separate Motion.

MR. PIM said, in that case, he would now move to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. His object was to ensure a decision which would give more satisfaction to the people of Ireland than the voice of the House at large, and he also wished that the details of the Bill should be more deliberately considered than they were likely to be by a Committee of the Whole House. His ulterior intention was to move that the Committee should consist of all the Members who represented Irish constituencies, as it was highly important whenever coercive and repressive legislation was called for, to show to the people of Ireland whether it received the support of the majority of her own Representatives. The fact was that a majority of Irish Members had voted against the second reading, and the Bill was only saved from defeat by the votes of English and Scotch Members. Moreover, he wanted to coerce Irish Members to attend to their business, for not half of them were in the House last evening when the second reading of this Bill was under discussion. If the Bill were referred to a Select Committee of Irish Members, and if the responsibility for the Bill were in that way cast upon them, they would not shirk that responsibility, but would attend the Committee and discuss its clauses; but the majority of Irish Members were absent from the House because the opponents of the Bill knew that opposition in the House was useless, and the supporters of the Bill knew that their attendance was not necessary to secure its passing. He was of opinion that the Bill ought to pass, but must strongly contend that its details required more consideration than they were likely to receive. For that reason he had not voted for the second reading of the Bill; but he would have done so, if he could have obtained from the Government a promise that they would consent to refer it to a Select Committee. He would now conclude by moving that it should be so referred.

MR. CALLAN seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,"—(Mr. Pim.)—instead thereof.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he thought the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Pim) could hardly be serious in supposing that the Government would assent to the Amendment, because the principle of referring Irish measures generally to Committees consisting almost exclusively of Irish Members could hardly have a fair trial, if it were raised and decided in connection with this Bill. There were the strongest possible differences of opinion among Irish Members in relation to it, and a Select Committee of Irish Members would from the first be sharply divided into two sections, one of which would oppose and the other support almost every provision. The desired experiment could not have a fair trial under such circumstances. One of the great objects of recent Governments was to obliterate as far as possible those unfortunate party animosities which had so long existed; and it seemed to him (the Marquess of Hartington) that instead of tending in this direction, such a Committee as that moved for by the hon. Member would tend to revive those animosities. The hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) had the courage to say what he knew would be unpopular with at least a noisy section of his constituents, and to vote for the Bill, and there might be others who would take a similar course in Committee; but in the main, it would be divided—Catholics opposing Protestants, and the South resisting the North. Farther than that, the proposal which his hon. Friend had made with regard to this Bill was far too important an invasion on the practice of the House to be affirmed without much further consideration and discussion than could now be given to it. When the House referred any matter to a Committee, the Committee was supposed to represent the prevailing sentiment of the House; but could it be said that a Committee composed entirely of Irish Members, with the addition of the Home Secretary and himself, would in any sense be a fair representation of the opinion of the House? Such a proposal could not be adopted in relation to one particular measure, unless they were prepared to adopt it with reference to measures generally. In that case, this might happen, which would reduce the proposal of his hon. Friend to an absurdity—it was quite conceivable that the opinion of Irish Members might be almost unanimous on one side, while the opinion of the House was almost unanimous on the other. So long as they legislated for Ireland, they could not get rid of their responsibility by delegating their functions to a particular section of their Members, and, having supported this measure by an overwhelming majority, they would not commit the consideration of its details to a body which might be opposed to every important provision of the Bill. He, therefore, hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Amendment.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, he widely differed from the opinion of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, for he (Sir John Gray) contended that the Irish Members who were especially interested in the maintenance of peace and preservation of property and life in Ireland were the very parties to whom the details of this measure should be submitted. Representing different sections of the Irish people and intimately conversant with the state of the country, they were, above all others, the men to examine the details of the Bill, and to say what provisions were necessary and best calculated to carry out the principle on which they were all agreed. All statistics upon the subject from whatever quarter, showed that crime had greatly diminished in Ireland, and coercive measures were quite unnecessary to protect property and punish crime, if the ordinary laws were strictly and promptly enforced. He maintained, in order to the end proposed, that the Government, by utilizing the Chairmen of Counties, who were overpaid for the work they had to perform, might do all that was needed for the repression of crime. Let the Executive, instead of allowing these gentlemen to adjourn their Courts and come up to Dublin to earn fees, or go into the country to amuse themselves, send them back to their counties, and make them sit from day to day, until punishment was inflicted on the guilty, and the evil-disposed were deterred, and measures such as that now before the House might be dispensed with. He was quite willing to give to the Executive all the powers that were needed for the repression of crime, but he was not prepared to arm them with exceptional powers as long as ordinary methods of repression were left unused.

MR. MUNSTER said, the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland objected to refer this Bill to a Committee of Irish Members, on account of the differences of opinion which prevailed among them. Now, he would appeal to the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Dr. Ball), whether that difference of opinion was such as to render the Irish Members unfit to discuss this measure properly among themselves. Another objection of the noble Lord was, that if the House were to refer the Bill to such a Committee, it would be equivalent to delegating its powers so far to the Irish Members. But the empty benches which they saw before them showed that the House was willing enough to delegate its functions of deliberation, though, as would be seen by-and-by, not of voting to the Irish Members.

DR. BALL, having been appealed to by the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. Munster) said, that the proposition to refer this matter to a Committee composed of every Irish Member of the House, with the addition of two English Members, in consequence of their official position, was simply a proposition that Government and Parliament should abdicate their functions and embody the Irish Members as a separate Assembly. That was a proposition of the most serious character, and one which he hoped the Government would never consent to. Neither was he disposed to refer the Bill to a Select Committee of the ordinary kind, because the measure had been the subject of careful deliberation in the House before, and had been made as perfect as possible. It was not a new measure, moreover, for it had been two years in force, and it had not been shown that the Executive had abused any of the powers conferred upon them by it.

MR. BUTT, while maintaining that the proposal for a Committee of Irish Members was justifiable in itself, agreed with the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that it was of too great importance to be discussed incidentally, and expressed a hope that it would not be persevered with on the present occasion. Notwithstanding the majority of last night in favour of the second reading of the Bill, he was in hopes that when the House went into Committee upon it such modifications might be introduced as would greatly tend to reconcile the Irish people to it. He believed that Ireland never would be at peace until there should be, not a Select Committee, but an Irish Parliament, to decide on Irish questions, not in this House, but in Dublin. But as he understood the proposition of his hon. Friend the Member for Dublin (Mr. Pim), it was not to delegate the powers of the House to a Committee, because when the Irish Members met their decision would be afterwards reviewed by the House; but it would come before it with all the weight that would attach to the previous deliberations of the Irish Members. He ventured to say that the mass of Business with which the House had to deal would soon force it to some division of labour, like that which had been suggested by the hon. Member for Dublin.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK also expressed a hope that the Motion would not be pressed.

MR. RONAYNE said, he also joined in the appeal, but took exception to the argument of Dr. Ball, that because the Bill had been passed two years before, it should be passed again. The circumstances were altered; peace existed in Ireland, there was a total absence of crime in the country, and he did not remember during the last 20 years an agrarian murder in Cork or Waterford. Was it, then, a reason for the passing of the Bill that offences had been committed in adjoining counties?

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870, and Protection of Life and Property in certain parts of Ireland Act, 1871, continued till 1st June, 1875.)

MR. BUTT moved, in page 1, to leave out lines 13, 14, 15 and 16, down to and inclusive of "and." The Amendment, if carried, would not repeal any portion of the Peace Preservation Act, except the Act of 1870, and it would leave the Westmeath Act untouched. Under that Act, the Lord Lieutenant would still have the power of proclaiming any county or district; and when a district was proclaimed, any man having a gun, a sword, or dagger in his possession would be liable to two years' imprisonment. The Bill would, therefore, still give very extraordinary powers to the Government. If ever they were to abandon these stringent measures, it would be better to do so gradually, and he believed that if some modification were made in the provisions of the Bill, it would soften the resentment by which it would be received by the Irish people. There was an intense feeling in Ireland on the subject, and he believed that it would be most advisable for the Government to fulfil their promise, not to continue the unexampled severity of the Act of 1870.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 13, to leave out from the first word "The," to the word "and," in line 16, both inclusive.—(Mr. Butt.)

THE O'CONOR DON supported the Amendment, which he hoped would be acceded to by the noble Lord. He conscientiously believed that all these stringent measures could not be at once abolished; but, gradually, they might be relaxed, and in that way, Ireland might be accustomed to the same laws which were sufficient to maintain the peace of England. If ever these laws were to be got rid of, they must be got rid of by degrees, and if ever a beginning could be made, it was at a time when it was admitted that the state of Ireland generally was tranquil.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was impossible for the Government to assent to the Amendment, as he considered they would be guilty of a grave neglect of duty, if they consented not to renew these parts of the Act. What, indeed, would be the use of the Act at all, unless it was fully competent to carry out the object the Government had in view? He denied it was their intention last August, that the Peace Preservation Act should lapse in the present year. What the Attorney General for Ireland then said was, that the House would have an opportunity of considering the question. As to the suggestions just made, he rather doubted whether the gradual abandonment of these restrictions would be prudent. As long as any restrictions existed at all, they should be thorough and effectual, and when the state of the country was such as would justify their withdrawal and a resort to the ordinary operation of the law, the Government would be only too happy to take this course. He knew that the reports of magistrates and constabulary officers were open to the comments which had been made about them; but they could not be produced, because they were made confidentially, and if they were not to be regarded as confidential, they would lose their value. From an examination of them, and in the light of information derived from other sources, he believed it was necessary to renew these Acts. As regarded the county of Mayo, its condition was not satisfactory, because there were as many agrarian crimes in it last year as there were in Westmeath; and he could mention six cases of murder or attempted murder, and of gentlemen who could not leave their homes without the protection of the police. Under these circumstances the Government were certain they would not be justified in relaxing the law in Mayo.

MR. SYNAN contended that the facts of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland did not support his argument, because he alleged the existence of agrarian crime as a reason for continuing legislation against treasonable offences. The Westmeath Act was passed to suppress agrarian crime in a small district, and the Peace Preservation Act was passed for the purpose of putting down treasonable offences throughout Ireland. There was thus an essential difference between the two, and the object of his hon. Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) was to separate the one Act from the other. The noble Lord was bound to continue only that part of the Act of 1871 which was necessary for the purpose of putting down agrarian crime, and to drop that part which related to treasonable offences, for it was not necessary to suspend the Constitution in Mayo for the purpose of taking up a person guilty of Ribbonism.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, as Chief Secretary for Ireland when the Peace Preservation Act was passed, desired to correct the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan), in his statement that that Act was passed solely against treasonable offences. The largest portion of it was passed for the purpose of meeting what had grown into a formidable and widespread outbreak of agrarian crime; but it was far from being confined to the small district of the country in which the Act of 1871 had its operation. It comprised many districts and counties. He appealed to the Committee whether, having once found it necessary to enact such legislation, it was not a very grave responsibility on the part of the Government to decide on the time when it should come to an end. Having in view the putting a permanent end to the evil, it might be found that the greater haste the less speed, and that the premature withdrawal of the Act might defeat the object they all had in view. A patient continuance of powers exercised with great caution would be the best means of bringing about an early and permanent termination of them, and, however rashly such powers might be used in other countries and under other forms of Government, their abuse under our Constitution was practically impossible.

MR. C. E. LEWIS, as an Englishman representing an Irish constituency, felt himself to be in a considerable difficulty. He had voted with great reluctance in favour of the second reading of the Bill last night, and would also oppose the present Amendment with great regret; but he would certainly support another Amendment which he saw on the Paper, restricting the operation of the Act from two years to one.

MR. O'CONOR agreed that under the force of public opinion such a Bill might not be harshly administered in England, but it was useless to appeal to this House on any Irish question when the Government had once made up their minds. He maintained that the law as it stood, was perfectly sufficient to put down crime, and was certain that no Irish Member could support a Bill like the one under discussion without exposing his fellow-countrymen to the greatest possible injustice. For that reason he should himself offer every opposition he could to its progress.

MR. MURPHY also joined in the assertion that the existing law was sufficient for the purpose. He protested against the Bill generally, but more particularly against the law which it was proposed to apply to the Press in Ireland.

MR. RONAYNE thought that, considering the tranquility of Ireland, no case had been made out for the Bill. He could not understand how Englishmen, forgetting their old traditions, could hand over their fellow-subjects to the tender mercies of a Star Chamber in Dublin Castle, to be imprisoned where and as they thought proper, or to give power to arrest on mere suspicion people who had committed no crime. That, surely, was not the way to make Ireland loyal.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 100; Noes 28: Majority 72.

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

MR. BUTT then moved the substitution of the word "four" for "five" in line 19, with a view to limit the duration of the Bill to one year.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 19, to leave out the word "five," in order to insert the word "four."—(Mr. Butt.)

THE O'CONOR DON hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. There was a chance of the Bill not being renewed if it were continued for two years; and it was very undesirable that such a Bill should be brought in year after year, by which means it would come to be regarded as a matter of course.

MR. BUTT said, he could not withdraw his Amendment. He did not wish that Bill, like the institution of the Council of Ten in Venice, to be renewed again and again, as a matter of course, till it became permanent; and, instead of renewing it till a new Parliament had assembled, he wished to see whether, with the prospect of a Dissolution, hon. Members would vote for the Bill, or, what was still worse, skulk out of the House to avoid voting.

Question put, "That the word 'five' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 28: Majority 79.

MR. RONAYNE proposed the addition of the following Proviso at end of clause:—

"Provided always, That Clause 8 of 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870,' shall be and is hereby repealed."

The Act which was now about to be renewed by hon. Members who had never read it, and did not know what it was, was simply a repetition of the Whiteboy Act of 1776, which was passed against tumultuous assemblies in Ireland. It was proposed to renew that Act without the safeguard given by the provision requiring proof to be given that the assemblies were tumultuous.

MR. BUTT said, that the Whiteboy Act of 1776 was a very severe measure; but the Judges, looking at the Preamble of the Act, ruled that it only applied where there was an insurrectionary state of things. But what did the Act of 1870 do? It substituted the proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant for proof of an insurrectionary state. The town of Belfast was proclaimed not long ago, and this Coercion Act came into operation, for which there was no excuse. He would ask whether it was necessary to apply the Whiteboy Act at this time?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he should accede to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MUNSTER moved the addition of the following Proviso at end of clause :—

"Provided always, That Clause 15 of 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870,' be and is hereby repealed."

The object of the Amendment was to repeal the clause which gave special powers to search private houses for threatening letters and other documents. There were cases in which, under a search-warrant, young ladies' love-letters had been seized and made public in a police court, and to prevent the recurrence of such things he proposed his Amendment.

MR. BUTT supported the Amendment, and gave instances in which the powers conferred by the clause had been abused. In his opinion, the clause might be safely dispensed with.

MR. PIM said, that the clause in question was highly objectionable, and ought not to be retained unless the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland could assure the Committee that it was absolutely necessary.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the writing of threatening letters was one of the offences still most prevalent in Ireland, and most frequently referred to in the charges of the Judges. There was no offence more easily committed, or which produced greater alarm or worse consequences. The Committee should bear in mind that the Government did not advocate provisions like this as good in themselves, but because they were necessary.

MR. LIDDELL commented on the inconvenience under which the House suffered, when legal questions affecting Ireland were discussed, in consequence of the inability of the Government to get an Irish Crown Lawyer returned to Parliament.

DR. BALL bore his testimony, as an Irish lawyer, to the fact stated by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that the sending of threatening letters was one of the most prevalent offences in Ireland, as it was also one of the most cruel, and created an amount of suffering perhaps greater than any other. It therefore required severe laws to repress it.

Amendment negatived.

MR. MUNSTER moved the addition of the following Proviso at end of clause :—

"Provided always, That Clause 23 of 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870,' be and is hereby repealed."

The clause in question gave power to the constabulary to arrest, and to the magistrates to commit to prison for six months, persons who were out-of-doors between sunset and sunrise who were unable to give a satisfactory account of themselves.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That Clause 23 of 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870,' be and is hereby repealed."—(Mr. Munster.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON defended the clause as one of the most efficient provisions of the Peace Preservation Act.

MR. BUTT denounced the clause as a "Curfew" clause, which permitted the arrest of a man who should be found out between sunset and sunrise, and, at the discretion of the magistrate, his imprisonment for six months with hard labour.

MR. MATTHEWS thought that before such a clause was pressed the House should have evidence of its necessity. How could they, without such evidence, ask a Parliament representing free men to assent to such a clause? He protested against clauses of that character, which involved the liberty of the subject, being passed sub silentio.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE reminded the Committee that the exceptional power given by the clause could only be exercised in the case of specially proclaimed districts. If any districts were specially proclaimed without necessity, the House would have a right to call the Irish Executive to account.

MR. HAMBRO said, that as an English Member, he would vote against every one of those clauses, provided he saw the Irish Members come down in a body to oppose them; but when he saw, night after night, empty benches, he concluded that the Irish Members had no case against the Government.

MR. RONAYNE said, that the clause prevented even courting among the Irish peasantry.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 124: Majority 100.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY moved the addition of the following Proviso at end of clause—

"Provided always, That Clause 25 of 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870,' shall be, and the same is, hereby repealed."

That clause, as it stood, said that it should be lawful for any constable or "other person" to arrest and bring before any justice of the peace any stranger sojourning or wandering in any district specially proclaimed. At the present time there were five counties either wholly or partly proclaimed, and recently the town of Belfast had been proclaimed.

Amendment negatived.

MR. BUTT moved the addition of the following Proviso at end of clause—

"Provided always, That no warrant to search for arms under 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870,' shall be executed before sunrise and after sunset."

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he could not accept the Amendment, for he thought that if the police had power to search for arms they should have that power at all times. Returns would be placed on the Table showing cases in which the Act had been put in operation.

DR. BALL said, that Returns would be of very little use; the real effect of an Act of this kind was not to be found in the cases in which it was put in force, but in the evils which it had prevented.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That Clauses 30, 31, 32, 33, and 34, of Part 3 of 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870,' shall be and are hereby repealed."—(Mr. P. J. Smyth.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he could not assent to the repeal of these clauses, but was willing to assent to a Proviso of which the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had given Notice, namely—

Mr. Hambro

"That no notice given to any newspaper before the passing of this Act, in pursuance of Clause 30 of 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870,' shall be sufficient to subject the publisher or proprietor of any such newspaper to any penalty or proceeding in relation to any matter or thing published after the passing of this Act."

It had rarely been found necessary to put the provisions of the clauses in force, and then only to the extent of giving warning; in addition, he must say they had been beneficial in preventing the publication of invitations to assassination.

MR. MATTHEWS condemned the clauses on the ground that they left it to the will and discretion of the Lord Lieutenant to give notice to a newspaper if it merely appeared to him that it contained seditious matter.

MR. SYNAN urged that the word "treasonable" should be struck out of the 30th clause.

SIR JOHN GRAY did not go so far as the hon. Member who had just spoken. He thought treason should be severely punished; but he suggested that the word "sedition" should be struck out.

MR. BUTT also thought that treason should be severely punished, but it was already provided for by the common law. The words "encouraging sedition" which occurred in the clause had no meaning.

DR. BALL said, that if the word "sedition" was struck out, it would only raise the question in every case whether an offence which might be really treasonable was not one of mere sedition. The end of the clause would be defeated if seditious offences were excluded from its operation, for the power was only given because they had confidence in the Executive. He would freely admit that the power ought not to be exercised except in cases where the public interests imperatively demanded it.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the Irish Government would only be able to exercise these powers subject to investigation of the matter in a Court of Law, by proceedings taken against by the party aggrieved for damages and compensation.

MR. BUTT said, he was not so certain of the proper exercise of the power for the future. In any case the paper would be suppressed first, and after the wrong was done there could be an action for damages; so that there would be punishment first and inquiry afterwards.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 25; Noes 111: Majority 86.

THE O'CONOR DON moved a Proviso, repealing the 39th clause of the Peace Preservation Act, which enabled grand juries to fine districts in which agrarian crime had been committed.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That section 39 of 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870,' shall be and is hereby repealed."—(The O'Conor Don.)

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 13; Noes 85: Majority 72.

On the Motion of Mr. BUTT, the following Proviso was agreed to, and added to the clause—

"Provided always, That no notice given to any newspaper before the passing of this Act, in pursuance of Clause 30 of 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870,' shall be sufficient to subject the publisher or proprietor of any such newspaper to any penalty or proceeding in relation to any matter or thing published after the passing of this Act."

MR. BUTT then moved the addition of the following Proviso, at end of clause—

"Provided always, That so much of the 3rd Clause of 'The Protection of Life and Property in certain parts of Ireland Act, 1871,' as enacts that no writ of habeas corpus shall issue to bring up the body of any persons so arrested, committed, or detained shall be and the same is hereby repealed."

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he would make inquiries, and if it was not really necessary to retain the original words they should be taken out.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided also, That no person committed under this Act shall be detained in prison for a longer period than six months without being brought to trial."—(Sir John Gray.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON opposed the Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS—KING EDWARD VI.'s GRAMMAR SCHOOL, BIRMINGHAM.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving an Address to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will withhold

Her consent from the Scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners in respect of this School, said, it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that when the Act which gave power to the Endowed Schools Commissioners was passing through that and the other House there was no opposition to it on the ground of principle. That peaceful passage was due to two understandings—and at that time more value was attached to understandings than now, with our improved experience, it was perhaps customary to attach to them. One of the understandings to which he referred was that conveyed to Parliament in the celebrated speech of Mr. W. E. Forster when he said that well-managed schools had nothing to fear from the Bill. The second understanding was that the Church of England should not be disturbed in the management of schools which the Founders had clearly intended should belong to her. Now, the Free Grammar School of King Edward the Sixth, in Birmingham, must be well known to their Lordships by reputation at least—they knew it well as a school attached by its Royal Founder to the Church of England, and as being one of the most liberal and one of the most successful of those foundations which were so much to the honour and advantage of this country. It was founded by King Edward the Sixth in the year 1552, and its charter contained this ordinance—

“The Governors, with the advice of the Bishop of the diocese for the time being, from time to time may make, and have power to make, fit and wholesome statutes and ordinances concerning the order, government, and direction of the school.”

It was difficult to imagine how any school could have been attached to the Church of England in a more distinct and direct manner. Indeed, he did not know how it was that this School had escaped coming under the 19th section of the Endowed Schools Act, which provided that where the Founders of a school directed that the children should be instructed according to the doctrines or formularies of any particular Church or Denomination, the Commissioners should not interfere with that intention. Now, if in any law or charter it was provided that certain authorities were to act under the advice of the Lord Chancellor, the presumption would be that they were to act in accordance with the laws of England; or, if under similar circumstances, any authority was to act under the advice of the Bishops and Clergy of the Church of England, you would conclude that such authority was to act in accordance with the principles of the Church of England. Accordingly, for 300 years the interpretation put on the foundation of this King Edward's School was that it was a Church of England foundation; and this interpretation was recognized in the Act of 1831—which was one passed not in the days of Tory ascendancy, but in a reforming Parliament and under the Ministry of Lord Grey. It was provided by that Act that the head master should be a clergyman of the Church of England, that the assistant master should be a clergyman of the Church of England, and that all the other masters should be members of the Church of England, and that the boys who received religious instruction should be well grounded in the fundamental doctrines and principles of the Christian religion. That was the state of things found when the Endowed Schools Commissioners stepped in. They propounded a Scheme which entirely deposed the Bishop of the diocese, in respect of the authority which they had possessed over the endowment for 300 years, and removed the School entirely from under his advice. The head master and the assistant masters need no longer be clergymen of the Church of England, or even members of that Church. There was no provision whatever for ascertaining whether the children were instructed in the doctrines of the Christian religion. The solitary provision relating to the religious education was that contained in the 55th clause of the Scheme of the Commissioners, which said—

“Subject to the provisions herein contained, the Governors shall make proper regulations for the religious instruction to be given in the several schools.”

It was therefore suggested that the appointment of Governors provided some substitute for the powers that were taken away, and that in the character of the Governors there would be found security that this would still remain a religious School. Unfortunately, the truth was exactly the other way. The old Governors were swept away, and their places were filled up by a Scheme which was somewhat complicated, and the working of which was to some extent obscure. Now, if it were provided that one portion of the Governing Body should be elected by the rest, the principles of the whole Body would be the principles of the majority of those who appointed the rest. The question, therefore, was—how were the Governors to be elected? Some of the members were to be elected by co-optation—a plan which the Endowed Schools Commissioners had frequently introduced. Of the remainder, eight were to be elected by the town council and four by the School Board. The School was therefore handed over entirely to the town council. Now the town council of Birmingham were no doubt excellent men, but they had distinguished themselves of late years by their extreme and passionate dislike of religious instruction in public schools, and had even gone so far as to set themselves against the laws of the country by declining to levy a school rate, because some fees might be given to denominational schools. To give the School over to the town council without a single provision guaranteeing the Christianity of the School was in reality to give it over to secular instruction. He was told that a noble Lord, a member of the Endowed Schools Commission (Lord Lyttelton), had presented a Petition from the town council of Birmingham which declared that the council were extremely anxious this Scheme of the Commissioners should be adopted. He had no doubt of it—but that was no reason why Parliament should adopt it. The town council might be very glad to take some of the churches of Birmingham and apply them to the use of other religious bodies; but was that any reason why Parliament should hand those churches over to them? The question really was this—to whom did this School belong? It most certainly did not belong to the town council. It must not, however, be imagined that this School had been conducted on narrow or exclusive principles. He believed that as far as was possible, consistent with religious teaching, it had shown the greatest tenderness for the religious feelings of those who were not members of the Church of England: a liberal conscience clause had been in operation; there had always been a large number of Nonconformists in the Schools, and they had united so fully in the spirit in which the Conscience Clause had been passed, that they had never taken advantage of it, and he was informed that the only persons who used that conscience clause were Jews. A Return published in 1869 showed that in the classical school there were 191 pupils belonging to the Church of England and 98 Nonconformists; in the English schools the numbers were 150 and 86 respectively, and in the lower school 41 and 24; or a total of 382 members of the Church of England as against 208 Nonconformists. In the elementary schools for boys the Church of England pupils were 318 and the Nonconformists 332. On the face of these figures, it was impossible to say that the education given in King Edward's School was administered in any exclusive spirit. He presumed that when Mr. Forster said that well-managed schools had nothing to fear from the Endowed Schools Bill, his Colleagues must have understood him as having used them in some other than their English sense, or the Department he represented would have vetoed this Scheme; for what said Mr. Green, the Assistant Commissioner, with reference to the management of the School—

"It is universally admitted that the present Board has discharged its duties with all care and conscientiousness. Among all classes there is a general pride in the school, a general admission of the benefits which it has conferred on the town, due in great measure to the judgment of the Governors in their selection of head masters, and a general desire to maintain or elevate its character as a place of high education."

The Commissioners themselves also bore the highest testimony to the manner in which the School had been conducted, and the most earnest appeals had been made by the present head master, the late head master, and Dr. Gifford, who was head master from 1848 to 1862, that the character of the School might not be changed. Their Lordships were aware that Dr. Lee, the late Bishop of Manchester, was formerly head master of the School. What did Mr. Benson, the Master of Wellington College, say in allusion to that right rev. Prelate?—

"I believe there never was a greater teacher than Dr. Lee, nor one more devoted to the promotion of every branch of study, scientific and artistic as well as literary; but I remember his saying that a recognition conveyed in a sentence of The Quarterly Review to the effect that 'the great school had been the centre of Christianity to that great town' conveyed the 'one idea which had inspired all his labour.' "

There were a number of objections to the different details of the Scheme of the Commissioners; but the objection which he (the Marquess of Salisbury) wished to bring most prominently forward, and that on which he challenged the decision of their Lordships, was that for 300 years this School had belonged to the Church of England, and that they would withhold their consent to a Scheme which proposed to take away every guarantee that now existed for giving a Christian education, and would hand the foundation over to a body who were notoriously in favour of secular education. Among the minor objections to the Scheme were these—that it took the management of the middle school from the head master; that it interfered improperly with the higher education for which the School had been so justly celebrated; that the Governing Body were not to be allowed to act by sealed document until after seven days' notice had been given; a prohibition which would prove a serious obstacle to efficient management. Then there was a clause in the Scheme which he regarded as not only objectionable, but dangerous. It was in these words—

"The Charity Commissioners may from time to time, in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction, frame schemes for the alteration of any provisions of this scheme or otherwise for the government or regulation of the Foundation, provided that such schemes be not inconsistent with the first clause of this scheme, or with anything contained in the Endowed Schools Act, 1869."

The Endowed Schools Commissioners were obliged to lay their schemes before Parliament; but, after those Commissioners had acted and Parliament had expressed its opinion it would be in the power of the Charity Commissioners, if this Scheme were adopted, to act of themselves and alter the provisions of the Scheme without any sanction from Parliament. The opinion of Mr. Fry had been taken on the clause. There could be no higher opinion, and he believed that, according to Mr. Fry, such would be the effect of the clause. Surely their Lordships would not sanction such a delegation of the powers of Parliament to the Charity Commissioners? Still more objectionable in itself, and contrary to the wish of every one in Birmingham, it would remove the School from its present site in the town and place it in the outskirts. The town council of Birmingham numbered among its members men of distinction, but that council appeared to have an extreme and passionate dislike of religious instruction. It had gone so far as to set itself against the law of the country by refusing a school rate because a portion of it might be given for religious instruction. He hoped, therefore, their Lordships would not be led to approve the Scheme because it had the approbation of the town council of Birmingham. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ducie) —acting apparently under inspiration—had given Notice of certain Amendments but their Lordships' only power over the Scheme was that of omission—the power of excision. He had no doubt the noble Earl could use the scissors with great skill, but he could not make this Scheme acceptable to those who had the management of the School. It was one brought forward by an expiring Commission and submitted to a Parliament which was also expiring; but he hoped their Lordships would listen to the appeal of the Governing Body of the School, and would refuse their sanction to this Scheme, and would not allow this great wrong to be done.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will withhold her assent from the scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners relating to the Free Grammar School of King Edward VI. in Birmingham.—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF DUCIE said, he desired to speak with the most profound respect of the Governing Body of this School. He believed it was a most excellent one, and that the School had been ably and liberally conducted; but the Governing Body was in every sense a self-elected body, entirely irresponsible to every one, and the very fact that a large number of Nonconformist pupils were in the habit of attending it was a reason why Nonconformists should have a share in the government. There was a strong feeling in Birmingham that the Governing Body should be a representative one. The Governing Body had been for a long time, if not always, composed exclusively of members of the Church of England, and, as he was informed, of the politics of the noble Marquess who had just addressed their Lordships, and it was therefore desirable that some alteration should be adopted which would give to other parties some chance of enforcing their views. He was afraid that if this Scheme were rejected there would be very considerable dissatisfaction in Birmingham. There were various suggestions made in the scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners which were not unpalatable to either party. For instance, with respect to the admission of scholars and the payment of fees, he believed both parties were entirely agreed; and he, for one, should much regret that, by the postponement of the Scheme, those matters upon which all parties were agreed, should be prevented from being adopted. He therefore ventured to urge upon their Lordships certain alterations in the Scheme, which would not affect the general principle on which the Endowed Schools Commissioners were acting; and at the same time he wished to observe that the alterations he should ask them to adopt were confined chiefly to matters of detail, and would in no way interfere with the future condition of the schools. The Amendments of which he had given Notice were confined to three points. The first was the omission of a certain portion of Clause 29, which would in his opinion tend to reduce the sense of responsibility thrown upon the Governing Body. The next point was to omit Clause 51, which affected the site of the building. The schools were not at present advantageously situated in Birmingham, and it had been urged that the commercial value of the site was so great that the Governors were not justified in remaining where they were. As against that, however, there was the fact that the schools were placed in close contiguity with the railway stations, and scholars were able to come to the schools from all the suburbs of the town. In this case the people of Birmingham were all agreed that the schools should remain on their present site. His Amendment did not make it compulsory upon the Governors to remove to another site; but if the schools ultimately attained such a position that it would be necessary to remove them, it gave the Governing Body the power of removing them. The third point he had to ask the House to consider was with reference to scholarships. He asked their Lordships to omit paragraph 1 in Section 114, not so much in the interest of the poor, as in the interest of those who were comparatively rich, so that those who preferred to send their sons to other private grammar schools should be enabled to avail themselves of the advantages of the Birmingham Grammar School. He hoped that Her Majesty's Government would consent to accept his Amendments, as, if they did, they would be able to adopt the scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners. The noble Earl accordingly moved the first of the Amendments of which he had given Notice.

Amendment moved, after the word ("from") to insert the words ("so much of").—(The Earl of Ducie).

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he must commence by expressing his dissent from his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) as to the two "understandings" which his noble Friend so strongly relied on in his opposition to this Scheme. First, as to the interpretation put by his noble Friend on the words used by Mr. Forster that schools like that now under consideration would not be interfered with by the Bill. If his noble Friend would refer to what passed in their Lordships' House when the Endowed Schools Bill was under discussion he would find that the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond) did not in 1869 understand the matter as his noble Friend now said he understood it. In Committee on the Bill the noble Duke asked him whether Christ's Hospital ought not to be treated in an exceptional manner and excluded from the operation of the Bill, which would otherwise have a very disastrous effect upon it. The noble Duke's words were—

"He wished to press upon the noble Earl (Earl De Grey and Ripon) who had charge of the Bill the propriety of treating it (Christ's Hospital) in an exceptional manner and of excluding it from the operation of the Bill, which would otherwise have a very disastrous effect upon it."—[3 Hansard, cxvii. 1866.]

And speaking for the Government in their Lordships' House, what was his reply? Did he say that the Commissioners would not deal with Christ's Hospital? Nothing of the kind. He referred to Christ's Hospital and to some six or seven schools in all, including this very School at Birmingham, which were to be allowed one year to bring forward schemes of their own, and in the most distinct terms he stated that if they did not do so they would be dealt with by the Endowed Schools Commissioners in the precise manner in which this school had been dealt with. And it was with a statement such as that on record his noble Friend came down to that House and said that the Government had given Parliament to understand that Schools like the King Edward's School would not be touched by the Commissioners! The second "understanding" relied on by his noble Friend was that schools connected with the Church of England would not be touched. Now, this was a matter not of "understanding," but of law. His noble Friend wondered that this School was not held to come under the 19th section of the Endowed Schools Act. He believed that until that night no one had ever made such a suggestion. He believed his noble Friend was the first who had ever put forward that view of the case:—the Managers of the School had never imagined that they were under that clause. His noble Friend said matters were going on as they had gone on for 300 years, till the Endowed Schools Commissioners intervened; but the fact was that the Commissioners were not to intervene in the first instance without necessity—it was the Act of Parliament which intervened—it was for the Governors themselves to propose a scheme in the first instance, which would be dealt with by the Commissioners—and that they had done; and it was only after receiving the Governor's Scheme that the Commissioners took action. He did not dispute the terms in which his noble Friend had spoken of the Governing Body; but it would be a mistake to suppose that much dissatisfaction had not been expressed in Birmingham in respect of the arrangements of the School. In 1864 a society was formed in Birmingham, called "the Grammar School Reform Association," for the purpose of bringing about a change in the management and organization of this King Edward's School. In that association were several clergymen of the Church of England and a gentleman who had contested Birmingham in the Conservative interest. A deputation from Birmingham came up and made statements on the subject to the Royal Commission on Endowed Schools, over which the late Lord Taunton presided, and among the evidence given before that Commission was the evidence of Canon Miller, from which he would venture to read this extract—

"I would wish to state emphatically to the Commissioners that I believe the point upon which I am asked to speak is the point of all others which is important in the present inquiry. I believe there is no point in connection with the School upon which the feeling is so strong in Birmingham, and which, if it were satisfactorily settled, would go so far to quiet the minds of those who are at present dissatisfied. The objection which has been taken for a great many years, and which is by no means of recent growth as far as my knowledge of Birmingham goes, is the principle of close and unmodified self-election. The effect of this principle of self-election has been that the members of all Nonconformist bodies have been practically excluded from the government of the School, though there is nothing whatever in the charter, as far as I understand, to prevent a Nonconformist from being elected. There is nothing in the Act of Parliament to that effect, and it has been merely practice. The result has further been that no member of the Town Council has been upon the Board of Governors. The result has further been that no gentleman who has ever been elected either to represent the borough in Parliament or to represent the county, with one single exception, and that the exception of a very strong Conservative, has ever been chosen by the Governors in modern times to a seat at the board. I mean by that to imply and indeed distinctly to convey to the Commissioners, that we have this practical anomaly rankling in the minds of the people, that the present system works in such a way as to exclude from the government of this trust a vast number of the most intelligent citizens, and some citizens, I am bound to say, who have taken the lead in the work of education in the town. I mean gentlemen of the Nonconformist body; and the effect has also been, and this is also rankling in the minds of the people, to shut out from the government of this School almost all the men who by popular suffrage, either as members of Parliament or members of the town council, had been called to posts of dignity and influence, and who are thereby seen to possess the confidence of their fellow-citizens. I may say without any exaggeration, that I am quite sure, from my own knowledge, that there is a very deep-seated grievance in the minds of many people in Birmingham, and that they do feel that the Board should be thrown open."

This was pretty strong testimony, and from a perfectly unimpeachable witness, as to the state of feeling in Birmingham on the present arrangements in regard to the School. It was also shown that before the Commission of 1866, the Governors themselves had great difficulty in seeking from Parliament facilities for dealing with their own schools on account of the opposition they were certain to meet with on the part of the town council in consequence of the exclusive character of the Governing Body of the School, and at last they ceased altogether to come to Parliament to give effect to their wishes. Therefore, it was not just to the Commissioners to say that they had intervened in this matter without necessity. They had intervened in accordance with the provisions of an Act of Parliament—and that being so he had no alternative but to deny the charges which the noble Marquess had brought with respect to these “understandings.” Before passing to the larger questions raised by his noble Friend opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) respecting religious instruction and the constitution of the Governing Body, he wished to say a few words on the Amendments of his noble Friend behind him (the Earl of Ducie). With respect to that portion of the Amendment relating to the proposed new site for the School, he was informed it was in one of the principal thoroughfares of Birmingham, and it was certainly objectionable on that account; but he admitted that there was a general feeling in favour of keeping the school where it was now situated, and in this respect he accepted the Amendment; as he did also that portion of it which related to the scholarships. Some of their Lordships who were not acquainted with all the facts of this case and the position of the Education Department might be inclined to say—“If you are so ready to yield to a proposal of such a kind in this House, how comes it that you did not make this alteration when the Scheme was before the Committee of Council?” His answer to that was that the Education Department had no power to make any alterations. This House and the other House of Parliament might make alterations by way of omission, though they could not add anything; but the Education Department possessed no such power. All the Department could do under the Act of Parliament was either to approve or disapprove a scheme. This, however, was a provision which in his judgment might be beneficially altered. The Governing Body had stated that they had been advised that they had no power of coming to the Department to make any representation except under the Appeal Clause of the Act. They might have made any representations they pleased, and there was nothing to prevent them. If they had done so, their representations would have received the utmost possible consideration; but not a single representation had been made with respect to any one of these matters. He did not blame the Governors, for they seemed to have been misled by someone in this matter; but, of course, they had prevented the Department from considering their objections in full. Many of the minor points which had been referred to were really involved in what were called the “common forms” of all these schemes. While well aware of the great temptation there was to adopt common forms, he was bound to admit it was preferable in a case like the present not to run counter to the feelings of those who were interested in the question. Leaving, however, these minor points, he turned to the greater question—whether this Scheme ought not to be passed on account of the absence of any provision for religious education. Now this part of the Scheme was in almost entire accordance with the provisions of every Scheme except those under Clause 19. A good many of these schemes were already in practical operation, and no intimation had reached him of any difficulty having arisen with respect to the operation of these clauses. His noble Friend, though he did not precisely say so, seemed to imply that the result of the operations of the Governing Body would be the total banishment of religious instruction from this School. It was impossible, however, without a violation of the provisions of this Scheme, for the Governing Body to set up a secular school in lieu of that provided by the Scheme. The words of the Scheme were that “subject to the provisions therein contained, the Governing Body shall make proper regulations for the religious instruction of the schools.” It seemed to him, therefore, that the Governors could not refuse to make provision for religious instruction. The practical question which would have to be settled by the future Governing Body would be whether that instruction should be in accordance with the doctrines of Church of England, or of the nature of that given in the British and Foreign Schools Society’s Schools. That was what the Governors would have to decide. The noble Marquess had given the figures, which showed that there was a very large number of the children of Nonconformists in the School; and he (the Marquess of Ripon) begged their Lordships to bear in mind the fact that out of 1,800 children in 1869, not less than 800 were the children of Nonconformists. The noble Marquess declared that the effect of the Scheme would be to hand over the government of the School to the town council of Birmingham. But surely this was not so. The proposal of the Scheme was that of the 23 Governors, eight were to be elected by the town council, four by the School Board of Birmingham, one by the teachers of the Upper School, and ten by the existing Governing Body of the School. And the noble Marquess called this handing over the School to the town council! Hereafter, when the Governing Body would be reduced from 23 to 21, there would never be more than eight elected by the town council. The noble Marquess expressed his fear that the government of the School would be handed over to a secularist body, the town council of Birmingham. But in order that that should be, it was necessary to assume that all these Governors would be of one shade of opinion, and all favourable to secular education. It was unlikely, however, that a great public body like the town council would be inclined to choose persons of a single type of opinion. At all events, the ten elected by the existing Governing Body, the one Governor elected by the teachers of the Upper School, and the four elected by the School Board would represent other and different shades of opinion. He understood that the Chairman of the School Board was one of the existing Governing Body, and that the Vice Chairman was a Conservative candidate at the last election for the borough. What was the course taken by the Commissioners in framing the Governing Body? The Commissioners had before them three proposals for the future government of this School—one from the town council, another from the present Governing Body, and a third from the Grammar School Reform Association. They had also the suggestions of Lord Taunton's Commission; and all these various schemes had been considered. Lord Taunton's Commission proposed

10 members elected by the town council and 11 members by the whole Board, not giving any power whatever to the existing Governors. The scheme presented by the Governors made a very remarkable proposition, considering the state of public feeling described by Canon Miller. They proposed 5 members elected by the town council, 5 by the borough justices, and 11 co-optatives, but they proposed that no change should be made until the existing body had died out, when these new elements should be infused into the Governing Body. That would not have satisfied the people of Birmingham or the Grammar School reformers? If the proposal of the Governing Body was somewhat immodest, he was bound to say that the proposal of the town council was no less so. They proposed that the Governing Body should be chosen exclusively by the town council. The Grammar School Reform Association on their part suggested that it should consist of 8 members of the town council, 4 elected by the School Board, and that the co-optatives should never exceed 6. If the Commissioners had wanted to hand over this institution to the town council, they would have adopted the proposal of the town council. The Commissioners did not do that, and they also rejected the proposal of the Governors—they took, as the basis of their Scheme, the more moderate intermediate proposal of the Grammar School Reform Association, but made the proposal more favourable to the existing Governing Body. In submitting these facts, he thought he had established, in the first place, that in dealing with these Schools, neither the Commissioners nor Her Majesty's Government had in the slightest degree departed from the statements which they made to Parliament when the Act was being passed. He thought he had also shown that, until his noble Friend had mentioned it to-night, no one ever asserted that the School came within the 19th clause of the Act. He had also shown that there was now, and had been for many years, a large amount of dissatisfaction about the Governing Body; and he had also shown that out of the various local proposals the Commissioners had adopted that one which was most moderate, and had even modified it so as to make it even more favourable to the existing Governing Body. He earnestly trusted that, under circumstances such as these, their Lordships would not reject this Scheme; contrary to the almost unanimous opinion of the people of Birmingham. There were no objectors to the Scheme except the Governing Body; and he ventured to say he did not think his noble Friend would effect the object he had in view if he induced their Lordships to reject the Scheme. There was nothing in the past history of this matter which would lead anyone to suppose that the desire of the town of Birmingham to have a larger share in the management of this School was likely to grow weaker—he believed, on the contrary, that the rejection of this moderate proposal would strengthen that desire. He could not help thinking if the Scheme was rejected now, noble Lords opposite, who might have to deal officially with the question instead of those who now sat behind him, would think twice before they ventured, under the responsibilities of office, to resist the almost unanimous opinion of the people of Birmingham.

EARL GREY said, he had all along understood that the Commissioners would not interfere with any schools which were found to work well; but this rule did not seem to have been at all adhered to. The only reason alleged for the proposed modification of the Governing Body, was that there was a great number of Nonconformist children in the School; but he (Earl Grey) drew a different conclusion from that fact. The number of Nonconformists was to him a conclusive proof that the School had been fairly administered by the Governing Body. The modification of the Governing Body not being necessary to secure fair play to the Nonconformists, would it tend to improve the government of the School? He did not think it would. He thought that if they admitted these conflicting parties strong partizan feelings would arise. He thought the School Boards generally—not of one party, but on both sides—had wasted much of their time in disputes on matters of a worthless character, instead of applying themselves to the working of the schools. He believed, for this reason, that it would be an unfortunate occurrence if they were to throw into the Governing Body a large infusion of Nonconformists; and therefore, however unwillingly, he must support the Motion of the noble Marquess.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, he looked upon this question both as an Endowed School Commissioner and as a near neighbour of the town of Birmingham; and he could not but regret that the Governing Body of King Edward's School had thought fit to invoke the assistance of the noble Marquess to throw out this Scheme. If they succeeded, they would make themselves most unpopular, and give the greatest dissatisfaction to almost the whole people of Birmingham—and surely the feelings of the inhabitants of the town should be consulted on the question. The town council on this question were the representatives of the feelings of the inhabitants of the town. For many months a bitter agitation had prevailed upon this matter, which had been put to rest by the promulgation of the Scheme of the Commissioners; and until a short time ago the Commissioners had believed that they had satisfied even the Governing Body themselves upon most points. No scheme and no body of Governors had received more attention than this Scheme and the Governing Body of King Edward's School had received from the Commissioners. The opposition was founded, in the first place, on the religious character of the teaching in the School. The noble Marquess was not correct in saying that this was distinctively a Church of England School. He rested his whole case on the terms of the foundation deed—that the statutes and ordinances of the School should be based "upon the advice of the Bishop;" but these words were not sufficient to bring the School under the words of the 19th section of the Act. According to that clause, in order to constitute a Church of England school there must be express words requiring that the children of the School should be taught according to the doctrines and formularies of the Church of England. If the construction of the noble Marquess prevailed, a large number of schools must come under the same construction—indeed almost the whole body of the more ancient endowments of the country would be handed over to the Church of England. His own personal predilection was in favour of such a proposal, if Parliament chose to adopt it; but that was a general question, and under the present law it was impossible by any reasonable construction to bring this case under the 19th section of the Act. The noble Marquess complained of the Scheme because it not only abrogated the Church of England character of the School, but substituted nothing of a religious character for it. This part of the question had been fully argued before in reference to a previous scheme for a Church of England school, and he could now only repeat what he had said before the Committee of the House of Commons—that the Commissioners would never undertake to indicate any definite and specific religious teaching for schools in their schemes, unless they could connect it with some standard of a religious body—they were not competent to do it. They left it to the managers of the schools—the best judges; but he would say, without hesitation, that he hoped and believed that many schools would follow the example of the school at Ripon and provide the teaching of the Church of England accompanied by a due protection of conscience. Speaking from some degree of local knowledge he could only say it was to him a marvellous instance of blindness on the part of any one who knew anything of Birmingham to suppose there was any chance of passing under this Act through Parliament a scheme which would give the Church of England any more definite advantage than it would have under this Scheme. No such scheme would meet the wishes or disarm the opposition of the people of Birmingham. With regard to the Governing Body, the word “co-optative” seemed to be imperfectly understood. It was sometimes assumed that, as used in the schemes, it meant “self-elected,” and that that part of the Governing Body described as the “co-optative” element was to fill up vacancies in its own number. But the meaning in the schemes was that all the members of the Governing Bodies were to elect the future co-optative members.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, his objection was that in the long run the non-co-optative members would have the absolute power.

LORD LYTTTELTON said he did not apprehend that result. In these bodies there must be a majority on one side or the other; but he never understood it to be admitted that the result would be to give the absolute preponderance to majorities. The minority would always have a fair weight. He greatly regretted that in deference to the public opinion of Birmingham the Commissioners had been obliged to give up the ex officio element, which in his opinion was a very important element. But still he did not believe that the town council would wholly control the other elements of the Governing Body. They would have eight members out of 21; a member would be nominated by the teachers; four more would be elected by the School Board, which happened to be, and was likely to continue, in direct antagonism to the town council, and the remaining eight would be the co-optative members. He denied that any one element would be able to swamp the others. The town council had not got all they asked, nor anything like it; a compromise had been made with other interests. What really underlay the objection urged against the town council was that such a body was not a worthy body to have charge of education; but this was a general objection to the unfitness of town councils for educational responsibility which was not for the Commissioners to entertain. If there was to be a popular element at all in educational bodies the Commissioners must take that which was provided by law. He did not admire the system of School Boards in all respects; but they too were provided by Act of Parliament, and town councils and school boards were the best representative bodies that the Commissioners could find. As to the often quoted remark of Mr. Forster, that good schools would not be interfered with by the Act, there were two or three answers. In the first place, everything depended on what a good school was. A school might be a good school now, but might not be a good school 10 years hence; and their object was to attempt to give security for the perpetuity of their goodness. A good master almost always made a good school, and that might be no security for its remaining so when he was removed. In the next place, a good school would not be injured by the action of the Commissioners. He denied—that had been asserted—that “a School” meant the “Governing Body”—it meant the boys and the system; and Mr. Forster never meant that a Governing Body was not to be interfered with. He did not admit that the Birmingham School was a perfect School. It was true that there was a complimentary allusion

LICENSING (IRELAND) BAILSMEN.

QUESTION.

MR. W. JOHNSTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has received information of a case that is alleged to have occurred in Belfast, on the 20th of April last, when the resident magistrate refused to accept publicans as bail, and when, it is stated, they were threatened with the loss of their licences if they offered themselves as bailsmen; and, if such action has the sanction of Government?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had made inquiry, and was informed that Mr. O'Donnell, the resident magistrate at Belfast, had not refused to accept publicans as bail on account of their being publicans, but on account of the bail tendered not being sufficient. It had been further stated that the publicans in question had been informed by the Sub-Inspector of Constabulary, that they would lose their licences if they became bail in certain cases; but the Sub-Inspector denied that he had made use of any such expression. What he did say was, that they should be careful how they became bail in connection with charges of resisting the police.

ARMY—CLOTHING, &c. OF THE GERMAN ARMY.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether the British Military Attaché at the North

German Court has reported on the way in which the material of war, including provisions and clothing, is procured for the German Army; and, if such Reports have been received, whether he is prepared to lay them before Parliament?

SIR HENRY STORKS: Sir, in answer to the hon. Gentleman, I may state that the British Military Attaché at Berlin has reported from time to time on the way in which the material of war, including provisions and clothing, is procured for the German Army. As Reports of this nature are naturally confidential, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State does not think it desirable that they should be laid before Parliament.

THE MAURITIUS—INSPECTORS-GENERAL OF POLICE.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he would state to the House why, since all previous Inspectors General of Police at the Mauritius have been allowed to reside in the country within easy access of the head office, Lieutenant Colonel O'Brien has been compelled by the Governor to reside in the town of Port Louis, to the detriment of his health?

MR. KNATCHBULL HUGESSEN: In reply, Sir, to the Question of my hon. Friend, I have to say that previous Inspectors General of Police at the Mauritius, and Colonel O'Brien himself, have resided in the country within easy access of the head office; but Colonel O'Brien having thought fit without leave to remove his residence to a considerable distance from the town, has been ordered to return to Port Louis or its neighbourhood.

SCHOOL BOARDS EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1872—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the Circular issued by the Board of Supervision in Edinburgh on the 8th instant, forbidding Inspectors of the Poor, although duly elected, to sit upon School Boards, or to hold office under them; whether such a regulation does not limit the choice of the School Board constituencies in a manner not authorized by "The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872;" and, whether such a regulation is not in excess of the powers conferred upon the Board of Supervision by sec. 56 of the Act 8 and 9 Vic. c. 83?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, I have been in communication with the Board of Supervision in Edinburgh on the subject of the Question of my hon. Friend, and they inform me that the Circular of the Board is in accordance with the practice pursued during the last 23 years with respect to various offices, and its legality has never been questioned. The Board have considered it to be in their power, and that it was their duty, to prohibit Inspectors from sitting on school boards or holding other offices, the duties of which were likely to be incompatible with the due discharge of their office. One such reason in the present case is, that the duty of collecting the school-rate is, by Section 44 of the Education Act, imposed upon the Parochial Board, and that the Inspector, being the servant of the Parochial Board and ratopayers, ought not to have a voice in fixing the amount to be assessed, more especially as the Inspector is generally also collector, and would derive emolument from the school-rate in proportion to its amount. There are also several other sections of the Education Act under which the duties of member of the Parochial Board or Manager of Schools would clash inconveniently with the duties of Inspector. There is no objection, however, to their holding the offices of clerk or treasurer to the school board, as the duties of such offices are merely formal and clerical.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS ACT—SHREWSBURY SCHOOL—QUESTION.

MR. STRAIGHT asked the Secretary to the Local Government Board, Whether there is any foundation for the report that the Governing Body of Shrewsbury School have come to or contemplate coming to a determination to remove the School Building from its present site to a situation more than a mile outside the town; and, if so, whether before taking any further steps in the matter they will receive either a deputation or memorial from the inhabitants of the borough on the subject?

MR. HIBBERT, in reply, said, it was true that the Governing Body of Shrewsbury School had determined to remove the school from its present site, and to remove it to a site within three miles of the centre of the town, as they were empowered to do under the Public Schools Act. They had now three different sites under consideration, but had not yet come to any decision with respect to them. In conclusion, he might say that any memorial or deputation upon the subject from the inhabitants would receive attention.

ARMY—ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY, WOOLWICH—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will state why in the case of a candidate for admission to the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, or for direct commissions in the Army, who may have failed to qualify at the examination before the Civil Service Commissioners, it is objected to return to him the paper in which he has so failed to qualify, and which would afford him an opportunity of knowing the mistakes he had made?

SIR HENRY STORKS: I have, Sir, made inquiry of the Civil Service Commissioners, and am informed that at the examinations for admission to the Royal Military Academy and for direct commissions, candidates are allowed to take away the printed Papers of questions; but that the Papers containing their performances are retained by the Commissioners in accordance with what they believe to be the universal practice of all examining bodies.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION ACT—PENALTIES.—QUESTION.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the Penalties Law Amendment Act (28 and 29 Vic. c. 127) does not provide for the recovery of any penalty not exceeding five pounds inflicted upon summary conviction; and if therefore there is any foundation for the statement that penalties inflicted under the Wild Birds Protection Act of 1872 cannot be recovered?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, that there was no foundation for the statement referred to in the Question of his hon. Friend. The law he believed to be this—That when power was given to a magistrate, either directly or impliedly, to convict summarily, the Act commonly known as Jarvis's Act, came into operation; and there could be no doubt that the penalties referred to were recoverable. He wished, however, to remark, that the adage said, that whenever the opinion of a lawyer was obtained without a fee, it was worth what it cost; but in the present case he hoped that the opinion was at least worth the fee.

POST OFFICE—PURCHASE OF TELEGRAPHS.—QUESTION.

MR. PLUNKET asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will, before the beginning of the Whitsuntide recess, lay upon the Table of the House the Returns relating to the purchase of Telegraphs, ordered on the 1st of May to be printed?

MR. MONSELL: I fear, Sir, that it will be impossible to have this Return completed before Whitsuntide. In the first place it is a heavy Return in point of matter. In the next, the questions which are open between the Department and some Railway Companies are of such a nature as to make it necessary that the Return should be very carefully prepared.

ENGLISH RECORDS RELATING TO IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. COGAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he can state whether any and what steps have been taken by the Treasury with respect to the making a calendar of English Public Records relating to Ireland?

MR. BAXTER, in reply, said, the following steps had been taken to carry out the matter referred to by the right hon. Gentleman. On the 30th of November last the Treasury sanctioned the employment of Mr. Sweetman to compile a calendar of all instruments and entries relating to Ireland from the earliest time to the end of the reign of Henry VII., and Mr. Sweetman had been employed upon the work since the 1st of April.

BOARD OF EDUCATION (IRELAND)—REV. MR. O'KEEFFE.—QUESTIONS.

COLONEL STUART KNOX asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table, the Memorial of certain Members of the Irish Education Board, as also the names of the gentlemen who actually signed it, and the letter, docket, or other communication which was sent with it to the Irish Office? He begged to explain that in putting the Question he did not impugn the honour of any member of the National Board, feeling great respect for all, and personal regard for some; but he thought there had been sharp practice in sending forward the memorial without the knowledge of the minority, as was shown by the Papers last laid upon the Table.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had no objection to lay the memorial on the Table, but he could not promise to lay on the Table any letters on the subject, as they were in the nature of private correspondence.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, that seeing the Notice of Motion for tomorrow respecting the Callan Schools was still on the Paper, it would be convenient to the House to know whether the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock intended, after the appointment of a Committee, to proceed with it?

MR. BOUVERIE: Sir, I do not propose to proceed with the Motion tomorrow, and I am glad my right hon. Friend has given me an opportunity of saying so. I consider—and, no doubt, the House will consider also—that the carrying of the Motion of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) on Thursday has for the present taken the wind out of the sails of my Motion. I propose to let it stand on the Paper without date, hoping that the Committee may report in time for its consideration at some later period of the Session. I should like to ask the noble Marquess when he proposes to nominate the Committee?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the names of the Gentlemen whom it was proposed to nominate would be laid upon the Table that night.

CHURCH RATES LEGISLATION (SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN asked the Lord Advocate, When he intends to introduce the Bill promised to be introduced on the part of the Government, two years ago, for the abolition of all assessments and rates for the erection and repairs of Churches and Mansees in Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: I observe, Sir, that the Question of my hon. Friend contains a statement or assumption to the effect that I, on the part of the Government, promised two years ago to introduce a measure for the abolition of all assessments and rates for the erection and repairs of churches and manse in Scotland. I presume my hon. Friend refers to the observations which I made on the 5th of July, 1871, upon the occasion of the second reading of the Bill which he then introduced. I have no doubt he has, in this assumption, set forth his own impression and belief as to the course I said I would take; but I by no means admit the accuracy of his belief, and if he will be good enough to refer to the report of what I did say, he will see that his Question is by no means accurate. What I said was, that I should endeavour to deal with the whole subject of the law relating to churches and manse in Scotland to the best of my ability as soon as a reasonable opportunity presented itself; but as to the time, I am not in a position to give any more definite reply.

MR. M'LAREN: I beg leave to give Notice that I shall take an early opportunity to call attention to the delay in this and other matters of legislation affecting Scotland.

PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION— THE VACANT SEATS.—QUESTION.

MR. RAIKES asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, during the present Session or before the dissolution of the present Parliament, to introduce a measure assigning to other constituencies the seats which have been left vacant since the disfranchisement of Beverley and Bridgewater?

MR. GLADSTONE: We have no intention of bringing in a Bill for the purpose mentioned by the hon. Member.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

Supply considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £1,035,719, Victuals and Clothing.

(2.) £174,983, Admiralty Office.

SIR JOHN HAY complained of the great increase of the Vote as compared with previous years. He would remark that were the £14,000 saved by the abolition of the Coastguard Office added, the Vote would be nearly the same as in 1867-8, an amount denounced as grossly extravagant when the present Government came into office. After reducing the sum in 1870-71 to £159,368, the Government had restored it to its former dimensions. He thought some explanation of the increase ought to be given.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he had ascertained the reasons for the increase which had occurred since 1870-71, to the present year. The Vote in 1868-9 was £182,000, but that did not include the Coastguard Office, which was £6,300, which would have made it upwards of £188,000. There had been a total increase of £21,000, of which amount the progressive increase of salaries accounted for £11,000, and the rents of houses, which were really additional buildings at the Admiralty, and ought therefore to be deducted, having been substituted for Somerset House, for £3,000. Then the increased price of coal represented about £500, the increased charge of the Controller's Department was £3,800, and the Vote included £1,400 for the temporary employment of paymasters. Against that there had been a reduction of from £6,000 to £7,000. Not less than 26 clerks, with salaries amounting to £6,000 or £7,000 a-year, had been reduced, and 25 writers introduced, at a total cost of £1,900 a-year. Making a net comparison between the year 1868-9 and the present year, there was a real reduction of about £14,000 in the Vote, which reduction would have been still greater had it not been for circumstances over which the Admiralty had no control.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that the hon. Gentleman had taken for his comparison the year 1868-9. The Estimates accepted by the incoming Administration from their predecessors were for 1869-70, and the charge for 1869-70, omitting the Coastguard, was £168,000; but in the present year it was nearly £6,000 more than that. The Estimates prepared by his right hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry), in the year 1868-9, the time of the Abyssinian War, were not those on which he had based his comparison. Those Estimates did not bear a fair comparison with other years, and it was the Estimates of 1867-8 that he (Sir John Hay) had referred to.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, they had been informed the other night that the substitution of writers for clerks had been carried too far, and it was now found necessary to turn many writers back into the position of clerks again. If such was the case, the money saved by the reduction of clerks at present would come back again into the Estimates.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE believed that if a comparison were fairly made, it would be found that the Pension Vote had not increased through the re-organization of the Department; for the fact was, hardly any officer during the last two or three years had been pensioned at the Admiralty. The hon. and gallant Member should recollect that the Dockyards were included in this increase, a fact which would account for, as he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) believed the greater part of it. The question of the employment of writers at the Admiralty had been now determined by the Treasury. It was true that they were to be placed upon the salaries they were now receiving—namely, commencing at £80 and rising to £160 a-year.

SIR JOHN HAY said, it would be convenient if the hon. Gentleman would lay upon the Table such a discriminating Return as would render those charges intelligible to all—showing what the amount was that was fairly chargeable to the Admiralty and what to the Dockyards.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE saw no objection to the production of such a Return, showing the increase since 1870.

MR. BOWRING complained of the Estimates not being framed in a way to enable a comparison to be made between the present and preceding years. He wished to know the number of permanent clerks and writers employed that year.

COLONEL STUART KNOX thought that the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Admiralty would occasion much anxiety amongst the clerks, who were already suffering very much from the reductions that had taken place, as it appeared now that they would have to serve for a longer time and at a smaller pay than hitherto.

MR. RYLANDS said, the prospect had been held out to them of a reduction of the permanent expenditure of the Department; but there was a considerable increase of the pension Vote, while it required all the ingenuity of his hon. Friend (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) to show that there had been any diminution of the permanent expenditure at all. They had been told that writers were to be employed who were not to be on the establishment, who were to have no increase of salary and no pension; but it appeared, after all, they were to have a subordinate class of clerks, with increasing salaries, and who would have a right to pension. Not only that, but by-and-by it would be said, that it was a great injustice to limit those writers to £160 a-year, inasmuch as they performed the same duties as the other clerks who were placed upon the higher scale of salaries.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he differed from the opinion of his hon. Friend the Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands), and thought that the explanation of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty was clear and ingenuous. The fact was that several items showed an increase of expenditure, which was not real but only apparent; for instance, his hon. Friend had stated that there was £3,000 more paid for the rent of offices now than heretofore, because the Admiralty had given up Somerset House for other purposes. There had been no real increase with regard to the paymasters, and the item of £11,000 increase by guaranteed increase of salary extended over three years. That item was more than accounted for, if they took into consideration the three years from 1869-70. There had been no new class of officials created apart from naval appointments, and higher pay was given only in the case of scientific men employed in the Controller's department.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that what he complained of was, that the pension list had been increased to the extent of £48,000 a-year, in consequence of the mistake made by the Government in discharging gentlemen who received the maximum amount of salary, and were able to perform their duties, in order that others might be promoted to perform their duties. The fact was, the pension list had been unnecessarily increased by men who were willing and able to do their work.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY asked what was to be done with regard to navigating masters?

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the Admiralty attached the greatest importance to keeping up a separate class of officers for navigating Her Majesty's ships, but were not prepared to adopt any plan by which officers should be taken at random from the executive staff for that purpose. They proposed, however, to make the experiment of offering to a limited number of the executive officers of the Navy a certain increase of pay and position as inducements to undertake navigating duties.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had wisely determined not to abolish the class of navigating officers. He wished to ask, whether it was the intention of the Admiralty to restore the rank of major in the Royal Marines? In answer to a Question he (Sir John Hay) had put to him on the subject that Session, the right hon. Gentleman gave the House to understand that he had some hopes of giving the Marine light infantry, as well as the Marine artillery, the benefit of the creation of that rank. The other two branches of the Service, the Royal Artillery and the Royal Engineers, which had always been looked upon as being in the same category with the Royal Marines, had the rank of major given to them, and it was unfair that the senior captains of the latter should not be placed on the same footing as their brethren in the former corps, whom they were constantly serving. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the rank of brevet-major, but that would not meet the case.

MR. GOSCHEN was afraid he could not give an entirely satisfactory answer on the subject, inasmuch as there were great difficulties between the War Office and the Admiralty in dealing with it. As to the rank of brevet-major, however, he hoped to be able to make, in a short time, an announcement which would be favourably received by the Royal Marines.

In reply to Lord HENRY LENNOX,

MR. GOSCHEN said, it was true that communications had passed between the Treasury and the Admiralty relative to the duties performed by the Permanent Secretary of the latter, and with regard to the appointment of a legal gentleman. The performance of their duties by the various secretaries at the Admiralty worked very well, and if Mr. Lushington retired, he would retire on the pension promised by the late Government on his accepting the office.

MR. KINNAIRD was gratified to hear that the rank of major was to be restored to the Royal Marines.

Mr. Goschen

MR. GOSCHEN said, it would be brevet-majority, and that it would be shortly announced.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he could not understand why the Marines had been treated differently from any other branch of the service, unless it were on account of some one of those petty economies of which the Government were so fond. The Marines were one of the most distinguished corps of the service, and they had carried the reputation of England all over the world. The First Lord of the Admiralty promised, on a late occasion, that an opportunity should be given for discussing the naval policy of the Government; but he (Sir James Elphinstone) thought at the time that the right hon. Gentleman was making a promise which he would not be able to perform. It was his intention, therefore, to take the present opportunity of discussing the question of the administration of the Admiralty and naval affairs generally; and if that course should be deemed irregular, he should avail himself of the forms of the House and put himself in Order, by concluding with a Motion for the adjournment of the Debate. In what position, he wanted to know, did the Board of Admiralty stand after the many changes that had taken place. There had been a dictator at the head of the Admiralty, whose rule had come prematurely to grief, and since his time alterations of various kinds had been made in the Admiralty system. He would therefore like to know what was the real position of the First Lord. The Sea Lords, instead of being employed in considering and discussing the policy of the Navy, were employed all day in signing documents of the contents of which they knew nothing. That was evident, from the fact that Sir Maurice Berkeley, in his evidence before a Committee of that House, had stated that he had been told to put his initials here, or three ticks there, to Papers of the contents of which he was perfectly ignorant. What was the position of the Navy at the present moment? They had only some eight or nine frigates fit to go to sea, and yet they had undertaken the suppression of the slave trade on the Coasts of Africa and in the South Pacific. Why, he believed they had not got cruising ships enough to enable them, in case of emergency, to protect the commerce of the country.

Forty-five per cent of the corn consumed in this country was brought from abroad; and if, by any combination in Europe, their grain ships were stopped for one month, the country would be in a state of panic. That showed the urgent necessity of maintaining such a Navy as would enable them to cope with their enemies in any part of the world. They had not got that Navy. They had already built quite sufficient ships for coast defence, and what was required was, that a large addition should be made to the cruising sloops and paddle-wheel steam frigates and other seagoing ships of the Navy. The country was in no danger of invasion, and never would be if they were perfectly armed in that respect. They had discussed that monster, the Devastation, which had been a most costly experiment, and so far as was known, she had already ended in failure. She was not a seaworthy or sea-going ship, and any man who signed an order to send her across the Atlantic would be liable to a charge of manslaughter. If they forced her against a head-sea at seven knots an hour she would be swamped, an opinion in which Lord Lauderdale, who was as good a sailor as any man, concurred. And she was unfit for coast defence from drawing too much water. The present Government had come into office with flying colours on the promise of making great reductions in their expenditure; but the Estimates had increased year by year, since they had come into office, notwithstanding they had carried out some petty economies at the cost of some miserable clerks, who had been turned out wholesale. There had been a great many pettifogging reductions, but there had been a yearly increase in the Establishment charges. The pension list had been increased and the best men had been driven into the service of foreign countries. Their dockyards had been stripped and denuded of stores that ought to have been kept for the use of the country, and which in case of war would have to be replaced at a most enormous cost. There had been an auctioneer in a pulpit going over their dockyards knocking down articles at a ruinous sacrifice. Their stock of timber, which was greater than that of any country in the world, when the present Government came into office, had been sold, and they had again to compete for the article in the open market. Blocks and dead-eyes had been sold for almost nothing—capstans worth £80 and £90 each had been sold for £7 and £7 10s. each, and some blocks of the old Royal George, that had been dredged up because they had three brass sheaves in them, had been brought under the auctioneer's hammer, so determined were the present Government to get rid of everything. The rope was now made by machinery instead of by hand, and was of inferior quality in consequence. The coal allowed was insufficient for ships to make headway against wind and tide; and Lord Clarence Paget had attributed the accident which happened to the Agincourt to the parsimonious allowance of coal to the Navy. Under the direction of the Duke of Somerset, experiments had been entered into with the view of ascertaining, in the first place, how smoke on board our ships might be consumed, and, secondly, whether shale and rock oils might not be utilized in place of coal for the production of steam. To save an expenditure of £8,000 a-year these experiments were abandoned. As the price of coal had now decreased so much he strongly advised the Government to consider the matter. If experiments should be made with a view to disarm these oils of their explosive character, it was for the Government to undertake them, and he believed they might be carried to a practical result. The stores which the Admiralty now had at command were so limited, and that more especially with regard to masts and yards, that he feared they would not be sufficient to equip a fleet in case of emergency. With regard to anchors and chain-cables some time ago he obtained a Committee on the subject, and a Bill was introduced for testing chain-cables; but its provisions were so altered that the chainmakers were allowed to test their own cables, and make out their own certificates as to the result of the testing. On the 1st of January the Government put an end to that abuse, the only good thing they had done, and now there was a proper test applied. There was not a single iron-clad in their Navy that had a chain sufficiently strong to hold her; and he objected to the removal of the swivels out of the chains. By doing that, they had run the risk of losing several of those valuable vessels, and the danger of the course adopted was shown in a recent collision which occurred between two vessels at Madeira from a cable parting. The size of the chain was $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches only; but it ought to be at least $2\frac{3}{4}$ inches to hold one of these ships. In the collision referred to, the Northumberland's cable parted; another anchor was let down, but as it would not bite, the Northumberland came foul of the Bellerophon. As to anchors, he should like to know why the Admiralty provided their ships of war with anchors that would not bite, and why they had given the go-by to an anchor—Trotman's—now generally used in the merchant service, and pronounced better than any other. In a cyclone at Bengal, every ship not provided with Trotman's anchor broke adrift; two vessels that broke adrift were brought up with it, and no fewer than 18 ships held on with it. Yet, in the face of the fact, that it was used in all the vessels of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, the Admiralty had systematically set their face against that anchor. He suggested that the Admiralty should build no more Monitors. What they wanted was a large addition to the number of their sea-going iron-clads, as well as their cruising sloops. He also suggested that a class of vessels, which had been allowed to fall into desuetude should be brought into requisition—namely, paddle-wheel frigates. It was absolutely necessary, during an engagement, that a certain number of vessels should be in attendance to tow ships in or out of action, and paddle-wheel frigates were the best adapted for that purpose, especially in such waters as the Persian Gulf. Whatever the Admiralty might do, by all means let them abandon the practice of building expensive toys, which set the whole scientific world lecturing and talking nonsense.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, that without wishing to be disrespectful either to the Committee, or to the hon. Baronet who had just sat down, he declined to reply to many of the historical points raised by the hon. Baronet's speech, inasmuch as they only related to allegations which had been made over and over again, and which had been met with repeated denials from the Admiralty. What progress could be made if such topics were reverted to? The hon. Baronet, in the first instance, addressed himself to the question of the Marines, and said that some petty economy had prevented the rank of major being established for the Marines. On behalf of the Admiralty, he emphatically denied that they were actuated by such a feeling in the matter, and he assured the Committee, that the question with the Admiralty was simply one of relative rank. [Sir JAMES ELPHINSTONE observed that the rank carried the monetary advantage with it.] He had told the hon. Baronet that the Admiralty would have been willing to grant the majority, if it had not been in consequence of the difficulty arising in regard to relative rank. Money had nothing whatever to do with it. With regard to the questions which did not affect the past but the present in the hon. Baronet's speech, he must pass over those which related to the question of ships to be built, as that subject would come on at a more subsequent period; and therefore he would not say more now than that, with reference to the assertion that the Admiralty could not fit out a ship, their dockyards were full of stores. As regarded the question of anchors, that was a question that must rest with the naval advisers at the Admiralty, and if the hon. Baronet, instead of discussing the subject in a Committee of that House, would come and discuss it at the Admiralty, and produce evidence to convince them that Trotman's anchor was better than the Service anchor, then a change would be made. The only desire of the Admiralty was to have the best anchors and cables that could be procured. It was fully recognized at the Admiralty that the question of cables was of supreme importance, and upon that subject conferences were now going on between the controllers and the partners of the firms who supplied them. The charge with regard to taking the swivels out of the chains was one which referred to something that took place in 1864, and therefore could not affect the present Government.

Mr. G. BENTINCK said, that allegations made upon good authority and personal knowledge frequently met with flat denials from the Treasury bench, denials which subsequent inquiry proved to be unwarrantable. On a previous occasion, when they had been discussing the question of chain cables, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Admiralty denied his statement in terms more curt than courteous, and said—"In any case, it was to be regretted that those who "primed" him (Mr. G. Bentinck) had not first of all referred to the Admiralty, so that an inquiry might have been instituted." Instead of himself having been wrong, it was the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) who was incorrect. What he had stated respecting anchors and cables, and which, in spite of the hon. Gentleman's denial, he now begged to repeat, was that our men-of-war—our largest class of vessels—were not supplied with sufficiently large cables; and, in the next place, he adverted to the fact that, in consequence of the swivels being taken out of the chain-cables, one of our large iron-clads had been very nearly lost. It was to be regretted that the hon. Gentleman did not take the opportunity of making himself acquainted with these matters before meeting statements with denials, which, though inaccurate, carried weight, owing to the authority of his position.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, it was desirable that the matter should be cleared up before the hon. Gentleman went any further. His hon. Friend had understood the hon. Gentleman to charge the present Government with having removed swivels, whereas it was done by a Conservative Government.

Mr. G. BENTINCK said, he was charging no particular Government with the blunder, which, as he understood, was committed in order to adapt the cables to some kind of new-fangled capstans. The allegations which he (Mr. Bentinck) had made, and which the Secretary of the Admiralty had denied, had since been fully confirmed. His charge was against the Board of Admiralty; he cared not what Government was in power. He contended that the practice of relegating matters of this kind to non-naval men connected with the Admiralty resulted in great risks to Her Majesty's ships; whilst the custom of calling upon civilians to explain these things to the House of Commons must be followed by equally bad results. With regard to Trotman's anchor, experiments made at Woolwich had, he believed, demonstrated that the holding power of Trotman's anchor was very much in excess of every other anchor tried with it, and that of all the anchors tried on the occasion those of the Admiralty were the worst. Then, with regard to rope, that furnished by the dockyards was not always of the best description, and many complaints of its quality were made by the officers commanding Her Majesty's ships. When the safety of Her Majesty's ships was compromised by this wretched, peddling economy, it was time to discuss the subject in Parliament. The Great Eastern had invariably ridden out every gale with Trotman's anchor, of a comparatively small weight, and her cables were also more efficient than those used in the Royal Navy, being manufactured of a superior description of iron. If these three-inch cables were used by our first-class iron-clads, the latter would not be so frequently parting from their cables, and would not run the risks they now ran. It could not be on account of any difficulty to be experienced in working them, that they were not supplied to the vessels requiring their use; it must be another instance of the unfortunate economy which was always cropping up. Another question was the state of our Reserves. He had asserted that the ships in reserve were not always fit to be commissioned, either with respect to their hulls, their rigging, their engines, or their armaments. The statement was denied from the Treasury bench, but he thought that, with the fuller means of information which the right hon. Gentleman had since enjoyed, he would not now deny the statement. As to the Devastation, he hoped there would be no fatal results from the experiment now being tried, but the impression of those whom he had seen and who had been on board that vessel was that she was not fit to go to sea. It seemed that she could not go under a certain rate of speed, and there was a risk that the ship might be drowned when forced against a head sea. He feared it would be found impossible to run the ship in a gale of wind, and he could only repeat what had been so forcibly said by his hon. Friend (Sir James Elphinstone)—a grave responsibility rested on those who sent this ship to sea; and he could only hope that their rashness would not lead to fatal results. On a former occasion, when he asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he had been considering the question of Ships v. Guns, the right hon. Gentleman said, with some asperity, that he had been thinking of nothing else. It would be satisfactory, therefore, to hear what were now the ideas of the right hon. Gentleman as to the result of the struggle now going on between armour-plates and guns. On the solution of this question must depend the future construction of the British Navy, for if the guns were to beat the armour-plates, the Government had been working on an entirely false principle in the construction of vessels, and all our heavy armour-clads would be useless. His hon. Friend behind him said that we had no sea-going ships, and were not in a state to go to war, and he entirely endorsed that opinion. It was useless maintaining a Navy consisting only of one class of ships. He agreed that we ought to have a class of heavy iron-clads for home defence; but where was our sea-going Navy to be found? And without such a Navy, how was our commerce to be defended, and our colonies to be protected? He asserted without fear of contradiction that we had not a single vessel which could fairly be called sea-going, and was capable of being sent on a long voyage.

Mr. OTWAY thought it unfair to speak of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty as having pursued a peddling and beggarly policy. His right hon. Friend had given practical proof that such was not the principle which guided his naval administration. Through the liberality of the House his right hon. Friend had obtained an augmentation of the Vote for Naval Stores which enabled him to increase the pay of those who built the Navy of the country. With respect to the Devastation, he could not but regret the observations which had been made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) and by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. Men of experience and authority ought to pause before they made such a statement as this—that the Administration who sent the Devastation to sea might be liable to an accusation of manslaughter; a statement of that kind was enough to deter a Gentleman in the position of his right hon. Friend from doing what he thought right. It was a safe prophecy, for if, as he believed would not be the case, an accident occurred to the ship, they would be able to point to the warning they had given; whereas, if she proved thoroughly sea-going, as he was informed, by no less high authority than Sir Spencer Robinson, would certainly be the case—for that she was a ship fit to go anywhere—no one would reproach the hon. Members for their injudicious prophecies. With respect to the construction of ships he was disappointed that his right hon. Friend had not taken any notice of what his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) had said on the subject of torpedo vessels. It was one to which foreign nations were directing a good deal of attention, and as to which the experiments now being made by the Austrian and German Governments showed that they were in that respect a good way ahead of us. It was also clear that if other nations could destroy our ships by torpedoes, the boasted strength of our Navy was of little use. His right hon. Friend had alluded to the Navies of France, Russia, and the United States, but he did not refer to the Navy of Italy, to which the Government of that country were now adding ships of a very peculiar character, of enormous size, and likely to be the most powerful ships afloat. He hoped his right hon. Friend would take steps to procure full information on that subject. With respect to the Dockyards, his right hon. Friend had procured a great boon for the employés in those establishments. It would be a great pity, however, if, in the distribution of that boon, satisfaction was not given to all the classes intended to be benefited by it, and such would not be the case if the present system of classification were adopted. He trusted that his right hon. Friend would cause inquiry to be made as to the best manner of distributing the increased grant which he had been the means of obtaining from the House.

Mr. B. SAMUELSON said, he did not think the charge made against the Admiralty as to the alleged insufficiency of cables was justified. If a 3-inch cable was sufficient for the Great Eastern, a 2½-inch cable ought to be more than sufficient for their iron-clads. He would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether a survey had been made of the plate of the Northumberland which had been penetrated in the collision at Funchal, and, if so, whether the quality of the iron proved satisfactory, as he had been informed that the iron of the Northumberland was very unsatisfactory. He would also like to ask questions concerning the dockyards of Gibraltar and Malta. At Gibraltar, £4,000 only had been spent during the year for additions to the mole. He believed it was impossible to overrate the advantages of that mole. Two of our iron-clads could anchor under it, and it would be a great advantage if that mole was extended considerably beyond what was provided for by the present plans. He asked Her Majesty's Government whether it was their intention to extend the work, and whether any measures were being taken to improve the sanitary condition of the harbour of Malta?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE disclaimed any intention of giving an uncourteous reply on a previous occasion to the hon. Member for West-Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck). When, however, hon. Members rose in their places and made accusations against the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty that he had sacrificed the safety of Her Majesty's ships, they must not feel surprised that they were answered somewhat warmly, and, perhaps curtly. He, however, had no intention, of displaying warmth when he replied to imputations of that kind. The hon. Member had stated that the Admiralty had made changes in the chain-cables and capstans for the sake of economy. He had never heard of any such change of capstans or chain-cables, and therefore considered himself justified in denying the assertion in toto. Lately he had taken pains to make inquiries on the subject. The facts as he had ascertained were, that in 1864 a very much improved capstan was adopted in some of Her Majesty's vessels, and it being found that the chain-cable could not be easily turned upon it, naval officers recommended a slight alteration in the latter, leaving only a swivel at each end of the cable. This plan, it was stated, was in operation in the French Navy, and would not affect safety. The recommendation was adopted by the then Controller—a naval man—with the approval of naval Members of the Board, and from that time to this nothing had been heard on the subject. It was true that the recent breakage of a cable had been attributed to the change; but the general opinion was, that it was due to some other cause, and economy had nothing to do with it. As to the anchors which had been mentioned, the naval Members of the Board did not think them as good for general purposes as those now in use; but there was no indisposition to adopt any improvement. The hon. Member for West Norfolk had repeated his imputation respecting rope; but every endeavour was made to supply the best quality, though it might not always be of equal quality; and though complaints were made from time to time that it was not strong enough, and did not last so long as formerly, such complaints had been made from time immemorial. As to the reduced stock of hemp, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Baxter), having had much experience, thought it undesirable to keep a very large stock, fresh hemp being much preferable. Of yarn a large stock was desirable, and 18 months' stock was accordingly kept, while sufficient hemp was kept for the manufacture in case of emergency of as much yarn as would be necessary. But neither of the provisions—a short one of hemp and a large one of yarn—was kept up from motives of economy. With that explanation he hoped that the House and the country would be satisfied that the Government did not look on the questions from an improper point of view, but that they would feel that the interests of the Service were really regarded in all these questions. In all these cases, whatever was demanded by naval officers for the fitting of ships was supplied. With regard to the questions asked by the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. B. Samuelson), he hoped that that relating to Gibraltar would be considered when the Committee reached it. As to Malta, the sanitary regulations and the condition of the port were under the consideration of an Engineer officer who had been sent to the spot to inquire, and as soon as an opinion was transmitted to the Government as to what was necessary, the recommendation would be carried out. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) as to dockyard wages, it would be more convenient to discuss that question when they came to Vote 6.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE said, that when the plan of bringing cables to the capstans was adopted, the necessity for the swivels ceased. The size of the cable for ships was an important question. Generally speaking they were not sufficiently large. When he took command, a little more than 20 years ago, of a ship which from an 80 had been changed into a 90-gun ship, he found that the size of her cables had remained unaltered. On his remonstrating he was told that the size of the cables was calculated by the area of the midship section, and not by the weight of the ship. He made repeated representations on this subject, but his remonstrances were never answered. He, therefore, hoped that the authorities at the Admiralty would take into their consideration a matter on which the safety of our ships so much depended. With respect to the Devastation, and the propriety of sending her to sea in her present condition, it must be remembered that science was now giving way to experiment; and he therefore hoped that as the Devastation was to be subject to a regular trial at sea, no money would be asked for to build other Devastations till the result of the present experiment had become known.

Mr. HANBURY-TRACY believed that if the scheme of retirement which his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) brought forward in 1870, had been properly carried out, there would have been more retirements by this time, and that it would have tended to improve the service. His right hon. Friend then stated as a reason for bringing forward that scheme, that although officers in command of ships were very gallant, yet from want of constant employment they were not so efficient as could be desired. There was a very great feeling of irritation in the service, owing to so much more attention being paid to its matériel than to its personnel. In bringing forward the present Estimates, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty spoke for three hours on the matériel, and not more than a quarter of an hour on the personnel of the Navy. Before that general discussion closed, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would state that he had that whole matter under consideration; that he had a sympathy with the large number of officers who were half-starving on a mere pittance; and that for the good of the service and the interest of the country, a system would be adopted by which officers would be more constantly employed, and enabled to maintain their efficiency.

Mr. GOSCHEN asked the Committee to believe, that if all the points raised on that occasion had not been answered, it was because it would be impossible in Committee of Supply to get the money which had to be voted, if they were to deal at length with all the serious topics brought forward in the course of a general discussion. No greater injustice could be done to him than to suppose that he devoted less time to the personnel than to the matériel of the Service. Last year he devoted the greater part of his speech to the personnel of the Navy, and it was only towards the end that he was enabled to touch on the matériel. This year he had reversed this plan, and the simple reason, why so much of his speech, in introducing the Estimates, this year had been occupied with the matériel was because so many questions connected with the matériel happened to have been raised lately; but he could assure hon. Members that his sympathy with the personnel was not to be measured by the length of his remarks on the subject. With regard to what had been said by the hon. Member who had just sat down, the length of time captains were employed before they could be appointed to ships was one of the great difficulties of the Service, and the same thing applied to commanders. It was a matter of great importance, and it was to meet that difficulty that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) introduced his retirement scheme, but he could not see by what means his hon. Friend (Mr. Hanbury-Tracy) had expected that more retirements should have been brought about. The scheme was self-acting; and the only way in which the Admiralty could increase retirements would be by forcing men out of the Service by not giving them employment, there being a clause which said that, in that case, after a certain number of years they were to leave the service. As regarded captains, that was a system which had not been tried. Contrary to an opinion held out-of-doors, there had been no attempt on the part of the Admiralty to force officers to retire on account of their not being employed—so long, at all events, as there was plenty of work in them; and as regarded pecuniary inducements, his experience since he had been at the Admiralty was, that pecuniary inducements would not influence officers to retire. They clung to the service irrespective of the boons held out to them, because most officers would admit that the terms of retirement offered by his right hon. Friend were liberal; but he (Mr. Goschen) thought it so important that there should be a constant retirement, that if it was certain any change would induce a large number of officers to retire, that change would be carefully considered by the Admiralty. There were two means of causing retirement—the one compulsory, the other by pecuniary advantages. As to the former, he was not prepared to carry it further than his right hon. Friend had done. As to the latter, it depended on the officers themselves, and he saw no way in which the Admiralty could reduce the lists, if officers were not disposed to accept pecuniary inducements to leave the service. In reply to his hon. Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway), with respect to torpedo boats, he might observe that the subject had been carefully examined into, and that the Admiralty had already given orders to have an experiment made to see how far the invention of Mr. Thorneycroft, which had been referred to in a former debate by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda), and which had been tested, and had been found only applicable in the case of smooth water, could be applied to boats which would go at a good rate of speed in comparatively rough weather. He could also assure his hon. Friend that the Government were perfectly aware of all that was going on in the Italian Navy. We had an attaché who travelled about from Court to Court, and who reported not only on the Italian Navy, but on that of other countries also. In respect to the Devastation the Committee must feel that an immense responsibility was thrown upon the Admiralty by hon. Members who said that they would be guilty of manslaughter if they sent her across the Atlantic. They felt that they had a difficult problem to solve, but they were determined to persevere in their attempts to solve it. At the time of the American War, as the Committee was aware, ships which all sailors would have previously denounced had decided actions, and had had the greatest possible influence in bringing the war to a termination. And not only had the Monitors done that, but they had ridden down storms and generally behaved well at sea, although their sea-going qualities were not, probably, as good as those of other vessels. Were the Admiralty, then, to abandon a type of ship calculated to secure our supremacy at sea in time of war, on account of such criticisms and warnings as the Committee had heard that evening, when they had positive assurances from other quarters that no danger was to be apprehended? They were charged with having no vessel to cope with the Peter the Great in the Russian Navy; but that vessel was constructed on precisely the same principles as the Devastation. So long as ships of that class were required to maintain our supremacy, a certain number of risks would, of course, have to be run; but the experiments in the case of the Devastation would, he could assure the House, be conducted with the utmost caution.

LORD ELCHO said, he happened, during the Easter Recess, to be at Portsmouth, and had heard a suggestion made by Colonel Bowers, who commanded the 1st Lancashire Rifles, with respect to the trial of the Devastation, which seemed to meet with very general acceptance, for all the naval officers who heard it had declared that if the ship passed successfully through the experiment suggested, she would be capable of riding out any storm. The suggestion was, that as the Devastation generally had a nurse in the shape of another vessel, she should be sent to sea in rough weather, with a number of nurses, or other vessels who would be capable of taking on board the whole of her crew; that everything in the Devastation should be battened down, and that she should be left completely to herself to struggle against the wind and waves; and that the nurses should watch her movements closely through this experimental trip. If after all the Devastation should stand that test nobody could object to the outlay of the public money upon her, and he had no doubt that his hon. and gallant Friend near him would sanction the expenditure of much more money for the building of other Devastations.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he would recommend a Return, No. 321, to the attention of hon. Members, inasmuch as they would find from it that owing to the scheme of retirement to which he had already referred, a permanent dead weight had been thrown on the country, amounting to £186,104 a-year. He also wished to say, in reply to the Secretary for the Admiralty, that the Store Vote that year was the largest by the amount of £200,000 which had been proposed for the last 10 years, and yet the supply of yarn was not sufficient for the purposes of the effective ships of the Navy. As to the supply of coal, he was glad the Government had now the excellent advice of Sir Alexander Milne, for the accident which had occurred to the Lord Clyde could have scarcely happened to any ship which was not hampered in the use of her engines. Such was not his opinion only, but that of Lord Clarence Paget, who had commanded the Mediterranean Fleet.

MR. CHILDERS pointed out that although the Vote for Stores might be the largest for many years, there was all the difference in the world until quite lately between estimates and expenditure. The actual expenditure in 1867 and 1868 far exceeded the present Estimates, to say nothing of the great rise in prices. He should also be prepared to show at the right time that the cost of retirement was less than he had estimated.

MR. SCOURFIELD suggested that retired naval officers might be usefully employed in surveying rivers for the purpose of having the impediments to their free navigation removed.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £167,575, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the Coast Guard Service, Royal Naval Coast Volunteers, Royal Naval Reserve, and Seamen and Marine Pensioners Reserve, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874."

ADMIRAL ERSKINE, in moving to reduce the Vote by £14,540 5s. 6d., being the balance of the unappropriated surplus of the sum voted for the Royal Naval Reserve, said, that he had seen for some years past a sum of money employed for purposes to which Parliament had not voted it, nor had the Treasury sanctioned. When the Royal Naval Reserve was originally created, in 1859, it was intended to consist of 30,000 men, who were to receive retainers of £6 each. Since its institution, however, the fact was that the number of men that took their drill never exceeded 16,000, and the Vote was taken on the assumption of the former number. Moreover, from 1866 the number had gradually fallen, until for the present year the Force was expected to consist of only 10,000 men, while the sum asked for in the Estimates on account of the retainers to be paid to the men had been reduced from £96,000 to £76,000, a reduction entirely owing to the representations he had made on a former occasion. There remained in the hands of the Department, however, an unappropriated surplus of the sums voted amounting to over £17,000, and he now moved to reduce the amount of the Vote by the sum he had stated. He did so, for the reason that he could not reconcile the discrepancies, that while £76,000 was asked for retainers; a much less sum was asked for drill, pay, and lodging the men, and that while it was proposed to vote money for 13,000 men, they only expected to get 10,000. He had also to complain that the expense of registering these men had remained the same—namely, £4,000 a year, or 7s. a head—for several years, although there had been a considerable reduction in their number. He thought a less sum than £4,000 should be asked for registering. In conclusion, he must say he was surprised that the Government were unable to give the number of men enrolled at the different outposts. He should move that the Vote be reduced by the amount of which he had given Notice.

Sir John Hay

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £153,035, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the Coast Guard Service, Royal Naval Coast Volunteers, Royal Naval Reserve, and Seamen and Marine Pensioners Reserve, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874."—(Admiral Erskine.)

MR. GOSCHEN said, his hon. and gallant Friend did not propose to reduce the Force, but thought that by the experience of former years the Government were taking too much. It was always a wiser course to take too much than too little. On Vote 1 and on this Vote it was always the practice to take more than was needed, in order to provide for contingencies. The Vote would have been reduced this year if great changes had not been introduced into the Reserve, by which the Government expected that a considerable number of men would be added to it. Under these circumstances he hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would not press the Committee to divide. As to the item for registering, the sums paid the registrars were fixed fees and general expenses, regulated by the Board of Trade rather than the Admiralty; and having two schemes in existence—namely, the First and Second Class of Reserves, there would be rather more than the usual amount of labour and trouble put upon them.

MR. WHALLEY said, a great amount of anxiety prevailed at Liverpool, and also a desire to ascertain what were really the intentions of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the Royal Naval Volunteers. The speech which the right hon. Gentleman made some time since in the neighbourhood of Liverpool upon the subject, raised an amount of enthusiasm which the delay that had since taken place, it was feared, would cause to die out. He spoke the sentiments of the leading shipowners of Liverpool, who hesitated to respond to the right hon. Gentleman's invitation to form a Naval Volunteer Force, until the Government gave some evidence of their being in earnest in the matter. There was a growing feeling in Liverpool, that the invitation held out by the right hon. Gentleman was not responded to by the authorities, and unless something was done to remove the impression the enthusiasm created would speedily die out. He wished to know whether the Government intended to give to Naval Volunteers such facilities for drilling as they thought they were entitled to?

MR. BRASSEY said, he was connected with the London Naval Volunteers, and he was enabled to state from having been in communication with the Admiralty, that a practical scheme for carrying on the drill of the London Naval Volunteer Corps was under consideration by the Admiralty, and he believed that a Bill would be submitted to Parliament by the Admiralty on the subject. It was a matter that could not be decided off-hand. This was clear, however, those who joined the Force could not call upon the Government for assistance, as the essential feature of the movement was that it was voluntary. The 150 persons who had associated themselves for the purpose of naval drill in the port of London had shown the best spirit and deserved a hearty recognition.

MR. WHITWELL trusted that after the announcement made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, the hon. and gallant Admiral would not go to a Division. He would like to hear that a sufficient drill was performed by the men in the Coastguard Service to qualify them to join ships at once in case of necessity. He asked also whether a Return would be prepared, showing the saving of life which had been effected by the Coastguard in cases of wreck?

MR. GOSCHEN said, there would be no objection to produce such a Return, which would show results very creditable to the Coastguard men. His hon. Friend (Mr. Brassey) had really replied to the Question put by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whalley). The subject of Naval Volunteers had engaged a good deal of time at the Admiralty, but it involved so many points of detail with regard to the organization of the Force that it had been found impossible to proceed, at all events, with the rapidity which the gentlemen who had taken up the movement appeared to wish. At the same time, he trusted the Admiralty would be able to utilize the services of the Volunteers, and he hoped shortly to be able to propound a scheme for the approval of Parliament.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE said, he must take the sense of the Committee upon his Amendment.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he could only repeat that the present plan rendered it necessary that the Vote should be taken, in order to provide for the increased expenditure that would take place under it.

MR. R. W. DUFF hoped the hon. and gallant Admiral would not press his Amendment. It was desirable that there should be an efficient Naval Reserve.

MR. WHALLEY wished to know if the First Lord of the Admiralty was really giving his attention to the organization of Coast Volunteers?

MR. GOSCHEN said, that probably the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied, when he informed him that the day before yesterday he went through a great many proposals for the establishment of Coast Volunteers, and discussed them with some of his Colleagues. There was no disposition on the part of the Government to throw cold water on the movement, and he hoped shipowners would come forward and assist it all they could. In saying that, he thought leading shipowners of Liverpool did not appear to give it the support it deserved. In all probability, it would be necessary to introduce a Bill to carry out the scheme.

SIR JOHN HAY hoped the hon. and gallant Admiral would not divide the Committee. There could be no doubt that the Royal Naval Reserve ought to be better supported than it was.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE said, under the circumstances, he would alter his mind, and would not trouble the Committee to divide.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(4.) £86,654, Scientific Departments.

MR. A. GUEST asked whether the post of medical attendant to Greenwich Hospital ought not to be reserved as a shore berth for some Navy surgeon, instead of being given to a civilian? Great dissatisfaction was felt, in consequence, by medical men in the Navy.

MR. B. SAMUELSON looked forward with hope to the more scientific education which would be within the reach of the naval officers at Greenwich Hospital. He thought nothing was likely to be of greater service to the Naval profession than the New College. If the commanders of our ships were acquainted, for instance, with the theory of the steam engine they would be able to control the reports of their engineers on the subject of economy in the use of coal. He objected, however, to rudimentary scientific instruction being given there. The officers ought to prepare themselves at the School of Mines or elsewhere, before being admitted to the Naval College. He hoped the subject would be considered.

MR. STONE said, the Committee would like to know how far Naval officers had shown a disposition to avail themselves of the advantages offered to them in the New College. He hoped that provision would be made for affording practical as well as theoretical instruction in the New Royal Naval College.

MR. WHALLEY said, it was of more importance for young men, to whom the honour and safety of the country might be some day entrusted, to learn the more practical qualities which would produce courage and promptitude, than to follow the present hard, scientific system, which was emasculating those higher and manly qualities which had hitherto characterized our naval officers, and upon which our naval renown was founded.

DR. BREWER said, there was one subject greatly neglected in both of the Services—namely, dental surgery in its higher branches; the neglect of this was the greatest cause of the disqualification which existed in the Services.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he would communicate with the Medical Director General, on the point raised by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Colchester (Dr. Brewer). With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. A. Guest), the appointment of a naval surgeon depended on the extent of the duties to be performed. At present they did not seem to warrant any alteration in the present arrangement. The fee of the gentleman who attended Greenwich Schools had not been included in the Estimate in consequence of an oversight, which should not occur again. A great number of the members of the College went there voluntarily, and he was not prepared to recommend the appointment of a medical man who should exercise any control over them, because in the event of their being taken ill, they might be attended by doctors of their own selection. He would lay on the Table the Minute of the Admiralty, with regard to the general scope of the Royal Naval College, but he wished to say now that hon. Members must dismiss from their minds the idea that it was an establishment for cadets and midshipmen. Sub-lieutenants went there who had already been four years at sea—those officers who had already acquired the qualities which the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) so much desired; but it was hoped that the great future of the College would arise from the attendance of half-pay officers, who desired to pursue the studies for which opportunities would be offered. There was every inclination on the part of officers to avail themselves of these advantages. Twenty-four half-pay officers were now studying there, and the number would doubtless be much larger when the College came into full operation on the 1st of October. Young engineers and dockyard apprentices, would also be selected to go to Greenwich, in order to learn naval architecture and marine engineering, and the other subjects which had been taught with such great success at South Kensington. The organization of the whole establishment was likely to be organized under Admiral Cooper Key in a most satisfactory manner.

SIR JOHN HAY agreed with the right hon. Gentleman, that the process of organization under Admiral Cooper Key was likely to prove extremely satisfactory. But he could not concur in what the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) had said as to the study of scientific subjects connected with the Navy being enervating. It was very desirable that the Navy should continue to have, what it always had possessed, officers skilled in the highest branches of science. There was no other profession which possessed in its ranks men of higher scientific attainments, or more capable of performing the duties which the country entrusted to them. With respect to the Naval College at Greenwich, he would venture to point out that it was for many reasons desirable that Admiral Key, who was at its head, should have the power and authority of a naval officer, as well as that authority which he already possessed as an officer of the highest scientific attainments, and that he should be allowed to hoist his flag, and appear in uniform. He should also like to see the naval officers assembled at Greenwich allowed the benefit of the attendance of a naval medical officer.

MR. A. GUEST also urged the expediency of appointing a naval medical officer at Greenwich. He could attend both the College and the Boys' School at Greenwich.

MR. B. SAMUELSON explained, that he did not mean to say that naval officers did not avail themselves fully of the facilities offered them for scientific instruction, but the fact of the establishment of this College proved these opportunities had not hitherto been sufficient. He should like to know, whether a library would not be established there.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the question of a library and the appointment of a naval medical officer had been considered, but that it had not been deemed expedient to incur expenses which did not appear to be absolutely necessary for the efficient working of the College. In the case of the medical officer, however, when the College was full it might be found desirable to make such an appointment.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that the pensioners were the proprietors of Greenwich Hospital, and that the Government had no right to deal with it without their consent. He complained that the Admiralty were neglecting the survey duties of the Navy, and thought that a special survey service should be established. The survey of India was unfinished, and, notwithstanding what had fallen from the First Lord of the Admiralty on a former occasion, that of the Straits of Magellan was very incomplete. He had also to complain of the miserable accommodation which was provided for Admiral Richards, the Hydrographer of the Navy at the Admiralty, that gallant officer being located in a room which was not fit to be the office of the engineer of a bubble company.

MR. STANLEY also urged the expediency of having naval rank conferred on Admiral Cooper Key.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he personally had no objection to place Admiral Key on the footing desired, but that the question of allowing him to hoist his flag at Greenwich was a service question involving a point of naval etiquette; and the naval authorities, by whom he should be almost entirely guided in the matter, were of opinion that the privilege could not be well granted to Admiral Key. As to the proprietorship of Greenwich College, he could assure the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth that the Act of Parliament distinctly provided that Greenwich Hospital might be used for any other purpose deemed necessary. He might add that all the structural alterations which had been made in the edifice, had been done so that in case of war, it could within the short space of 24 hours be restored to its original condition—of an hospital; and that none of the Greenwich Hospital funds were used; they were left at the disposal of the pensioners. It would be very inconvenient that the Hydrographer should be removed from the Admiralty, where he was in constant communication with the Board; but he hoped better accommodation would be provided for him when the new buildings connected with the Admiralty were completed. The first survey which the gallant officer proposed to undertake was that of the East Coast of Africa.

In reply to Lord HENRY LENNOX,

MR. GOSCHEN said, it was estimated that the Challenger would be engaged for three years in deep-sea dredging, in connection with a number of scientific problems in which the Royal Society took great interest.

In reply to Sir JOHN HAY,

MR. GOSCHEN stated that, in addition to the Government being in communication with the Representatives of Foreign Governments, Professor Airy was in communication with the astronomers of other countries, in order to obtain foreign co-operation in watching the transit of Venus.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,115,080, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of the Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874."

MR. RYLANDS, in moving the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £50,000, said, that he wished it to be understood that he raised no objection to the advance in the rate of wages paid in the dockyards. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had told them that the wages of the "hired labourers" had been raised 3*d.* a-day, and the "established workmen" 6*d.* per day, making the wages of the former 16*s.* 6*d.* per week, and of the latter class, 30*s.* per week. In the present state of the labour market, he (Mr. Rylands) considered that the Government were justified in paying this advance—in fact, they were no doubt compelled to do so, even in the case of the "established workmen." The right hon. Gentleman further stated that the "established workmen" had entered into life contracts at a fixed rate of wages with a pension at the end of their service, and had there been any general reduction of wages, these "life contracts" would have been fairly pleaded by the men as a reason for maintaining their wages; but they were practically ineffectual in preventing an advance under the present exceptional state of the labour market. He did not complain of that, but he thought the arrangement with this class of men a very questionable one. It was said, that in view of pensions they accepted lower wages, and that was no doubt the case; but in many instances the expectation was a delusion, as numbers of the men through death or other circumstances never received a pension, nor was there any real advantage on the part of the country, as the pension list amounted to 25 per cent upon the sum paid for wages. There was also the question as to the amount of work received for the money. If the wages were low, the work was low also; and there was sufficient evidence in Blue Books in the Library to prove that the established workmen scarcely did half as much work as the men employed in private shipbuilding yards. He believed that the wisest plan would be to carry on the national dockyards in a business-like manner; to engage workmen upon ordinary terms, and to pay them the full value of their labour, without any agreement for pensions. The present system was disadvantageous to all parties, and certainly entailed a serious loss upon the country. The hon. Gentleman the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck) said the other night that we ought to keep our dockyard men, to the full number, building all the vessels we needed, and that the dockyards should be so kept up as "to meet not only all the requirements of the day, but of any emergency." We were, in fact, never to buy any ships from the private dockyards. But a few years ago the hon. Gentleman stated that "He had asked many of the most eminent owners of private yards in the country the question—supposing you were to carry on your yards upon the system on which Her Majesty's Dockyards are conducted, what would be the result? And the invariable answer had been, if we were to approach that system with the Bank of England at our back, we should be ruined in six months."

Well, that he thought was a conclusive argument against extending our dockyard system. His complaint was that the right hon. Gentleman was extending the system, and was so far reversing the policy of his predecessor. The right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord (Mr. Childers) had laid down a standard in 1870, under which he arranged that the maximum number of men employed in the dockyards should be 11,000, and that at least one fourth of the tonnage required for the Navy should be purchased from private shipbuilders. Unfortunately, the absurd panic at the end of 1870, on the occasion of the Franco-German War, induced the Government to alter their policy of economy by unnecessarily increasing the dockyard expenditure. Last year, he (Mr. Rylands) strongly objected to the increased expenditure, and he was assured by the right hon. Gentleman, that the increase in the number of men was only a temporary and exceptional circumstance dating from the panic of 1870, and that in a few months time the number would be reduced to the maximum fixed by the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers.) Now, what was the fact? In 1870-71, the number employed was 11,276, which was slightly in excess of the maximum; but this year the number on the Establishment and the hired men together amounted to 13,500, or 2,500 beyond the maximum fixed by the right hon. Member for Pontefract. But the most singular circumstance was, that while, according to the Returns on the Table, the 11,276 men in 1870-71 were expected to produce 15,272 tons of shipping, the 13,500 men were only expected to produce 13,781 tons. [Mr. SAMUDA said, the 11,276 men did not produce the amount named.] He believed they did not, but First Lords were constantly wide of the mark, and misled the House by their erroneous estimates. The right hon. Gentleman, at all events, did not expect to build this year more than 13,781 tons, and he proposed to employ not less than 8,697 men upon repairs and yard work. That was the explanation. But if our ships were in such a bad state of repair as to require such an enormous expenditure to make them ready for going to sea, it was an alarming state of things. His great objection to having so many men in the yards was that we must find them work whether it was wanted or not. The right hon. Gentleman had evidently that in his mind when he was stating his programme for the year. He said—"We shall have the Superb and the Téméraire building at Chatham, and the Fury and the new Fury building at Pembroke. With these vessels those two dockyards would be fairly full." And he mentioned that Portsmouth would be supplied with work in building another iron-clad of a description not yet decided upon. There were two very serious objections to pressing forward work at the dockyards at the present moment. One was the very high prices of all kinds of material, and the other was the great uncertainty as to the best type of fighting ship of the future. The right hon. Gentleman admitted, in his speech on moving the Navy Estimates this year, the great advantage which had been secured by delays in constructing ships during the past two years. He said—

"It had been urged that the Admiralty had wasted two years' time. . . . but it would be difficult to tell what ships we should have ordered. Certainly not such good ships as we should be able to order now, with all the knowledge and experience we had gained."—[3 Hansard, ccxv. 45.]

The same motives for delay existed at the present moment. Eminent authorities in that House differed entirely as to the best ship to be built, and there was an equal divergence of opinion amongst authorities elsewhere. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of three schools of naval architecture—namely, the advocates of masted turret ships, the advocates of unmasted turret ships, and the advocates of broadside iron-clads. And then he added a fourth school, of those who were against building iron-clads at all. Upon that point, hon. Gentlemen were no doubt familiar with the extremely important evidence given before the Committee on Designs of Ships of War. It was a very grave question whether vessels could be protected with armour plates sufficient to resist the guns which were now being manufactured. Sir Joseph Whitworth, and Sir William Armstrong both stated that they could produce guns that would penetrate iron armour plates 20 inches thick. If that were so, many of our best ships would become obsolete. Then again, there was the question of the torpedo—an entirely new force which threatened the security of the most powerful iron vessels, and which, in its development, might have an important bearing upon the best mode of constructing our ships of war. With all these facts staring us in the face, it seemed to him to be a most unwise policy to press forward the building of new ships. Let hon. Members recollect that the hasty and ill-considered additions made to the Navy during the past few years had involved a scandalous waste of millions of the public money. It was to be hoped that the remarkable statement of the right hon. Gentleman would not be forgotten—that during the last 10 years no less than 225 ships, amounting to a tonnage of 215,000 tons, had been struck off the effective strength of the Navy, or to use the expressive words of the right hon. Gentleman, "had vanished." A dozen years ago, the Admiralty precipitately constructed a number of iron vessels at a cost of several millions, which were, considered at the time to be an invincible Navy. They were armed with 4½ inch plates, and in these days, they might almost as well be protected with brown paper. Of course they had all disappeared from The Navy List—they had "vanished," and the millions which they cost out of the public taxes had "vanished" also. The other day, when he urged similar grounds to these as a reason why the Government should pause in the building of vessels of war, the hon. Member for Pembrokehire (Mr. Scourfield) replied that—"It was impossible to delay building ships until a time of war. It would be ridiculous to ask an enemy to delay his invasion until we had a sufficient number of ships to receive him."

That was, no doubt, all very true, and would be very forcible if we had no ships of war at present. He (Mr. Rylands) did not believe in the probability of any invasion, but if there were an invasion, he was quite satisfied that our Navy was sufficient to give a good account of the invaders. The right hon. Gentleman, the First Lord of the Admiralty, had admitted that our Navy was equal to the Navies of France, Germany, and the United States combined. We had 23 ironclads, whilst France, Germany, and the United States had only 11, and we had 91 frigates and other ships of war against their 95.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, that the numbers he had given were of the vessels in Commission, and did not include the entire Navy of the several countries.

Mr. RYLANDS said, that was no doubt so, but the comparison was not the less correct. The right hon. Gentleman also expressly stated that—

"We had 12 ships which were so strong that all the other maritime countries together could not name 12 ships of equal strength."—[3 Hansard, ccxv. 44.]

There was therefore every reason why we should proceed with calmness and with caution. If we kept down the Dockyard Vote, it would enable us to complete the ships at present in progress, and to pause before commencing the construction of new vessels. If war were unfortunately to break out, and some unforeseen emergency arose, it must not be supposed that the strength of the country for naval warfare depended upon the Government dockyards. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had well stated the other night, that this country had enormous resources in the way of ship-building, no less than 391,000 tons having been added to our mercantile navy in 1871, as compared with 212,000 tons in 1861, and his hon. Friend further stated that "were it necessary to renew our fleet, in a short time our private shipyards could do so." Under these circumstances he (Mr. Rylands) had no hesitation in asking the Committee to support his Motion to reduce the vote by £50,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,065,080, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of the Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874."—(Mr. Rylands.)

Mr. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, he had no doubt that the Admiralty would get a proper amount of work from those whom they employed in the dockyards. He thought the best work was that turned out of dockyards, which he attributed to the large amount of superintendence which prevailed, and which rendered it almost impossible that a piece of bad work could be slipped in. In the Devonport dockyard, and in some other dockyards, he was informed an increase of pay was given in proportion to the length of service, but in Chatham dockyard a very different system prevailed; because in that dockyard, it was in the power of the Petty officers to give an increase of pay entirely at their own caprice, and without any reason assigned. That was a system which could hardly be expected to work well. To such a height had dissatisfaction gone, that in spite of the rules and of the risk which the men ran, he had received several letters from them, mentioning instances in which the pay had been distributed unfairly. He hoped the Admiralty would look into the matter, as it was of the greatest importance to the well-working of the dockyards.

Mr. SCOURFIELD said, the duty of the Government was to select the best existing gun, and not to wait for the development of an imaginary superior.

Mr. Rylands

As to reducing the work in the dockyards, trusting to what had been called "the open market," he was afraid that without the dockyards, the open market would become very close indeed in case of war. The remedy for that would be keeping open both the public and the private dockyards.

Mr. B. SAMUELSON asked, what was the actual damage done to the turret of the Glatton when fired at? The House had been told that the damage done to the turret was but slight, yet the vessel had only just come out of dock after being under repair for nearly 11 months.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that although he proposed to move a slight reduction of the Vote, he could not accede to the Motion of the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands), who, in his opinion, misapprehended the whole case of the dockyards as they now existed. The hon. Member was evidently only just beginning his apprenticeship in a knowledge of naval affairs. He (Lord Henry Lennox) had also once been under the impression that there was a waste of power in the dockyards; but he now said, as he had often explained to the House, that repairs governed the strength of the fleet—that was, if the Channel Fleet were compelled to put into Portsmouth for repairs, the artificers must be taken altogether from building and must be employed upon repairs. What he complained of the right hon. Gentleman was that he placed too high the amount of shipping which he expected to have built within the year, for in the last two years this estimated amount had not been reached by 8,000 tons. As to the type of ship, he did not believe that in our day we could expect to produce a perfect type of ship to fulfil all the duties which a vessel of war was called upon to perform. If every Government in Europe would agree to stay their hands till a perfect type could be produced, we might safely do nothing; but the difficulty was that foreign countries would keep building. Where, then, should we be if the advice of the hon. Member were taken? He cordially approved of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty in keeping up the number of men employed in the dockyards, and he should, therefore, vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Warrington. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would not lose sight of the suggestion given him by the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Wykeham-Martin), that the existing system of classification should be well considered in reference to the distribution of the increased pay of the men employed in dockyards.

Mr. SAMUDA said, he also could not vote for the reduction of the Vote, for he agreed in the principal cause that had led to its increase—the rise of wages. He would remind the Committee that the increase in the rate of wages in the dockyards was not at all equal to the advance that had taken place in all other classes of labour. It should also be remembered that by keeping a command over the number of men on the establishment the Government was able to fix and regulate the amount of work they wished to have done, and also insure a fixed rate of wages instead of a fluctuating one. The men knew they would have constant work, and a provision for old age, and they were therefore willing to work for a lower rate than they would accept outside the Government employ. The hon. Member (Mr. Rylands) talked of 11,000 men in 1870-71 building 15,000 tons of shipping, whilst this year 13,000 men were only to produce 13,000 tons; but he forgot that in the former period, the Estimate was not fulfilled, and, instead of 15,000 tons, the amount of work actually done was some 4,000 tons less than that anticipated. He should like to see a less number of men employed upon repairing as compared with those engaged in building. He regretted that upwards of 20,000 tons of shipping had to be struck off from the Navy every year from becoming obsolete or otherwise useless; but the country could not allow the Navy to go back, and the worst possible policy would be that suggested by the hon. Member—to stop building, and wait for improvements in the class of ships required, imagining that by so doing he would avoid spending money in building imperfect ships. The proverb that the best was always the greatest enemy to the good was strictly applicable in such a case; and it was absolutely necessary that we should keep up our Navy, so as to be ready for any emergency that might arise, because we could not go into the market and buy war-ships as other things could be bought when wanted. We should, at least, keep pace with foreign nations, and always have regard to the fact that the cost of the Navy was the premium of insurance we paid for our national security.

SIR JOHN HAY thought that the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) had failed to persuade the Committee, that it would be desirable to make the reduction on the grounds that he had pointed out. If these men were not to be constantly employed, strikes and other obstacles might arise when sudden emergencies arose for the execution of important works, and the object of the Government keeping the dockyards at all would be entirely defeated. One of the first changes made by the present Government was to reverse the proportion of men employed in building and repairing, but he was glad to see that a more just proportion had now been restored. In 1869-70 there were estimated 5,899 building and 8,168 repairing. This was altered in 1870-71 to 6,349 building and 4,793 repairing. This year we had nearly reverted to the old proportion, 4,700 building and 8,697 repairing being the number proposed. Considering that the work done in 1871-2 fell short of the Estimate by 1,354 tons, and in last year by 6,768 tons, it was not surprising that the expenditure contemplated in the Estimate had not been exceeded.

MR. STONE thanked the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty for the patience with which he had listened to the complaints of the men, the disposition he had shown to investigate their cases fairly, and the degree of liberality he had extended to them. He doubted whether the "life contract" on which the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) had dwelt, was so advantageous to the men as he supposed, and he believed that had they been left without any prospect of advance, with wages outside much higher, the Admiralty would no longer have had the pick of the best workmen; while the building of ships of war was so peculiar, that it would not be safe to depend on men trained in private yards. He demurred to the present being deemed a final arrangement, for under similar circumstances, and whenever hardships arose, the door should be still open. He complained that painters, riggers, and sail-makers were not treated with sufficient liberality in Portsmouth dockyard. The painters had recently received an advance of wages; but it was not equal to the extra pay they had formerly received for painting the Royal yachts, which occupied a considerable portion of the year. Under the old wages, and with that extra, the annual income of a painter was £64; with the recent advance and without the extra for the Royal yachts, which had been abolished, it was only £62. The sailmakers received from 2s. to 3s. a-day, as against 4s. outside the dockyard, and the riggers equally grumbled at the inequality and insufficiency of their wages.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he must remind his hon. Friend the Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) that he had quoted an observation of his which was applied to a totally different subject. When he had said in reference to the Admiralty dockyards, that if private yards were conducted on the same principle the proprietors would very soon be ruined, he never intended it as an argument in favour of reduction. The work done in the Government dockyards contrasted favourably, he thought, with the work done in private yards, and he attributed that fact to the keeping a large number of men constantly employed. He should like to ask the hon. Gentleman what would be the condition of this great commercial country in the event of a war breaking out. We had no ships capable of protecting our commercial marine. What ships we had would be swept off the ocean, and our carrying trade would be abolished.

MR. GOLDSMID said, that considerable injustice seemed to have been done to the young men who had been apprenticed in the naval yards. Why had they not been promoted to vacancies, as they occurred, according to promise?

MR. R. W. DUFF was glad that no Member of the Committee had risen in support of the Amendment. If the dockyards were done away with, where would our ships go for repairs after a naval battle? Would some go into the Thames, some into the Humber, and others into the Tyne? He thought the 100 tons of torpedo vessels which it was proposed to build this year, and the £7,000 which it was proposed to spend in torpedoes was much too small, for he looked upon torpedoes as one of the most important modern inventions in naval warfare. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would state whether torpedoes were to be managed by naval men, or officers of the Royal Engineers?

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he had not the advantage of hearing the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands), and never listened to him when he could help it. With regard to the increased pay in the dockyards, the men were, no doubt, very glad of it; but the increase was very inadequate, and did not bring the rate up to the standard of pay in private yards. There were very many petty exceptions which it would have been better for the Admiralty not to have made. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he would continue to agitate this question until the pay of the dockyard labourers was made adequate, though he did not mean that they should be brought up to the rates in private yards.

MR. GOSCHEN said, it was never intended to bring up the pay of the men in the dockyards, to that of the men in the private yards; because the former had exceptional advantages, one of which was employment all the year round. As to differences between different men, the Admiralty had been animated by a desire to do justice to all, and it was only to be expected that some should feel aggrieved, because it was almost impossible to meet the expectations of all. It was never professed that there was to be a general advance all through the yards. Every shipwright, high or low, had an increase. [MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN: I wish it were so.] There might be special cases in which it was not; but discretion had been left to local officers who, as the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey) had often urged, ought to be invested with some authority to discriminate. No doubt, an hon. Member who was open to receive complaints, would have many letters addressed to him on the subject. However, if there were instances of injustice established to the satisfaction of the Admiralty, they should be strictly inquired into, and a local officer guilty of favouritism or the reverse should be called to account. Referring to the point which had been raised about apprentices, the principle which the Admiralty acted upon, was to select the best from among them, and promote them to the higher establishment; and as to the general question raised by the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands), it was unnecessary to say much, as the Committee did not take the view that the Vote should be reduced. There was plenty of work to be done, and the reason more money was asked for was that more might be given to repairs. To avoid the errors in Estimates which had been made on both sides of the House on former occasions, the Admiralty had placed themselves in communication with the authorities in the dockyards, and had gone over ship by ship, making a list of such as ought to be repaired, and consulting with the dockyard officers as to the number of men required. The result had been embodied in a more accurate programme than had ever been placed before the House; and it had been thought necessary to take the men, because it had been deemed requisite that the work should be done. It was not candid of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Henry Lennox), to speak of their falling short by 8,000 tons, because that had been already explained to be the accumulated errors of three or four years in the estimate of work done on ships, which it was difficult to determine precisely. The repairs to the Glatton had not been more extensive or more serious than had been anticipated. There had been some delay in providing new armour plates, but the work had not been specially hurried on. There had been no more mischief done to the ship than was expected in the first instance. Considerable preparations had been made for the manufacture of torpedoes, although the money spent had not been so large as might have been expected. There were a large quantity on hand, and arrangements were being made in the Channel and Reserve ships to fit them with torpedo rooms for the training of officers and men. Hitherto instruction had been carried on by dummies which were tied to the ships, the torpedoes being kept in reserve. A small and fast torpedo ship was being built, which it was expected would be better adapted for working torpedoes, though of course the Whitehead torpedo could be successfully used from other ships. Arrangements were being made to divide the duty of laying down torpedoes between the Army and the Navy, and there would be a Joint Committee of gentlemen from the War Office and the Admiralty to carry them out on the general principle of leaving defensive torpedoes to the Army and sea-going and offensive torpedoes to the Navy.

Mr. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, he wished to explain that, so far as he knew, the men who had brought this grievance under his notice were in the receipt of the increased pay; but their object was to show the universal discontent that prevailed amongst the other men, under the impression that a gigantic system of favouritism was growing up in the dockyards.

Mr. RYLANDS said, he was not surprised at the result of the discussion; and, under the circumstances, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

LORD HENRY LENNOX, who had given Notice of his intention to move to reduce Vote 6 by the sum necessary for the commencement of the new mastless turret-ship of the Fury type, said, it was with some reluctance and great difficulty he had brought forward his Amendment, because his object was not to diminish the sum to be devoted to our iron-clad Fleet, but he was anxious that the money proposed to be spent on that new mastless turret-ship should rather be applied to the building of a fully-rigged cruising iron-clad. It was now four and a-half years since a full-rigged cruiser had been laid down, a fact which implied the consideration of the question as to what was the general condition of our iron-clad Navy, both with regard to the number and nature of the vessels, and their repairs. Last year, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty came down to the House and earned his (Lord Henry Lennox's) approbation, and that of his right hon. Friend the late Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry), by stating he was convinced of the necessity of laying down and adding to the Navy two large broadside iron-clad ships—the Superb and the Téméraire. Months elapsed without any sign of the Superb or the Téméraire being even commenced; and in the autumn, in consequence of some letters which the right hon. Gentleman described as “scolding letters,” but which he thought were only dictated by a patriotic sense of duty on the part of those who looked into those questions, it appeared that the reason why one of those vessels, the Téméraire, was not commenced as a broadside ship was because the Admiralty were going to make it a mastless iron-clad. Such a change in the Naval programme ought never to be made without being submitted to the sanction of the House. The other night the right hon. Gentleman said, the Admiralty proposed to go on with a broadside iron-clad and with the new Fury; and that was all the work in new iron-clads to be done this year. [Mr. GOSCHEN: And one at Portsmouth.] He (Lord Henry Lennox) did not understand so. Then that would make four. Two, however, ought to have been begun and advanced to a considerable extent last year, and virtually the programme for this year was one ship at Portsmouth, to be advanced at the rate of 500 tons, and the new Fury at Pembroke, to be advanced at the rate of 654 tons. He wished to ask whether it was correct that the only iron-clad tonnage to be added to the Navy this year was that which was represented in the dockyards, and which amounted to a total of only 7,600 tons. If so, that was below the average which the right hon. Member for Pontefract, when First Lord of the Admiralty, declared to be right for this country to build, for in 1870 that right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) said they ought at least to add 12,000 tons of iron-clad tonnage annually to the Navy; but, according to the Estimates now before them, they were this year to add, instead of 12,000, only 7,600 tons, even if their programme was fulfilled. That being so, he asked for an explanation why £211,411 was asked for on account of iron armour-plated ships? [Mr. GOSCHEN explained it was a misprint, and was an aggregate liability.] However that might be, he (Lord Henry Lennox) had been put to much time and trouble in endeavouring to trace the amount. Another fact had greatly influenced him in asking the Committee to reject the Vote for that mastless turret-ship of the Fury type, with a view to spending the money upon another fully-rigged iron-clad. In 1872-3, 10 iron-clads were down for repair. Of that number, four re-appeared this year; therefore it was clear they had not been repaired. One was repaired, and, he believed in commission.

Mr. Goschen

But there remained five other iron-clads about which he thought the Committee would like to hear something, and those were wooden iron-clads. In speaking of the Prince Consort, one of the five, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty said last year that her condition was not serious in the sense of being dangerous; but the cost of removing the partially-decayed timber would be so heavy that it was very doubtful whether it would be worth while to do it. If they were to be told that these wooden iron-clads were to be stop-gaps no longer, but that they had served their time, and were not to be counted as effective for the future, some steps ought to be taken to make up for the deficiency which their removal from the service would cause. The reason, therefore, he wished to have the Fury changed into a broadside-ship was that in cruising broadside-ships of that class we were excessively weak, while we were quite strong enough in ships of the Devastation type, which were avowedly experimental. The Admiralty ought to stay their hands in reference to that type until the trials of the Devastation were completed, and ought not to lay out £380,000 or £400,000 upon a sister ship to the Fury. The noble Lord concluded by moving that the Vote be reduced by £15,150, and said he hoped it would be clearly understood that he did not wish to prevent the laying down of another iron-clad, but to induce the Admiralty to change the design of the ship they contemplated.

Motion made and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,100,080, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of the Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874."—(Lord Henry Lennox.)

MR. GOSCHEN said, he did not see how another ship could be substituted for the new Fury that year, and if the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox) were carried, its effect would be to prevent the commencement of a new iron-clad for upwards of a year. It was not proposed, moreover, to produce an exact copy of the Fury or Devastation, but that the ship intended to be built should answer the description given by Sir Spencer Robinson—that was to say, that it should carry the heaviest possible guns, with the thickest possible armour; that it should be of the same size as the Fury, of the same coal-carrying capacity, of the same speed, but that it should be a modification of the Fury. The Admiralty hoped also to be able to place in the new ship guns very much larger than the guns in the Devastation, for there had lately been a great advance in the science of producing big guns, and by some new hydraulic arrangements which had been produced by Sir William Armstrong's firm it was possible to mount guns of 50 to 60 tons each in vessels no larger than the Fury. In view of that arrangement, a re-distribution of the armour would have to be made, as ordinary armour would not be capable of resisting the tremendous power of such ordnance. Under these circumstances, he thought the noble Lord would not wish the Committee to take a course which would prevent the Admiralty from taking any steps which would enable us to remain ahead of other countries in this matter, for the Amendment he had proposed would prevent the Admiralty from proceeding with the building of a class of ships which they thought we required.

MR. SAMUDA said, the discussion of the Amendment involved nothing less than the shipbuilding policy of the Admiralty; whether the Devastation would be the ship of the future, and whether the Government were justified in building several vessels of similar type without further reconsidering the matter. In 1860, we determined to cover our ships with armour—and made the armour more than equal to the guns, and our policy was intelligible, but the power of the gun had now so completely overtaken the power of defence, that the conditions of naval construction were entirely changed, and it had become impossible to make armour thick enough to resist the gun; in addition, other circumstances had to be taken into consideration which had no existence before, and the whole matter had to be re-considered. In his opinion, therefore, we should now give up all attempts to keep out solid shot; we should only have armour thick enough to keep out shell, and rely mainly on the improved power of offence as being of equal or greater importance than those of passive resistance; not only was this powerful armament now available, but so also was the use of the torpedo, and the question took this form, should not the principal feature in new ships be so to utilize these new tremendous powers of offence that passive resistance might to a great extent be disregarded—and this led to the conclusion that the time had arrived at once to decrease considerably the thickness of armour. Now, if we confined ourselves to keeping out shell, only 5 inches of armour would be sufficient, and with this reduced thickness in the hull, he would abandon it altogether round the guns. This would enable a vessel to be constructed, of only about 4,500 tons burden, to go 16 knots, and to carry eight 35-ton guns instead of four only, while by adopting the corvette system, with falling bulwarks, he would obtain the power of concentrating the whole fire on either broadside, and of bringing six out of the eight guns into use if chasing or being chased. A light rig should be adopted sufficient to navigate the vessel when necessary, and a most important addition to the armament should be four torpedo steam launches carried in the davits, capable of steaming 16 knots, or of towing a torpedo 13 knots. He would ask what class of vessel could cope with this—certainly not a Devastation, for with such a vessel as here suggested, her speed would enable her to choose her position, while her guns would be more powerful and effective than any hitherto adopted or even suggested—and while keeping her enemy at any distance she chose, by lowering her torpedo boats under the smoke of her guns, she could harass, disable, and destroy any adversary. We ought not then to go on multiplying ships of the present type, with thick armour, which, after all, was useless against the heavy guns which were now made. But he would not ask the Government to lay aside all their present plans and adopt at once and without due consideration, so great a change, and he was not prepared to abandon the programme they had presented to the House. It was of far less moment to the country to build a ship too much than one too little. The Devastation was a formidable ship, and would be safe at sea; notwithstanding, in his view, she was not the ship of the future. He would suggest that the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox) should not divide the Committee, but leave it to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty to see whether he could not apply the sum in question to completing more quickly a ship of similar type.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that the promise of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Admiralty was not satisfactory. His noble Friend did not wish to prevent a ship being built, but he declined to commit the country to another ship of the Devastation type before the Devastation had been tried, seeing that there were already two others in process of construction. No doubt the Devastation, properly handled, would be safe near the coast, but he objected to proceeding with another mastless ironclad until the new Fury was completed. He pressed for some information as to the repair of ironclads. Nine had been put down for repairs without being repaired, and it was important to know how many of these were really on the effective list.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE protested against the Devastation being described as a "mastless" ship. Her mainmast was 96 feet high, which was at least the height of the mainmast of the Monarch, one of the highest in the British Navy. If the experiments made were to be trusted, he would take a more favourable view of the stability and buoyancy of the Devastation than even her constructors or admirers, for they seemed to entertain apprehensions as to her power of carrying canvas. It was of the greatest importance that she should be able to carry canvas as a means of increasing her speed and economizing coal, for she could not carry enough coal to take her across the Atlantic and back.

MR. STANLEY asked the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty to give them some fuller particulars with regard to the ship which they were asked to build. If the type of the ship were to be altered, it should be with the full concurrence of the House.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that information would be given to the House before the ship was begun. It should be given at once, but that he was anxious to have the design completed before committing himself to details, or else he should lose nine months. The ship, however, would not be of the Devastation type in the shape of her bow and her stern. The authorities in the Construction Department were considering whether it would be possible to utilize the mast of the Devastation, so as to allow her to carry a certain amount of canvas under jury rig. As regarded the Devastation, she could not carry sails without impeding the bow fire, and that he was most anxious to preserve. These sails might prove serviceable, not in ordinary times, but on an emergency. He did not wish to be in such a position that it might be said next year that foreign Powers had already gained upon us, and had got a better and a stronger kind of ship than we possessed. Therefore, he hoped the Committee would grant the money, no portion of which should be spent until he had stated to the House the exact type of vessel which it would represent. With regard to the wooden ironclads, the Admiralty did not propose to spend any such sums as £60,000 or £70,000 in order to make them as good as new. The thinness of their armour would not justify so large an expenditure; but, nevertheless, they were capable of rendering good service in time of war, and the Admiralty were now considering the amount of money which should be expended on them.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN suggested to his noble Friend that after the explanation which had been given by the First Lord of the Admiralty, he should not for the present take a division on his Motion.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, as the object which he had in view had been gained, he would yield to the suggestion and withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.) £70,935, Victualling Yards at Home and Abroad.

(7.) £62,214, Medical Establishments at Home and Abroad.

(8.) £18,683, Marine Divisions.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow;
Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

CONVEYANCING (SCOTLAND) BILL.

[BILL 108.]

(Mr. Secretary Bruce, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Winterbotham)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 12th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Renewal of investiture abolished.)

MR. GORDON moved, after "superior," to insert—

"And it shall not be competent for the superior in any case to insist upon such person taking out any charter, precept, or other writ by progress."

The hon. and learned Member said, he had also prepared Provisos relating to infestment, and confirmation, and other points which he would afterwards move.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it had already been determined that it was not competent to insist on charters being granted; and the Provisos proposed were altogether inconsistent with the Bill.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 62; Noes 102: Majority 40.

MR. M'LAGAN moved, after the word "superior," to add words requiring the new owner within three months after acquiring his rights to produce his titles to the superior or his agents in order that entry might be made.

After short Explanation,

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 7, agreed to.

Clause 8 (Estates to vest in heirs without service.)

MR. GORDON moved to leave out from beginning to line 11, and before "shall" insert words providing that "estate shall vest without service in case of proprietor dying intestate."

Amendment negatived.

Other Amendments moved and negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 (Completion of heirs' title.)

MR. GORDON moved, in line after "effect," to leave out to end of clause, and insert the words "Completion of title when deceased heir not served." He thought it strange, when the Scotch system was being introduced into England, the Lord Advocate should propose to abolish it in Scotland.

THE LORD ADVOCATE opposed the Amendment. He regarded the procedure in regard to service as altogether superfluous. If there was no dispute of a man's right to succession, there was no reason why he should go through a complicated procedure; if there was a dispute, it ought to be raised in the ordinary Courts of Law, and settled in the ordinary way.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE thought the attention of the Lord Chancellor should be drawn to this proposed alteration of the Scotch law before the system of service was adopted in England.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the authority of the Lord Chancellor was different from that of the Sheriff of Chancery.

Clause agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Friday.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HERON, Bill to provide facilities for the purchase of Lands by Tenants in Ireland, and to amend and alter Part II. and Part III. of "The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act (1870)," ordered to be brought in by Mr. HERON, Mr. JOHN BRIGHT, and Mr. PIM.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 167.]

NOXIOUS BUSINESSES.

Select Committee appointed, "to consider the operation of Clauses 55 and 56 of Act 7 and 8 Vic. c. 84, and the best means of making provision concerning the offensive or noxious businesses therein specified:"—Committee nominated:

—Mr. HEADLAM, Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, Mr. TORRENS, Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Mr. MORLEY, Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Dr. BREWER, Mr. EDMUND TURNOR, Sir JOHN OGILVY, Mr. DAVENPORT, Mr. LOCKE, Sir CHARLES MILLS, Mr. SAMUDA, Mr. FREDERICK WALPOLE, and Mr. MONTAGUE GUEST:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

SITES FOR PLACES OF WORSHIP BILL.

(The Lord Hatherley.)

(NO. 61.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HATHERLEY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, it was one which had come up from the Commons. The object of the Bill was simply to enable owners of property, and especially owners having a limited interest, to make over plots of ground not exceeding an acre in extent as sites for places of public worship. He had promised to take charge of the Bill up to the stage of second reading, and his noble and learned Friend beside him (Lord Romilly) had promised him his assistance in making certain alterations which they thought the clauses required, which alterations might be adopted in Committee.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Lord Hatherley.)

LORD CAIRNS said, the object of the measure was good, but the Bill itself was full of imperfections.

LORD ROMILLY said, it was proposed to commit the Bill pro forma in the first instance, and then the necessary alterations could be introduced.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

AUSTRALIAN COLONIES (CUSTOMS DUTIES) BILL—(No. 91).
(The Earl of Kimberley.)
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee according to Order.

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Interpretation clause.)

EARL GREY rose to move an Amendment, of which he had given Notice, and took occasion to repeat the objection he had urged on the second reading, to the policy recognized in the Bill. He contended that as Free Trade had been adopted as the commercial policy of the British Empire, it ought to be the commercial policy of our Colonies. It was easy to say—as had been said by his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies—that it was perhaps better for the Imperial Parliament to act on the principle that in these matters the Australian Colonies knew what policy was best for themselves. But he (Earl Grey) denied the soundness of that proposition. It was impossible to read the Blue Books without seeing that many of the statesmen of the Australian Colonies were in such utter ignorance of the principles of political economy, that of the writings of Adam Smith and Mr. Ricardo they seemed never to have even heard. Their Lordships were aware that before self-government was given to those colonies they had been making very rapid progress, and that, while affording emigrants from this country a rich field for their labour, they enjoyed very great advantages from the influx of British colonists. We had allowed them, and he thought properly allowed them, self-government; but it was notorious that since they had got their own Legislatures there had been in those colonies gross land jobbings and other corruption. It was going too far, therefore, to say that the Australian Colonies knew what was best for themselves, and on this plea to pass Acts in the Imperial Parliament which would sanction the severance of all material ties between them and the mother country. If this were done, the nominal union could tend to nothing but the imposition of a burden and a responsibility on this country. If the Australian Colonies were to be allowed to tax at their pleasure British trade, to subject it to unfair disadvantages, and to create artificial barriers to the natural course of British commerce, he should like to know of what advantage a continuance of the union could be to this country? He believed that to sanction such a policy was as great a blunder as it was possible to commit. He thought that our Colonies should be distinctly informed that the Imperial Government had adopted a certain commercial policy, to which if they wished to remain integral portions of the Empire they must conform. He was not, however, on this occasion asking the Government to retrace their steps—he only asked that New Zealand, which was 1,200 miles from the Australian Colonies, should be omitted from the Bill; and he begged to move an Amendment to that effect.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that though there were 1,200 miles of sea between the mainland of Australia and New Zealand, the people of the two Colonies followed very much the same pursuits. There were physical differences between the Colonies, but in both the colonists were Englishmen or their descendants. There was no such difference between them as to form grounds for excluding New Zealand from the benefits of this Bill. Take, for example, the case of sugar. Sugar could only be grown in Queensland and the northern parts of New South Wales. Suppose a merchant at Brisbane wanted to send a cargo of sugar in the winter season to New Zealand and another to Melbourne. In the one case he would ship it probably on board a barque which would run down before the westerly winds in 10 or 12 days. In the other case the distance was say 1,100 miles. The ship would probably have a fair wind as far as Cape Howe, but she would then have to beat up to Melbourne through Bass's Straits, and would probably be longer on her voyage than the New Zealand vessel; and why should her sugar go into Melbourne perhaps duty free, perhaps at a very low rate, whilst the cargo of the other would be charged a high duty in New Zealand? The noble Earl (Earl Grey) had talked about shutting out the produce of other countries, but as far as he (Earl Belmore) could at this moment remember, sugar from the Mauritius was the only important article likely to be much affected. It was quite true that wine was grown in Australia, but anyone who had drunk it knew that it was a very different article from the wines of France and Germany, and very little likely to displace them. As to the Cape, which had been instanced, he was informed that there was absolutely no trade between Sydney and the Cape. It was very easy to get from the Cape to Sydney, but by no means so easy to get back again. With regard to Victoria, its tariff was, no doubt, protective; but he had recently heard that the lower classes were feeling the ill-effects of having to pay high prices for clothing, and that a feeling of opposition was beginning to grow up to protection. He doubted whether it could be asserted that the policy of our other Australian Colonies was, on the whole, favourable to protection. Tasmania had lost the convict settlements, on the expenditure of which it used to rely, and the only way of raising a revenue was by means of Customs duties. He knew that the tariff of South Australia was a revenue and not a protectionist tariff. He believed that the same was the case in Queensland. New South Wales never had a protective tariff. Changes occurred very rapidly in our colonies, and matters were very much altered since the noble Earl (Earl Grey) held the seals of the Colonial Office. Due allowance must be made for friction in dealing with the colonies, and if the Bill shut out New Zealand there would be friction of a very unpleasant kind. He trusted that their Lordships would not adopt a policy so unwise as to agree to the Amendment.

LORD LISGAR hoped the noble Earl on the cross-benches (Earl Grey) might be induced not to press his Amendment. It was impossible not to admit the force of the arguments he had adduced, or to deny them their due weight. The measure was pregnant with all the consequences he had foreshadowed; but it was the will and doing of the colonies themselves, and if it be the thin end of the wedge of eventual separation, there could be no doubt as to the hand that placed and fixed it—it was not the hand of any British statesman or any British party, but of some colonial clique greedy of commercial profit. Let this be kept in recollection. Everything that could be stated in favour of free trade and that could show the disadvantage and mischief of protection would be found placed in the clearest light in the despatches of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. His hand was, however, forced, and when he found the colonies deaf to his arguments he preferred to make concessions. Some of the colonies were, no doubt, protectionist; in others the feeling in favour of protection was more apparent than real. Parties were so nearly balanced that Colonial Ministries were not always able to carry out their own views. During the seven years in which he was Governor of New South Wales he did not recollect any Minister who had been strong enough in the Legislative Assembly to impose direct taxation. When he had been there about four years the main issue at the General Election was Free Trade against Protection. The free-traders carried the day by an immense majority, and he did not believe that this feeling had died out. A Sydney newspaper which enjoyed a circulation seven times larger than its contemporaries said, that protection had never been adopted as a rule in that colony, and never would be. No Minister in New South Wales had ever attempted to form an Administration on protective principles. New South Wales was indispensable to any protectionist combination, and so long as it remained favourable to Free Trade any protectionist union would be impossible.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that although the point raised by the noble Earl (Earl Grey) in his Amendment was comparatively minute, yet he did not regret that the debate had taken a wider range. He regretted that this Bill had become necessary; but the principle of self-government was even more important than the principle of free trade. He agreed that the Government were taking a serious step; but it was exaggerating its importance to say that the Bill took a step which was leading in the path of Colonial independence. It only allowed the Australian Colonies to follow a policy which other colonies had already been permitted to adopt. Long before confederation, the North American Colonies were allowed to establish differential duties between themselves and it was remarkable that the commencement of that policy dated from 1850, when his noble Friend on the cross-benches (Earl Grey) held the seals of the Colonial Office. The Canadian Legislature in that year passed an Act providing that the Governor in Council might declare any article which was the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British North American Provinces or possessions, or any one or more of them, to be admissible into Canada free of duty, and might determine under what circumstances, conditions, and regulations they should be admitted. It was true his noble Friend did not advise assent to that measure; but, on the other hand, he did not advise disallowance of it. What he did was this: Finding himself responsible for the maintenance of good relations between this country and one of our great colonies, his noble Friend did not venture to advise the disallowance of the Bill, but he suggested an Amendment—which, however was disregarded by the Colonial Legislature, and the measure passed into law, and remained in force until 1859, when it was superseded by other legislation. The action taken then was similar to that which had since been taken, for it had been found inadvisable to refuse the request of the Australian Colonies to obtain power to impose differential duties as regarded their trade with each other. The Amendment moved this evening by his noble Friend had for its object the exclusion of New Zealand from the operation of the present Bill. He admitted the other night that New Zealand differed from the other Colonies, inasmuch as it was disunited from them by a considerable interval of sea; but as the noble Earl (the Earl of Belmore) then pointed out the distance from New Zealand to the nearest part of Australia was not greater for all practical purposes than the distance from one part of Australia to another, and in point of fact the intercourse between New Zealand and the Australian Colonies was extremely close. The total of the imports into New Zealand in 1871 was £4,078,192, and the total of the imports into New Zealand from Australia was no less than £1,970,159. Moreover, the latter was a constantly increasing trade. It should be borne in mind that New Zealand, although situated at a distance from Australia, belonged to all intents and purposes to the great Australian group of Colonies. The similarity of opinion between the different Colonies was remarkable, and it would be unreasonable to withhold from New Zealand a power which was granted to Australia. This was not a point in regard to which it would be wise to maintain a stubborn and unyielding opposition to the wishes of the Colonies themselves, and certainly it was very unwise to take their stand upon points in reference to which they could not maintain their position. If, however, no such opposition was advisable, no course remained open except that which Her Majesty's Government had pursued. They had placed before the Colonies the objections they entertained to the course intended to be pursued. They had given them time for reflection, and when they found that, after full consideration, they were firm in their opinion they thought it their duty no longer to resist the concessions that were desired. But Her Majesty's Government had by no means conceded all the powers which some of the Colonies asked for. They had not empowered the Colonies to conclude Treaties with foreign Powers, nor had they broken down the restrictions upon differential duties on goods imported to the Colonies from foreign countries or from this country. They had simply enabled the Colonies to make reciprocity arrangements with one another as regarded the products of the Colonies themselves. It would, in his opinion, be most unfortunate if, in these circumstances, their Lordships should be induced to accept the Amendment of his noble Friend.

Amendment negatived.

Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3^a on Friday next.

FAIRS BILL — (No. 97.)

(The Earl of Feversham.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to remove some inconveniences which attended the existing law with respect to fairs. For this purpose it repealed altogether the Fairs Act of 1868, and enabled the Secretary of State for the Home Department, on the representation of the magistrates of the petty sessional division within which any fair was held, or of the owner of any fair, to alter the days for holding such fair. The 7th clause held intact all rights of the owner.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Earl of Feversham.)

THE EARL OF POWIS thought the Bill ought to provide that in any case in which it was proposed to prolong or to abridge a fair by application to the Secretary of State, notice should be given of the application by those who made it—by the justices to the owners of the land, or by the owners of the land to the justices, as the case might be—so as to prevent private injury or public inconvenience on the one hand, or injury to public morality on the other.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

PUBLIC WORSHIP FACILITIES

BILL—(No. 56.)

(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

Suspension of Standing Order, No. 34a.

Standing Order, No. 34a, considered (according to order).

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that through oversight and inadvertence, this Bill, after coming from the Commons, had remained on the Order Book three weeks and a day without any Peer giving Notice of his intention to move that it be read a second time; and thus, by one day's delay, it had come under the operation of the new Standing Order that a Bill from the other House should not be proceeded with if no one took it up within 12 sitting days. The object with which that Standing Order was passed was to remedy a grievance—the crowding of their Lordships' Order Book towards the close of the Session with Orders relating to Bills that were not to be carried further. This Bill stood in an exceptional position, as it had come from the other House early in the Session, and it had the concurrence and support of the entire Episcopal Bench. The Bill had been placed in the hands of a Member of the right rev. Bench, but had been returned to him (the Earl of Carnarvon) with the request that he would take charge of it. But it happened that, when he came down accordingly to give Notice of the second reading, he found that the Bill had already fallen under the provision of the Standing Order. Under these circumstances, he proposed that the Standing Order should be considered in order to its being dispensed with. He understood that his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees contended that the Bill was actually extinct, and that no suspension of the Standing Order could revive it. On the other hand, he (the Earl of Carnarvon) maintained that the Bill was not dead, but merely in a state of suspended animation, and that if the Standing Order were suspended the Bill would revive. The words of the Standing Order were that "the Bill should not be entered on the Minutes, and should not be proceeded with."

LORD REDESDALE: During the Session.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: But when the Standing Order was suspended the bar was removed and the Bill revived. Their Lordships were in the habit of suspending their Standing Orders with reference to Protests being entered on the Minutes, and he ventured to think this was really a case in which he had a right to ask that, as a matter of convenience, in a case where there had been no mala fides, the Standing Order should be suspended. The noble Earl then moved that the said Order be dispensed with in respect of the said Bill.

LORD REDESDALE thought the Order an important one, and it was very necessary that their Lordships should properly deal with it. The Order was that "the Bill should not be proceeded with in the same Session," and they all knew what was meant by an Order that a Bill should not be proceeded with—it meant that the Bill could not be renewed—could not be brought up again. He was not expressing his own opinion merely, but also the opinion of the noble Lord the late Speaker of the House of Commons. He took the Bill to be dead, and the Bill had been dead a fortnight before notice had been taken of it.

LORD CAIRNS said, he would take but a small part in this post-mortem inquiry. It was no doubt true that the Bill could not be proceeded with this Session if the Standing Order was not suspended; but if the Standing Order was suspended, the estoppel to the further progress of the Bill was removed, and the Bill, like any other Bill, being free from the operation of the Standing Order, would proceed. He must say if ever there was a case in which it was just and proper that the Standing Order should be suspended, it was the present. He did not object to the Standing Order, which was an excellent one, its object being to prevent Bills which had come up from the other House in ample time for discussion being allowed to lie dormant till near the close of the Session, when many of their Lordships had left town, and then being suddenly revived after they had been lost sight of. This Bill did not come within that class. There was still plenty of time to proceed with it, and ample notice might be given. By suspending the Standing Order he thought that they would be doing what was just without infringing on the principle of the Standing Order. There was another reason why they should do so. It was perfectly competent for those who were anxious to proceed with the Bill to lay on the Table the identical Bill as a fresh Bill originating in that House, and after it had passed its different stages to send it down to the other House, which could have no objection to it, seeing it had passed the present Bill.

VISCOUNT PORTMAN objected to the suspension of the Standing Order in question in this case. He considered that the Motion was too late, as the Bill was extinct under the Order, and suspension was always moved before the Order had taken effect. Lord Eversley agreed with him in that opinion, and if the Bill had been regularly removed from the Table under this Order it was not wise to revise it by this process, as the noble Earl could bring in as a new Bill an almost identical measure. To consent to such a suspension would, he feared, lead to bad results in the case of Private Bills. There was no fair comparison between this case and those cases referred to by the noble Earl who had introduced the subject. To rescind Standing Orders relating to general legislation was a very serious matter. He could not, therefore, assent to the precedent which the adoption of the noble Earl's Motion would lay down.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he concurred in the opinion which had been expressed by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns). In the present state of the case their Lordships had nothing to do with the merits of the Bill, and for himself, he had not studied it so as to be acquainted with its merits or demerits—all he knew was that it was a measure of some public importance, that it had the approval of some members of the right rev. Bench, and that it had passed the House of Commons. There could not be a doubt as to their Lordships' power in this matter—the Order that a Bill in the position of the present should not be proceeded with operated until it should be their Lordships' pleasure to dispense with it. The Standing Order was useful as a weapon of defence in their Lordships' hands; but if they treated it as admitting of no suspension, they might perhaps raise questions in which they might not be wholly right between that and the other branch of the Legislature. If an Order of that kind were simply an arbitrary rule that a Bill which had come up from the other House must be proceeded with in a limited time, there might be persons who would call in question the suitableness and propriety of such an Order. It was quite otherwise if they retained in their own hands the power, on reasonable cause, of which they were the judges, of dispensing and relaxing the Order. If their Lordships refused on such grounds as those suggested to allow such a Bill to go forward, they would simply abdicate their own powers over their own regulations. But of course their Lordships would not relax a Standing Order of this kind without good and sufficient reasons.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, it was undoubtedly in their Lordships' power to suspend Standing Orders if they pleased; but if they were to suspend them on such grounds as had been advanced in this case, it would be better not to have Standing Orders at all. Standing Orders gave an assurance that a particular measure would not be proceeded with when once certain conditions were not fulfilled. He was not going to enter into the merits of the Bill—all he would say was that many persons had spoken to him on the subject, and he, relying on the Standing Order, told them that the Bill was extinct, and that they had no reason to trouble themselves further about it.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, he could see no ground for refusing the suspension of the Standing Order in the case of this Bill if their Lordships saw that the occasion was sufficient. There was scarcely a Session in which Standing Orders were not suspended five or six times.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND was understood to oppose the Motion.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY admitted that the Standing Orders afforded their Lordships considerable protection in the conduct of business; but when they considered the period of the Session and the fact that sufficient Notice had been given, he thought the Standing Order might be suspended in this case without inconvenience. He would suggest, by way of precaution against abuse, that they should put some such Preamble as the following to the Resolution:—

“Whereas the Session is not far advanced and it is convenient to interpose an interval of not less than three weeks between this time and the second reading of the Bill.”

EARL GRANVILLE said, he did not admit that the inconvenience of suspending the Standing Order was so great as to require such an apology. It was quite right that the House should take some measures to remedy any abuses arising from delay, but he was not aware of a single case in which there had been any intentional delay in taking up Bills—here there had been no intentional delay, and it would be better to alter the Standing Order than to preface the Resolution suspending it by such a Preamble.

LORD DYNEVOR opposed the suspension of the Standing Order.

EARL BEAUCHAMP pointed out that if the Standing Orders were maintained, no great harm would be done after all, for things would go on for the next 12 months just as they had from time immemorial. Whatever else the Bill was intended to remedy, it would be better to bear them for a while than to incur the evils which might arise from suspending the Standing Order.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH thought the very fact that there were numbers of persons out of the House who objected to the Bill, was a reason why the Standing Order should be suspended, and the Bill considered on its merits. It was far better, even in the interests of those who were opposed to it, that it should be rejected on its merits—if rejected it should be—than that it should be defeated by the indirect operation of a Standing Order.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON expressed his willingness to modify the Motion in the sense suggested by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR put it to the noble Earl whether it would not be an encouragement to noble Lords to move frequently at early periods of the Session that the Standing Orders should be suspended if the words in question were introduced.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not care to press the Preamble.

Motion agreed to.

AFRICA—WEST COAST SETTLEMENTS —THE ASHANTEE INVASION.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE asked the Colonial Secretary, Whether native troops are to be sent to the coast of Africa from the West Indies; also, whether any explanation has been received from the Administrator as to his mistaken estimate of the Ashantee power? Sufficient precautions did not seem to have been taken by the Administrator against the Ashantee attack. Re-inforcements ought to have been there four months ago, and the Ashantees, after burning the villages, and murdering or making slaves of the people under the British Protectorate, must now be only a few miles from Cape Coast Castle. Another point was that the natives depended entirely upon the British Government for ammunition, but they had not been supplied with an adequate quantity. What they wanted, also was a few European Officers to lead them. With ammunition and proper leaders they seemed to behave very well in action.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he would inform the noble Earl in a few words what was the drift of the last news received from the Gold Coast. It amounted simply to this—that since the battle in which the Fantis had, on the whole, the worst of it—although he believed they need not have retreated had they not been seized with a panic—the Ashantees had not, at the date of the last advices, made any further advance. That was the sum total of the news, which was dated the 24th of last month. He purposely omitted to mention the various rumours which prevailed, because, as the truth of them had not been ascertained, they would only mislead their Lordships. The Ashantees, however, had made no forward movement since the last battle. He admitted that sufficient importance had not been attributed to the attack of the Ashantees, and that in the report which had been received by the Government, in the first instance, the numbers of the attacking force had been under-estimated. Allowance, however, must be made for the difficulty of procuring trustworthy information. Every measure had, however, been taken to secure the safety of the settlement. Colonel Harley, the new Administrator, had from the first attached great importance to this invasion. He knew that Colonel Harley had written to Governor Hennessey in this sense, and as he had at that period been a very short time on the Coast, Colonel Harley had shown himself by no means deficient in insight and prudence. With regard to the measures taken for the protection of the Settlement, the Government had sent out about 100 men—50 Marine Light Infantry and 50 Marine Artillery—not to form an expedition, but that they might assist in holding the forts and in protecting the coast towns. It was, as the noble Earl was aware, convenient under such circumstances to have men who could remain on board ship when they were not urgently required on land. The rainy season had now commenced, and that would impede the Ashantees in their movements. The West India troops would be re-inforced by between 200 and 300 men, so that the whole regiment would be on the Coast. The re-inforcements were the reliefs that would have been sent later, but had been despatched in anticipation. But while the Government had thought it right to send an additional body of troops to the Gold Coast, he admitted that the most efficient force was the native police. Mr. Hennessey recommended some time ago that a larger force of Houssa police should be substituted by degrees for the troops. This suggestion had received his approval; and although the increase of the native police had been somewhat impeded by recent occurrences, he had been so convinced that for all purposes of efficiency and economy it was better to have native police than West India troops on this coast, that he had communicated with the War Office requesting that four or five officers should be selected and sent out to the Coast expressly to discipline and lead the native police. It seemed desirable that the force to be raised on the Gold Coast should be formed partly of Houssa police and partly of Fanti police, forming, however, distinct bodies of men, as it was not desirable to mix the two races, and he might mention that police who were present in the recent engagement behaved in a manner worthy of disciplined troops. Lieutenant Hopkins commanded the whole, and he was glad to find that the Administrator had reported that the behaviour of Lieutenant Hopkins, of Mr. Rowe, the second in command, and of all the white officers, was excellent in every respect. It had been stated that last week a rocket battery was sent out. It might be inferred thence that there had been no rocket battery on the Coast; but a rocket battery was used against the Ashantees, and had done severe execution against them. Indeed, if the Fantis had had the courage to advance when the Ashantees were thrown into disorder by the rockets, the result of the engagement might have been different. The Government had since sent out a further supply of rockets. With regard to the supply of powder, he was afraid it was used so recklessly by the natives, that it was almost impossible to supply their demands; but the Administrator had no instructions to limit the supply. He exercised his own discretion, and, no doubt, it was a sound one. Large supplies had been sent out, and the Government would take all the necessary steps herein. The last point to which he would advert was the discrepancy between the earlier and later statements of Colonel Harley as to the number of the Ashantees forming the army of invasion. Upon this point he would read the explanation of the Administrator, Colonel Harley, in a despatch dated Cape Coast Castle, April 12, 1873, said—

“I fear there can be little doubt now that the Ashantees are in considerable force. I had not thought so, and my conclusion was not without some reason, as knowing something of the resources of the food supply in the districts they occupy, I imagined they could not maintain so large a force as has been variously represented at 12, 15, 20, 25, and as much as 40,000 men; but from reliable and intelligent evidence this is said to be the whole fighting strength of the Ashantee Power. It appears, however, from the evidence of prisoners that large supplies of food were brought with the army from Coomassie, carried by slaves, and that the supply is so continued. Prisoners also state that they have suffered severely in the last engagement, and that they have lost some of their head men or generals. There is no doubt their casualties must have been large, if any comparison may be drawn from our own."

This was, no doubt, a serious state of things; but the Administrator had taken prompt and active measures, and it was only due to Colonel Harley to state that, so far as he was aware, the Colonial Office had great reason to be satisfied with his proceedings.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he feared we had embarked in another African war, of a costly, doubtful, and hitherto unsuccessful character. He should be glad to know whether any Papers could be laid upon the Table which would give their Lordships some clue as to the nature and causes of this war.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, there might be a difficulty in presenting all the Papers at this moment, as some of them might affect individuals, but it was the intention of the Government to lay the Papers on the Table. Meanwhile, he might refer the noble Earl to the Correspondence already published relating to the transfer of the Dutch forts to this country, which threw considerable light on the pretensions of the King of Ashantee to the territory in question.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE said, he would have deemed the noble Earl's remarks more satisfactory if he had held out hopes that some 5,000 men would be collected on the spot as soon as possible. He hoped the noble Earl would urge upon those who had the direction of the war the necessity of seeing that the natives had a reasonable supply of ammunition.

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, to Friday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 20th May, 1873.

MERCANTILE MARINE—COMMISSION AS TO UNSEAWORTHY SHIPS.

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE asked the President of the Board of Trade,

The Earl of Kimberley

Whether he will consider the expediency of the Royal Commission, presided over by the Duke of Somerset, in future being made an open Commission and taking evidence on oath?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, the Question of the hon. Baronet referred to a subject which was not directly within the competence of the President of the Board of Trade to deal with, but which had been properly left to the discretion of the Commission, in which the Government and the House might place the utmost confidence. He had, however, communicated with the Chairman of the Commission (the Duke of Somerset), and had received from him a letter, which he would read to the House. The Duke said—

"It appears that objection has been taken to the course pursued by the Commission in excluding the public and the reporters from our room while we admit Mr. Plimsoll or his solicitor. The Committee were desirous to give Mr. Plimsoll full opportunity to make out his case and to bring before them such evidence as he could collect. On the other hand, the Commissioners decided that where the conduct of any shipowner was impugned he should at once be written to, and have a Copy of the Evidence, so far as it concerned him, forwarded to him. Inasmuch, however, as some statements might be made indirectly affecting the character of shipowners, the Commissioners have decided to communicate with the Associated Shipowners, asking them to appoint a solicitor or other person in whom they have confidence, who might watch the evidence from day to day and prepare any witnesses for a reply. My belief is that in this inquiry, where exciting assertions will occasionally be made, and where dull technical details must also be investigated, our present mode of conducting the business is the best. If the inquiry were open to the public we should require a large court, and the witnesses should be brought up to give evidence in a more methodical manner than is practised by Commissions. This Commission is not named to adjudicate upon a case brought before it, but to inquire into some alleged evils, and to suggest such remedies as may appear advisable. No one will, I believe, have any just ground of complaint that he has been unjustly treated by this Commission. The publication of the evidence as taken from day to day would be most unfair, as many statements are made to which no reply would appear until after an interval of many days. If the room were open to the public it would be necessary previously to know what a witness intended to say, in order that the parties affected by the evidence might be summoned to hear and to reply. Our object is to ascertain what remedy can be applied by Law to existing evils; incidentally the evidence may affect some persons, and it will be our duty to take care that they shall have the opportunity of vindicating their characters."

With respect to the taking of evidence on oath, he was in a position to say that if the Commission or their Chairman saw any reason to think that they ought to be armed with that power, they would at once communicate with the Government on the subject. On that point also, and in reference to the general conduct of the inquiry, the House and the Government might place the fullest confidence in the Commissioners.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT— LONDON SCHOOL RATE.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is intended that the Ratepayers of London should be kept in ignorance of the amount levied on them for the purposes of the School Board by its being included in the sum charged for the maintenance of Highways under the General Rate; and, what other charges are covered by the General Rate?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, that the Question ought rather to have been addressed to the Vice President of the Council, but he (Mr. Stansfeld) had referred to the Education Act, and would give what information he could. The only intention was the intention of the Act itself. On referring to the statute of 1870, he found that it required that the School Board fund should be paid out of the local rates; and that in certain cases it was a charge upon the general rate where there was one. The other expenses charged upon the general rate were what was required by the highways—paving, lighting, sweeping, and watering the roads, and for the establishments connected with these objects. He could give the House this further information—that the parochial authorities in levying a general rate might specify the purpose for which that rate was made, and the amount required for each of these purposes; and in some cases that course was adopted.

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS UNIONS— FARINGDON HIGHWAY BOARD.

QUESTION.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT asked the President of the Local Government Board, If it is true that the Faringdon

Highway Board have dismissed certain labourers from their employment on account of their belonging to an Agricultural Labourers Union?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, the Local Government Board had no jurisdiction over highway boards. But his Department had written to the Faringdon Highway Board, and had received a reply, which he would read to the House. It was as follows:—

“Edward Harris and James Wheeler, two men employed by the Faringdon Highway Board, having at a meeting of the Board admitted to the way-wardens that they would have to obey the orders of the executive committee of the Agricultural Labourers Union in any agitation for an increase of wages, with the alternative of a strike, the Board, considering they were a public body administering public funds, do not deem it expedient that their discretion should be fettered or controlled in their maintenance of the roads, or that the public should be exposed to the inconvenience of having the road works suddenly stopped by the action of an irresponsible committee; they, therefore, direct their surveyor to discharge the two men at the end of their week's engagement.”

He might add that the men were foremen in the receipt of 12s. a-week, with the addition of an extra 10s. per quarter.

THE GENEVA ARBITRATION—LETTER OF MR. FISH.—QUESTION.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to a letter addressed by Mr. Fish to Mr. Bancroft Davis, dated October 22, 1872, and recently published by the State Department at Washington, in which it is declared that the positions maintained by the English Arbitrator in expressing his dissent from the decision of the majority of the Tribunal “seem all to be available in a possible future of the United States;” and, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay a Copy of the above-mentioned Letter upon the Table of the House, and of any Communications which Her Majesty's Government may have made to the Government of the United States in respect of it?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government are aware of the existence of the paper to which the Question of my hon. Friend refers. It has not been communicated to them officially by the Government of the United States, and I am therefore not able to lay it on the Table of the House.

I need not say, we have no communications of our own to produce in relation to it.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE) BILL —GOVERNMENT PROPERTY.

QUESTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the President of the Local Government Board, If it is the intention of the Government to limit the powers of rating under the new Rating (Liability and Value) Bill to the Poor Rate, so far as Government property is concerned, or whether it is intended that such property shall be rendered liable to other local rates?

MR. STANSFELD: It is intended, Sir, that such property shall be rendered liable to all local rates.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—DEPOT CENTRES—OXFORD.—QUESTION.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is intended, in the event of Oxford being selected as a Depot Centre, to station there at any future time a battalion of Regular troops in addition to the Depot Battalion?

MR. CARDWELL: It is not intended, Sir, to station a battalion of Regular troops at Oxford in addition to the Depot Battalion. It is not intended to make in the neighbourhood of Oxford any greater provision in the way of building than for the limited number of officers and men stated in Appendix H of the first Report of the Committee on Organization dated the 22nd of February, 1872. These it is proposed to place at Bullingdon, about two miles from Oxford.

PARLIAMENT—ASCENSION DAY.

QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE moved, "That Committees shall not sit on Thursday, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock, and have leave to sit until Six of the clock, notwithstanding the sitting of the House." The right hon. Gentleman observed that the House would probably recollect that a Motion was made last year in his absence, under the impression that it had become a matter of course that such a Motion should be made. Although the Government did not expect either a discussion or a division the Question was challenged, and on a division the Motion was negatived. There was some reference to the subject subsequently in that House, and he stated that it appeared to him that the question was one upon which it was desirable that the House should, upon a future occasion, decide. He therefore made this Motion in order to obtain the opinion of the House upon it. He was certainly under the impression that there had been a more uniform practice in respect to this matter than he found to have been actually the case. It appeared that the practice of the House had varied a good deal; but he did not find that upon any occasion, except that of last year, when the question was raised without the previous knowledge of hon. Members, that the House had actually refused its assent to a Motion restraining the Committees from sitting before 2 o'clock on Ascension Day, although in 1857 a proposal to suspend the Sitting during the whole of Ascension Day was withdrawn. On every occasion since 1856, at all events, when the Motion had been made it was carried, excepting that of last year, when it was urged, and with some force, that it would be a great hardship upon the parties connected with Committees to meet at 2 o'clock and then to adjourn at a quarter before 4 o'clock. Feeling that that objection was not without weight he now proposed that they should sit on until 6 o'clock, notwithstanding the sitting of the House. He did not urge the Motion with whatever authority belonged to a Government; but he moved it in deference to precedents substantially uninterrupted of recent years, and because, with the addition made to it, it was a becoming and proper one. Of course, he found no fault with persons who entertained a contrary opinion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Committees shall not sit on Thursday, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock, and have leave to sit until Six of the clock, notwithstanding the sitting of the House."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. BOUVERIE said, that last year when the Motion was made he gave Notice that on the following year he should resist such a Motion. Those who thought with him at that time believed they had then a favourable opportunity for expressing their opinions against the

Motion, and accordingly they pressed for a division. The result was that the Motion was negatived. In accordance with the Notice which he then gave, he rose now to express his opposition to the Motion. There was no unbroken chain of precedent for it; in fact, the Motion was a modern one, and he ventured to say that it was a practice which ought not to commend itself to the good sense of the House. It was highly inconvenient to all those who were engaged on Committees. The right hon. Gentleman attempted to meet the objection which he had made last year by now proposing that the Committees should sit until 6 o'clock. He thought that proposal was unfair to those hon. Gentlemen who sat on Committees, and who might be desirous of attending to the Business of the House at a quarter-past 4 o'clock. It appeared to him, with all due deference to those who thought otherwise, that the religious idea connected with this Motion was not a sound one. If Ascension Day were observed by a large proportion of Her Majesty's subjects as a sacred one—like Christmas Day or Good Friday—the sense of the House would no doubt respect that feeling, and would be strongly in favour of such a Motion. He, however, believed that no such feeling pervaded the minds of the bulk of the Members of that House—certainly not amongst the Scotch, nor, he believed, amongst the Irish Members. What could be more absurd than that they should have half of a sacred day—that they should be forbidden to sit before 2 o'clock, and should then be allowed to return to their ordinary work. The fact was, that if some few Members did want to go to Church on Ascension Day, and represented such to be their feeling to their Colleagues on Committees, no doubt every consideration would be paid them; and such Committees would be adjourned over until 2 o'clock on that day. His right hon. Friend to be consistent ought not merely to say that the Committees should not meet until 2 o'clock on Ascension Day, but that they should go to Church on that day with Lord Charles Russell bearing his Mace marching before them. He hoped the House would agree with him that this practice should not be continued, and that every Member should be allowed to act according to the dictates of his own conscience.

MR. GREGORY pointed out the inconvenience which would arise from the Committees sitting beyond 4 o'clock, after the House was made. Some Gentlemen who might be interested in the Business before the House would be unable to attend until 6 o'clock, when it would, perhaps, be too late.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 181; Noes 80: Majority 101.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS—RESOLUTION.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in rising to call the attention of the House to the loss of life on railroads, the numerous collisions, most of them arising from causes which might have been prevented, that have occurred during the last eighteen months, and to the greater amount of safety the public would derive from a more general adoption of the absolute block system, the system of interlocking signals and points, and the use of a larger proportion of break power on trains on the principal lines of railway throughout the country; and to move a Resolution thereon, said: Sir,—As very naturally great interest is taken by the public in the question of safety in railway travelling, I have the less hesitation in endeavouring to submit to the House some of the reasons by which I hope to be able to show not only that we do not at this moment enjoy that amount of security in railway travelling that we ought, but that means do exist which if put in action would have the effect of very considerably increasing its safety. I propose also to try to show that the time has come when the Government may properly step in and interpose between the Railway Companies and the travelling public in this matter. I am well aware that it will be said that the present is not an opportune time for bringing forward the question, because, in the first place, the Government have already, by their Railway and Canal Traffic Bill, attempted to deal with this subject during the present Session; and also because the discussion which took place in 1871, and which I myself raised in this House, showed that in the opinion of this House it ought not to touch this question of interfering with the management of railway travelling. Further, that the Report of the Committee which sat in another place this year, goes to confirm that conclusion. I cannot help thinking, however, that in both these instances that would be a wrong conclusion to come to. For if we look at the Report of the Committee which sat in another place this year, with regard to this particular question, we shall see that every line of that Report bears out their feeling in favour of providing additional securities for the travelling public; and the only reason why the Committee did not recommend their adoption I believe may be summed up in this—that what was submitted to them was “a hard-and-fast line” which they did not like to take upon themselves the responsibility of recommending should be enforced indiscriminately; whereas, if such a proposal as I now venture to submit to the House, leaving a discretion in the authorities, had been substituted for an absolutely fixed line, their opinion would have been altogether different. I may also be met by another argument. It is often said that it is impossible to interfere with such a vast concern as the Railway Companies of this country. But in answer to that I would point to the fact that the Government have shown by their Bill this year that they are not unprepared to deal with the question. In that Bill they deal with the question of the convenience of the travelling public, and I think they are hardly justified in saying that they cannot interfere with that which concerns the public security from accidents and the safety of life in railway travelling. Now, Sir, I am well acquainted with the old argument which we have always had to meet on these occasions, that if you take into account the number of persons who are carried by the railways and compare with it the number of accidents that arise you have no case. We are always told, and with truth, that the proportion of deaths and injuries to the number of persons conveyed by railway is really almost infinitesimal. But what I say is not that these accidents are in a large proportion to the travelling population of the country; but that among those accidents there are a large and serious number which come under the term preventable accidents, and if it can be shown that these may be prevented by the adoption of a proper system of management, they ought not to be called accidents at all. I maintain that, if only one preventable accident happened in a year, it would be a justification for saying that the railway system is not doing its duty, and I should like to lay before the House some facts which I think must convince them that the security of railway travelling is not cared for to the extent that it ought to be. [The hon. Baronet then proceeded to give a minute analysis of the Returns of the Board of Trade relating to railway accidents—of which a summary only can be here given.] It appears that the total number of train accidents (including collisions) were in 1870, accidents 122; collisions 83: 1871, accidents 159; collisions 93: 1872, accidents 221; collisions 161. These were all investigated by the Inspectors of the Board of Trade. The total casualties from railway accidents in 1870, were 286 killed; 1,261 injured: in 1871, 404 killed; 1,239 injured. Of these, sufferers from causes beyond their own control, in 1870, 91 killed; 1,202 injured: 1871, 30 killed; 993 injured. Casualties arising from collisions—in 1870, 51 killed; 1,052 injured: in 1871, 12 killed; 845 injured. Of passengers and railway servants killed from their own carelessness or other than causes beyond their own control, there were in 1870, passengers killed, 24; injured, 10; servants killed, 90; injured, 11; and in 1871 the proportions were about the same. If then, we turn to the valuable Reports which are made to us yearly by the Board of Trade Inspectors, and read the remarks which they make upon individual accidents into which they have inquired and the deductions they draw from them, we may see that in the year 1870, 60 accidents were reported to have occurred from want of adopting the interlocking system, the adoption of which the Inspectors had constantly recommended, 43 were from want of the block system, and 10 from insufficient break power. Here then we have the statement of these gentlemen that had their recommendations been adopted, these accidents in all human probability would not have happened. In 1871, 53 accidents are reported from want of interlocking, 32 from want of the block system, and 6 from insufficiency of break power. And last year 42 are reported from want of interlocking, not less than 55 from want of the block system, and 13 from insufficient break power. It is a curious fact that, with the exception of 11 lines, there is not a line in this country on which one or more accidents have not taken place, and it appears that in 1870 and 1871 there were 11 lines on which no accident happened. Taking the six northern lines on which accidents had happened—namely, the London and North Western, with 1,507 miles of railway; North Eastern, 1,281 miles; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 428 miles; Midland, 972 miles; Great Western, 1,387 miles; Great Northern, 633 miles; total, 6,208 miles—on which accidents had happened, there were, in 1870, train accidents, 76; collisions, 62; 1871, train accidents, 95; collisions, 58; 1872, train accidents, 141; collisions, 95. I have taken these six lines of railway, because they are represented in the Reports of the Inspectors as lines which, for some years continuously, had the most of these accidents, and on which the interlocking and block systems had not been generally adopted. If the House will bear with me, I should like, on the other hand, to compare with these lines five other lines on which the system strongly recommended by the Inspectors—namely, the block system—has been largely, and, in some instances, generally applied—namely, the South Western, 579 miles; London and Brighton, 376 miles; South Eastern, 327 miles; London, Chatham and Dover, 139 miles; North Staffordshire, 182 miles—total, 1,603 miles—there had happened in 1870, train accidents, 6; collisions, 3; 1871, train accidents, 6; collisions, 3; 1872, train accidents, 18; collisions, 10. The Returns further showed the bearing of the gradual introduction of the block system in the former lines in the question of accidents, for in 1870, with 6,118 miles, the block system being applied to 617 miles, the collisions were 62; in 1871, when the block system was applied to 1,484 miles, the collisions were 53. On the five lines on which the block system was largely adopted, with 1,603 miles, of which 1,219 were under the block system and only 384 not, there were only 3 collisions. Now, he could not but think, that if they had nothing better than these Returns of the Inspectors, they would have very strong evidence indeed in favour of the comparative security of working under the block system. For one moment I should like to refer to the Reports for 1870 and 1871 of Captain Tyler, one of the most valuable of the staff Inspectors of the Board of Trade, and give the House the summing up of his "chapter of accidents," so to speak, for these two years. In 1870 I find him saying—

"Without taking a theoretical or too sanguine a view, it may be asserted that, making full allowance for human fallibility and frailty, and for certain unexpected contingencies during every year, the number of train accidents might thus be reduced from 122, at which they stand for the past year, to a very much smaller number, and even to a fraction of that number, and a proportionate or even greater reduction might be made in the numbers of passengers killed and injured from causes beyond their control."

Then in his Report for 1871, I find him saying—

"Not one of these 159 investigated train accidents can properly be classed as purely accidental. They were all of a nature to be avoided by care, forethought, or the adoption of proper means and appliances. It will never, of course, be possible altogether to prevent mistakes or even negligence on the part of employés, but the number of accidents arising from such mistakes or negligence may be materially reduced by improved means and appliances and better discipline. It is the nature of railway work that it must be done in one way or other. If it cannot be done with strict adherence to regulations, the regulations fall into disuse. If means and appliances for safe modes of working do not exist, it is carried on without them, and it is frequently so carried on for a length of time before the want of further and better appliances is publicly demonstrated by the occurrence of an accident. For every defect which is thus brought to light there are always many others which remain unnoticed or uncorrected, and the accidents above enumerated under different heads point unmistakably not only to the remedies directly required to prevent their recurrence, but further to greater numbers of remedies which should be adopted for the prevention of other accidents."

Then the Inspector goes on to say—and this is important for the House to consider—

"I need not go on this occasion, as I did last year, into further details. It will be sufficient to add that by far the greater number of accidents that occur may be prevented by the adoption of well-known means of safety, and that the most important, most powerful, and most wealthy companies are just those which have too much neglected the application of such means, and frequently in those parts of their districts in which, for the heaviest traffic, they were most needed."

This Report, is backed up by the statements of nearly everyone of the Inspectors of Railways in their several Reports, bearing the most absolute and conclusive testimony to the superiority of the "absolute" over the "permissive" block system. Then with regard to the other point, the necessity of interlocking signals and points, we have the recommendation of Captain Tyler on that terrible accident at Kirtle-bridge, on the Caledonian Railway, in which 11 were killed and 15 injured, during last summer. He sums up his Report on the accident by saying—

“The true moral of the present accident may be expressed in a few words: Station-masters, signal-men, and porters must be expected, in the course of their various duties and their rough work, to make mistakes of this description. A simple means exists of rendering such mistakes impossible or harmless. It is to be hoped that this lamentable lesson will produce its effect throughout the country, in causing this simple means—of interlocking points and signals—to be more speedily applied over the different systems of railways.”

We have him also, in his Report, making this statement—

“That of the worst accidents which would have been prevented by interlocking, one was in 1867, one in 1868, three in 1869, 12 in 1870, eight in 1871, and one in 1872, and that these resulted in the death of 18 and injury to 403 persons.”

I shall be told, perhaps, that I am looking too much to the evidence that comes before us in these annual Reports of the Inspectors, and that if closely tested they hardly represent what is the real state of things. But the evidence in these Reports is not all. If we look into the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords we shall find the evidence of Inspectors and Managers of Railways also. We have the same Inspector, Colonel Yolland, giving his testimony in favour of the block system. In answer to the question whether he approved of that system he said—

“I hold that unless you have the traffic worked wholly and solely by one engine in steam, the train, staff and ticket system, coupled with the absolute block system is the proper way of working all single lines, and I do not think that any double lines whatever ought to be opened for traffic unless that traffic be worked on the absolute block system. It is not a new thing. It has been long in operation. It is perfectly well known; and what is more it is known by railway superintendents and officers to be the safest mode of working traffic.”

The next question he is asked is, “You do not think that Railway Companies will adopt it themselves if they are left alone?” And he answers, “I do not think they will.” He is asked further—

“From your experience can you say that where the block system has been in force it has contributed to the safety of the lines?”

To which he replies—

“There cannot be a doubt upon the subject; at least I do not think that it admits of a doubt. I do not mean to say that collisions will not occur where the block system is in existence, because human nature is fallible, and men will make mistakes under the block system as under any other system, but there can be no question about the increased safety as regards the prevention of collisions between following trains, or a train running into something that is standing on the line.”

Captain Tyler also being examined before the Committee, gave conclusive evidence with regard to the interlocking and block system. [The hon. Baronet here read at large, evidence given before the Committee by the managers and traffic officers of nearly all the great lines of railway and by eminent railway engineers, all decisively advocating the interlocking and absolute block system.] I know it may be said that where you have the managers of railways expressing a decided opinion in favour of these improvements for the security of the travelling public you may leave it to the Boards of Directors and the managers who advise them to carry them into effect; and I am prepared to admit that if all railways were conducted with the spirit that some of them are I should be the last person to wish to interfere. But what I say is this—That while such lines as the Midland and Great Northern, and lines of that kind are doing their best to meet requirements which are proved to be essential, and are bringing their main lines as fast as possible under the block system, there are other lines on which the old prejudice against it exists as strong as ever, although the traffic is increasing at a rate which renders it absolutely necessary that these safeguards should be adopted. What I urge upon the Government, therefore, is that in the case of lines of that description, which are hesitating and slow in bringing these improvements to bear upon the working of their traffic, I should like to see powers taken under which the Government would be able to place them in a position similar to that of other lines. And if no other result ensues than the mere discussion of the question in this House, I believe that a great deal of good will have been done. I remember, in 1871, when the discussion upon it took place, one or two directors of railways came to me after that discussion and stated the very discussion had had the effect of strengthening the hands of men who, on Boards of management, had been constantly urging the adoption of this system. They had been urging it, but had been over-ruled by considerations of expense; but that the mere fact of the public attention having been drawn to the subject of safety in railway travelling in this House had produced an effect on many lines in England, which was to be seen in the increasing application of the system to the working of their traffic. It is not always however that, with all the desire expressed by the directors and managers of railways to come up to the requirements of the age that they have done so. Captain Tyler, in his Report on the Nuneaton accident, indicates clearly that the directors of certain railways are not always working in the direction we could wish, and quotes the remarks which were made by the Chairman of the Company at the last half-yearly meeting of the shareholders—

"He believed that the Board of Trade were as responsible for railway accidents as the Companies were. It was a divided management, with all the responsibility on one side only. The Board of Trade insisted on signals and other works which involved a large expenditure on the Companies."

And the story of this accident is a suitable commentary upon these observations. Is the Board of Trade responsible, on the one hand, for an accident occurring from the want of apparatus which it constantly recommends the Company to adopt? Is not the Board of Trade justified, on the other hand, in insisting, as far as it has the power to do so, on the application of appliances necessary for safety, even though they involve a large expenditure on the Companies? Then they had the evidence of Mr. Allport, the Manager of the Midland Company, before a Committee of the House of Commons in 1870, when he said, in answer to a question—

"A good many questions have been put upon the subject of the interlocking of signals and points. For a long time I dissented, and up to the present moment I entirely dissent from the views of the inspecting officers, and we resisted the interlocking of signals and points; but the Board of Trade refused to allow us to open a line until we had done it. Of course the inspecting officer's duty is to consider the safety of the public. . . . I have not a word to say against the Board of Trade taking that position, but practically it forces itself upon the Company, however opposed they may be to its introduction."

Now, if any deduction is to be drawn from this, it is that the railway manager himself was opposed to the system, though he admits that the Board of Trade forced it upon his Company. The objection to it is on the ground of the expense which it entails on the Companies. But we have even stronger evidence than that, which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade will recollect as having been furnished in the course of last summer. I own I was surprised when I read the report of a meeting of the London and North Western Company, which was held at the Euston Station, and at which the chair was filled by a Mr. Bancroft, in the absence of Mr. Moon. On that occasion Mr. Bancroft stated that while he claimed for the regular and ordinary services of the London and North Western Railway the praises which we may allow to be fairly its due, he charged the Government with having listened, in spite of this experience, to "a lot of clamorous individuals who are not disinterested," and with accepting support "from an ignorant public who do not understand anything about the matter." Now, I venture to think, Mr. Bancroft notwithstanding, that the public do understand the question of safety in railway travelling at any rate, and feel that, where directors show an evident disregard of it, some greater power should be taken with the view of providing for the public safety. But we have yet a stronger assertion than this of Mr. Bancroft's; for we have Sir Edward Watkin at the annual meeting of the South Eastern Railway Company last summer saying this—

"I know that my friend Mr. Eborall occasionally seems to wince under a certain infliction. We occasionally get insulting strictures from the officers of the Board of Trade that, I assure you, are occasionally almost beyond endurance. What are these gentlemen, these military engineers, who never earned a shilling in their lives by commercial enterprise, and have no notion of working a staff of ten thousand men without military discipline; who are they who teach eminent managers of a railway, like my friend Mr. Eborall, how they ought to conduct their business? I think the interference, the insolent interference, of these individuals is becoming almost too much for practical men to bear."

That is a speech which comes from a railroad director, and I think it is hardly in accordance with the courtesy which ought to be shown to the officers of the Board of Trade, or with a regard for the safety of the public who travel by the railways; and when an explanation of his language was asked for by the President of the Board of Trade, I must say that Sir Edward Watkin's answer astonished me even more than his accusation; for, after having stated that he was perfectly willing to quote publicly from Reports of Inspecting Officers in justification of his meaning, he answered the right hon. Gentleman that he "declined to report against any particular officer or any particular Report." The truth is that he was unable to justify his statements or establish his accusation against the Inspectors of the Board of Trade. But, after all, the real practical objection of the Railway Companies is that of the expense. Well, I should like to place before the House what this question of expense really means. Now a Return has been made to us of the Compensation for Accidents which the Railway Companies have had to pay during the last few years, and I find that the total amount of that Return for personal injury to passengers and damage to goods in five years is £2,348,568. But I should point out that this sum, large as it is, does not represent the total amount of the actual loss which has to be borne by the companies in consequence of these accidents. This Return refers simply to the question of compensation for injury to passengers and damage to goods, and if we took into account the loss arising from the damage to rolling stock through accidents of this kind, the total would be an infinitely larger sum, though being mixed up with the other damage to material it is impossible to work it out. If we take the principal lines that have had the most accidents we shall find that the London and North Western, the North Eastern, the Lancashire and Yorkshire, the Midland, the Great Western, and the Great Northern, had to pay among them, in 1870, a total compensation for damage to persons and goods amounting to £297,879, and in 1871, £312,512; while five other lines, the South Western, Brighton, South Eastern, London Chatham and Dover, and North Staffordshire, had to pay £56,217 in 1870, and only £22,720 in 1871. Thus the unblocked lines had to pay in 1871 £312,512, as against the blocked lines, which paid £22,720. With regard to the expense of establishing the block system, the evidence of managers themselves proves that the expense is not so very serious in reality. We have Mr. Allport, of the Midland Railway, appearing before the Committee and giving them the results of his experience with regard to the expense, and I find that, after deducting from the 972 miles of that railway the 422 which are already under the block system, his calculation would come to £66,000 for the first establishment of that system on the remainder of the line, with an additional sum of £55,550 annually for maintenance. Now the interest on £66,000 at 5 per cent would be £3,300, and this added to the £55,550 for the maintenance annually would make a total of £58,850; but as the compensation for accidents in 1871 amounted to £46,670 the balance against the company in that year would only have been £12,180. But Mr. Johnson, the engineer of the Great Northern, makes the cost less. He puts the total at £74,000, of which £30,000 is already done, leaving for present outlay £44,000, while he puts maintenance at £28 per mile, which on 633 miles on that railway would give £17,724 for maintenance annually. Now in this case the compensation paid in 1871 amounted to £24,190; 5 per cent on £44,000, the cost of establishing the block system, comes to £2,200 and this added to £17,724 for annual maintenance would make the annual charge £19,924 as against the £24,190 of compensation in 1871. Consequently the cost would have been below the compensation paid in that year, and the company would have been gainers to that extent.

But there is another point to which I attach more or almost more importance than to any of those on which I have dwelt. I refer to the application of a sufficient proportion of break power to trains as a means of avoiding or preventing accidents. In this respect I maintain that our railways are far behind those of foreign countries. We have no code which prescribes or in any way lays down rules as to the proportion of break power which is to be employed in conducting railway traffic in this country. We find instances in which a luggage train runs into a passenger train with one guard van only attached to it; and we have evidence without end in these Reports of the Inspectors of the Board of Trade on railway accidents, of the momentum of a train going at the rate of 40 miles an hour not being stopped in less than 550 yards after the danger had been discovered, while on the foreign lines, where greater break power is used,

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

200 and 220 yards is the maximum distance required for stopping a train. Go to the guards and engine drivers in England who have been concerned in these accidents, and they will tell you that they were unable to reduce the speed in a less distance than I have stated. I have taken a little trouble to ascertain what are the rules or regulations on this point upon foreign railways. I am not referring to or advocating the use of any particular system of break power; but I cannot help mentioning one that has been put in operation on the Bavarian lines, as to which, its power of stopping a train, and the safety derived from its use, the evidence is to my mind almost overwhelming. I have here not only the Report of the officials of the Bavarian Government who examined into the merits of this break power, but a copy of the ministerial order adopting the "Heberlein Break" on the Bavarian States railways, and I find that it was applied in the first instance to what is called the Royal train the other day. But foreign railways go further than this; and I find that all the German railways have regulations for the application of break power in proportion to the gradients on different portions of their lines. I have here a copy of the rules respecting the building and traffic arrangements of railways as agreed upon by the association of managers and directors of the German railways. That is an association which comprises 99 railways, with a central office in Berlin; and it includes not only the Prussian but the Austrian and Netherlands railways. The system it has adopted is this—

"There must be in every train, besides the engine and tender breaks, so many powerful working break-mechanisms provided and attended, that with falling gradients of any considerable length on the line the proportion of axles here given shall be acted upon by breaks."

These are the proportions laid down: With passenger trains on a gradient of 1 in 500 proportion of axles to be acted upon one-eighth; 1 in 300 one-sixth; 1 in 200 one-fifth; 1 in 100 one-fourth; 1 in 80 one-third; and 1 in 40 one-half. Therefore, taking a train of 18 six-wheel carriages, such as forms an ordinary mail or express train on the London and North Western Railway, this would necessitate on a line with gradients of 1 in 100, four break carriages, while a goods train of 50 four-wheel waggons would have seven break waggons. Now, that system is universally practised throughout the railroads of Germany; and I have here also a list of the railways in France, on which they adopt a very similar proportion. On the Great Luxembourg Railway the rules are that no passenger train may be composed of more than 30 four-wheeled vehicles, and that the minimum number of breaks for each train shall be in the case of passenger trains composed of from one to eight vehicles, two breaks, one in front and the other in rear; trains composed of 9 to 16 vehicles three breaks, one in front, one in the rear, and the third in the last quarter of the train; trains composed of 16 to 25 vehicles, five breaks, one in front, one in the rear, and the others at intervals of five carriages; and trains composed of 25 to 30 vehicles, six breaks, arranged as in the last mentioned case. There is another point in favour of the adoption of a universal system of this kind, and it ought not to be overlooked when we are engaged in considering this question. Here, as I have stated, you have an association of 99 railroads working under this system of rules; and there is this advantage attaching to it, and which would attach to the universal adoption in this country of similar rules for the application of break power—namely, that the servants of the Railway Companies having once been instructed in their duty, if they change their situations and go into the employment of another Railway Company, do so with a full knowledge of the work that they have to perform. On many railroads there is already a similarity of management which has proved of great advantage in this respect. I am afraid that I have been wearying the House by going into these particulars at such a length; but there are yet other points which enter largely into the question. For example, there is the question which has been so ably dealt with by my hon. Friend the senior Member for Derby (Mr. M. T. Bass), I mean the long hours which are enforced upon railway servants. I am aware that a great deal has been done to correct that evil, but Returns and Reports upon the subject show that it is not entirely remedied. We have it stated in several of the Reports of the Railway Inspectors of the Board of Trade during the past sibility of railway directors was the only mode through which security for the public could be obtained. The officers of the Board of Trade stated that accidents occurring to the servants of Railway Companies were very seldom reported. The penalty of £20 imposed by the Act of 1871 for omission to report such accidents was altogether insufficient to secure the performance of that duty, and it ought therefore, to be increased. It would, too, be found that many accidents were occasioned by the fact that neglect on the part of railway officials was overlooked until they became indifferent to its consequences. He submitted that until the law, in cases of negligence punished not merely the servants who were immediately guilty, but those who were in authority and who had condoned previous acts of negligence, they would not have sufficient security for the travelling public. Without entering into the larger subject suggested by the Amendment to the Motion of the hon. Baronet, he could not help thinking that the management of any line of railway, the permanent way of which was out of order, or the rolling stock defective, should be taken by the State out of the hands of the Company which mismanaged it. He begged to second the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the time is come when the Government should take powers to enforce the adoption, where necessary, on Railway Companies, of additional securities for the safety of the public."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

MR. LEA, in rising to move, as an Amendment, to leave out after "when," and insert—"the railways of the United Kingdom should become the property, and be under the control and management of the State," said: Sir, I should have preferred to have brought this forward as a simple substantive Motion, but the difficulty of obtaining a day, and the opportunity that was afforded by the hon. Baronet, who has distinctly raised the question in his proposal to the House, have made me choose the present occasion. The hon. Baronet desires to control further, by powers I presume to be conferred on the Board of Trade, the working of railways. Now this is a course with which I am not inclined to concur, and I will refer in a few minutes to the reasons which I think we should consider before we further interfere with the working and management of railways, when by so doing we take away the responsibility from the present managers. It may be thought that this Amendment is not necessary, after the debate upon the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Tyrone (Lord Claud Hamilton), for the purchase of the Irish railways; but I would respectfully submit to the House that the case of the English railways rests on very different ground from that of the Irish, and it seems all the more important to me, that if we are to take any steps as suggested by the Prime Minister for the assistance of the Irish Railway Companies to render them more akin to our English railways, we ought most carefully to consider whether our own system is one that we should foster and encourage in the other parts of the United Kingdom. For this reason I believe a clear understanding of the policy to be pursued towards our English railways is most necessary at the present time. The Amendment I have to move is one, I admit, which affects interests of the greatest magnitude; but it appears to me that in this case the magnitude has been mistaken for difficulties, and that it will be found that the possibility of making this great change is much easier than at first appears when we simply look at the size of the question. And I would also say that I have not undertaken this from any antagonism to Railway Companies, for I acknowledge with gratitude the immense benefit they have been to the country in the past; and although railways have been most extravagantly and wastefully made, yet we perhaps owe to the pluck and skill of the first promoters of railways a greater extension of the system than we probably should have had, if any other method had been adopted for their introduction. Neither is it my intention to refer to the working of any particular railways, but it is evident that the immense difference that has prevailed in their management and consequent convenience to the public arising therefrom, would help to prove that by unity of management all railways might be brought up to one, and that one the most efficient standard. Nor is it sufficient to say our railways are worked safely and well, and up to the working of those

therefore, of the utmost importance that the actual facts should be clearly recognized, so that the public may become acquainted with the real alternatives which lie before them."

I do not imagine that anyone would dispute the rate at which amalgamations have been going on; but one thing is rather noticeable—that while in 1845 an Act was passed prohibiting all such amalgamation without a special Act of Parliament, the London and North-Western Railway Company has attained since then to its present size by no less than 61 amalgamations, thus showing how little power we have had, because, while the Reports of the Committees of 1844 and 1845 tend to discourage amalgamations, yet in 1846 there were actually nine amalgamations of the North-Western, and the year following there were seven more. This is the history from first to last, so that although Parliament has been very jealous of these amalgamations, they have proceeded so quickly that more than two-thirds of the Railway Companies have disappeared. Since, then, it cannot be disputed that these amalgamations must and will take place, it is well for us to look the fact fairly in the face; and I fully believe amalgamation has very much improved the accommodation given to the public, and if it could be safely relied upon should be aided rather than prevented, though I am bound to say I do not agree with the proposition of the Prime Minister, made during the discussion on the Purchase of the Irish Railways. He was inclined to offer inducement to the Irish railways to amalgamate by—after such amalgamation had taken place—advancing loans upon moderate rates of interest. Upon my view of the question, it seems as though by thus encouraging amalgamations we should simply be helping them to obtain a better bargain eventually from the State, and bring the Irish railways into the same state of difficulty that is now the case with our English railways. And since it is pretty clear that this system of amalgamation must and will go on, I would ask—what are our railways coming to in the future? And the answer is that before many years are gone the country will be mapped out into a few great districts, each district being in the hands of some monopolist Company, and the Railway Companies generally agreed not to invade or trespass upon each

"1. That Committees and Commissions carefully chosen have for the last 30 years clung to one form of competition after another; that it has, nevertheless, become more and more evident that competition must fail to do for railways what it does for ordinary trade, and that no means have yet been devised by which competition can be permanently maintained.

"2. That in spite of the recommendations of these authorities, combination and amalgamation have proceeded at the instance of the companies without check, and almost without regulation. United systems now exist, constituting by their magnitude and by their exclusive possession of whole districts monopolies to which the earlier authorities would have been most strongly opposed. Nor is there any reason to suppose that the progress of combination has ceased, or that it will cease until Great Britain is divided between a small number of great companies. It is,

other's district. And this is no distant state of things; there are plans put forward by which the number of Railway Companies shall be reduced to four, each having a district of its own; and while by this plan we shall have all the evils of a divided management, we shall have these few companies quite combined to defend themselves from any attacks by the public, and thus to all intents and purposes as strong and selfish as one single company. Are we prepared to allow the whole traffic and travelling of this country to be in the hands and at the mercy of a Board of private individuals responsible not to the public for the public good, but only to a body of shareholders for the largest possible dividend? And what else could we expect of directors elected by the shareholders of railways? When the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill was under discussion some weeks ago, the hon. Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Denison), who avowed himself a railway director, said plainly "His duty was to protect the rights and interests of a great body of shareholders." If the hon. Member in this House thinks that to be his duty, how could we expect him or any other director when at Board meetings to remember the rights and interests of the public? And what said the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid) when he moved the Amendment to the Motion of the noble Lord (Lord Claud Hamilton) for the purchase of Irish railways? He said, that at one time the directors ate up all the earnings, but the shareholders stepped in and said "You shall do what is best for us." Well, Sir, where are the interests of the public, when the interests of the shareholders have to be considered? On this point a question strikes me at once. If the motive for good management of railways now is their self-interest, where are we likely to be now that dividends are reaching generally so high a per centage? The single motive for the good management of railways will be gone, and the shareholders, not investigating the accounts of their Company, will allow the directors to waste or job away any amount they please, to the benefit of neither public nor shareholders. I think it is pretty certain we may say that the interests of the public are only to a very limited extent the interests of the shareholders, for it is obvious that it is cheaper for a Railway Company to carry one passenger for a sovereign rather than two passengers at the rate of ten shillings each. And if we have much communication with Railway Companies, we are bound to see that they know they have a monopoly, and that the public are entirely at their mercy. When the hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) moved for the remission of the Taxes on Locomotion, he said—

"Railway Companies were no lovers of strikes; but if they refused some day to convey third-class passengers from London to Scotland, in 24 hours except on account of this Government duty, no Government could withstand such a pressure as would be put upon them."—[3 Hansard, ccxv. 437.]

These words of the hon. Member I am not wishful to take as a threat, but the only inference I can draw from them is, that not only can they put the public to inconvenience, but that if the Railway Companies believe they have a grievance against the Government, it is in their power to act upon it through that public inconvenience, so that the Government of this country shall bow to their opinion, and lay their financial proposals at the feet of the Railway Companies. And then, a short time ago, another example of this railway rule was brought under my notice. The Railway Companies last autumn advanced their rates for the carriage of goods on some articles as much as twenty, thirty, or forty per cent. The manufacturers of one town, I am told, met and objected to such an advance, requesting an interview. What was the reply of the Railway Company? That they would be happy to meet the manufacturers, but they could hold out no hope of any abatement of the increased rate. And what could the manufacturers do? Why, they could only submit to the decree of the Railway Company, who have perfect arbitrary power to levy what they think is best for their own interests, without respect to the trade of the country; and if we want another instance, we have it at our very doors, for though it may have been to the interest of the Metropolitan District Railway to raise its fares on the first of this month, it cannot be said it was to the interest of the public. If, then, I look forward with great dread to the pretty certain system of arbitrary power that will exist in the hands of a body of private individuals, trading for a

their own self-interest. I cannot omit to mention other reasons for objections to the present system of railway management and control. If we look at the way Acts of Parliament are obtained, we can only come to the conclusion that there is an immense waste of time and money in obtaining those Acts. And then, when they are obtained, look at the expense in maintaining the position and monopoly of a Railway Company. There are numbers of counsel and solicitors engaged, and numbers of witnesses for and against the Bill, some to prove that the line is wanted by the public nominally, but really generally that it is wanted by some rival Railway Company to obtain possession of the district of another Company. Hon. Members who have sat upon Railway Private Bill Committees know pretty well what a waste there is, when, year after year, the same Bills for the promotion of new lines are brought before this House, and after an immense cost to both parties, are thrown out. The legal and Parliamentary expenses for the railways of the United Kingdom in the Return of 1871 amount to £250,000, but this must represent only a portion of the expenses, because numerous officers of the Companies, with immense staffs of assistants and clerks, are engaged in this Parliamentary warfare, and their expenses are paid out of other details of expenditure; and I should like to know how much of the time of Boards of Directors and general managers is spent in attending to the safe and economical working of their line, and how much to the relations of the one Company with another? Last year, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Dodson) made a vigorous attempt to amend the Private Bill legislation of the House. That attempt has not at present been successful, and one reason apparently has been that the great Railway Companies have obtained their Acts pretty satisfactorily and expensively, and they do not wish to see Acts of Parliament made cheap and easy for any new Companies that may arise. Then look at the number of competing lines that have been made all over the country, and the number of competing trains that are running—not running in a fair competition, because that is all stopped by combinations, and agreements among the Companies, but running in such a way that, while it is wasteful to the Company, does not give the full facilities to the public. And all these nominally competing trains and lines mean a great number of extra stations and a most unnecessary staff of officers to check the accounts, and work and manage the business of each Company; instead of carefully working only for public facilities, they have to follow the example of the hon. Member for Yorkshire, and work for the separate interests of the Company in which they are primarily interested. If anybody has any doubt about this, he should read the evidence before the Joint Select Committee. It is evident that while the Railway Companies are persuading Parliament of the many advantages to be gained both to themselves and the public, they are practically proving the greater gain that would result from a complete unity of management altogether. Mr. Cawkwell, in proving the advantage of the amalgamation of the London and North Western with the Lancashire and Yorkshire, referring to central management, says—

“We have, I think, eight joint committees for the management of joint lines and joint properties in one way or another; amalgamation would do away with that.”

Then he adds after—

“There would be a considerable saving, because the whole property would be used for the best advantage of the whole amalgamated concern.”

And then Mr. Cawkwell goes on to show how much better it would be at the various stations of the Companies; and he instances Preston and Huddersfield, and the Victoria Station at Manchester, upon which his evidence is rather too long to read to the House. Then, take the expense caused by the immense quantity of empty rolling stock that has to be taken all over the country, impeding the traffic, causing extra risk through the increase in size and number of trains and the consequent useless wear and tear always going on. It is very difficult to estimate the actual amount of superabundant rolling stock always in motion; but Mr. Cawkwell says—

“We could work the stock better. I explained before about the better fitting of the trains, and by working the waggons and carriages and the different rolling-stock as one, we should not have so much running of empty waggons to and fro, because we should use each other's stock to the best advantage.”

I have heard of one general manager representing that his estimate of the saving in this moving rolling stock would be one-third; and from conversation with the district managers of Railway Companies, I am told that it would be impossible to estimate the advantage that would accrue, because only those who have to arrange the intercommunication of various Companies, can tell the waste of power that goes on; and one remarkable fact is, that although general managers and Boards of Directors may wish to keep things as they are, yet the other responsible officers of Railway Companies I have met with, confess the immense advantage that would result from unity of management under Government. And, when we consider the waste of energy there is in the unnecessary number of servants at each junction of line, I cannot forget the huge system of the Railway Clearing House. I do not know the number of persons there employed, but I am told there must be about 1,000 or 1,500 clerks, whose business is to classify the amount due to each separate Company. Well, of course, if there were were but one management there would be no occasion for all this work, and the Railway Clearing House officials would be removed to a more legitimate sphere—that of working the railways directly for the public, and the saving effected by the abolition of the chief duties of the Clearing House would not be a small one. I have only mentioned a few of the wasteful results of the present system; had time permitted, I would have gone through more, especially referring to the system of compensation which I hold to be at present a vicious necessity, and could be met much more fairly by a species of insurance, but the hon. Baronet has referred so completely to the evils connected with accidents, that I need not and will not trouble the House further, as it is only in the conclusion he draws that I differ from him in a great deal of what he has said. We are often told the shareholders pay for all these frequent railway errors and mistakes: this is quite a fallacy; the shareholders nominally suffer, but the real loss falls on the public. We are beginning now to see that all the waste and bad management of railway directors affect each one of us as much as the shareholders, for we pay for all this in the fares for passenger traffic and the rates for goods. I have no doubt that most of us in travelling on the Continental have noticed the difference of fares between England and the Continental States; but I do not expect it is generally known that of all the countries of Europe, our own is the dearest for travelling on railways. I do not think the figures are quite the same now as they were some time ago, and it is possible, that taking the bulk of the English railways, they may be rather lower now than in 1866, but Mr. Gatt put a statement before the Royal Commission of 1866 which showed that while you could travel in Belgium for 100 miles first-class for 6s. 6d., and in Prussia for 13s., in the United Kingdom it would cost 18s. 9d.; and now, according to the lowest first-class fares on the English railway you would have to pay 16s. 8d. I take these countries, because in Belgium the state has always owned so much of the railway system, and so well has it answered, that, before long it seems probable that all the lines of that country will belong to and be managed by the State; while in Prussia, about half belong to the State, and the other half to private companies. Then I will venture to give another statement taken from a book that we all of us consult pretty often, and Bradshaw tells us that we can travel in Belgium for about 1d. per mile against 2d. per mile in England first-class; four-fifths of a 1d. against 1½d. for second-class; and a ½d. per mile against 1d. for third-class. And I would here make one comparison; the railways of Belgium have been greatly made and controlled by the State, and the charge is about one-half of what it is in England; the average price of telegraphic messages in the time of companies was a little over 2s. per message. Now the Government is in possession of the telegraphs, telegraphic messages can be sent for half the price, that is, 1s., and I do not think anyone will complain that the service is worse performed. If the fares for passenger traffic on our railways are dear, what is to be said about the rates for our goods traffic? There is some difficulty in obtaining an accurate idea of what the charge for goods traffic may be; it is guided by no method, it is very unintelligible and it is impossible to guess what may be considered a fair rate, and what a most unreasonable one; but I think I may safely say, they are dearer in proportion, and very considerably dearer than our passenger fares. A new tariff has been made for the Belgian State lines during the last few years, which rather modifies the one of 1862 for long distances, but as the tariff for 1862 was laid before the Irish Commission of 1868, and has been verified, and the alterations are not very great, I have taken that as a basis, until we can have an authentic table of present rates put before the House; and I am not surprised when I look at those tables that the Irish people bitterly complain of the charge on their railways. We find there that for the six classes of goods the charge is for Irish 10 miles, 2s. 6d., 3s. 3d., 3s. 9d., 5s. 6d., 8s. 9d., and 13s. 6d. Belgian 10 miles, 1s. 4d., 1s. 10d., 2s. 1d., 2s. 1d., 2s. 1d.; and a comparison of the charges for various description of goods on the English and Belgians lines shows a difference of 16s. 8d. and 10s. 1d. bar iron for 145 miles, and for silk goods insured of 65s. and 12s. 1d. for 94 miles. But I am told that, badly as our railways compare with those on the Continent for cost of freight, the anomalies on our own lines are far greater and more scandalous, and the way that small traders and those connected with the retail trade of the country are pillaged is inconceivable, and I will give one instance; for one class of goods the rate granted as a special rate to large manufacturers is 24s. while for small traders on the same line, from a station six miles nearer it is 40s. It will then be seen that while large manufacturers are paying nearly double the rate of Belgium, the small general trader of the country will be paying three or four times the Belgian rate. A short time ago the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) gave us rather a gloomy picture of the commercial prospects of the country. Well, Sir, when we know what Continental competition we have to contend with, and how much the item of carriage enters into cost of manufactures in this country, are we not putting a heavy load upon the private enterprise of this country? And though attempts will be made to disprove the figures I have laid before the House, I am convinced the great difference that exists between the English and Continental rates will sooner or later draw forth the angry protests of our English manufacturers. I hope I have shown to the House that the present system of railway management is growing into a complete monopoly amongst a few Companies, managed by men not responsible to the public; that Parliamentary interference has not been productive of any benefit, and that nothing can prevent the whole traffic of the country being at the mercy of railway directors; that this system has been most extravagant both in construction and working of railways, and the hon. Baronet who preceded me has fully shown that it is not especially conducive to the safety either of officials or of travellers generally. And it will be also observed that this country, the cradle of railways, is not the first in the world, either for safety or economy of working. And the question arises, shall we be satisfied with things as they are, and if not, what course shall we pursue? I only know of three courses open to us. The first is—to leave Railway Companies alone, and let them arrange the traffic as they please, and amalgamate and combine until they are the authoritative rulers of all inland traffic, thus trusting to the public spirit and insight of directors to act as leniently as they think fit. Does the past give us much hope that this is likely to be satisfactory to the country? I think not. The next course is—that you would try how far it is possible to control Railway Companies by Board of Trade Inspectors, or by rules and regulations that you may put upon them. The Report of the Joint Select Committee plainly shows that no attempts at control—less than that of taking the whole control—will end in anything but the entire triumphs of the railway interests, because you cannot separate power from responsibility. And then, the only other course left open for us to follow is the one I suggest—namely, for the Government to take the railways into their own possession and manage them itself, on behalf of the country. By this course you have all the benefits that would arise both in facilities and economy from unity of management—the Board with whom this power would lie having no interest to serve except that of the country. We should obtain lower fares and rates, thus helping the free communication with all classes, and materially assisting the trade of the country in its competition with that of other nations; we should enable the Post Office to further increase its beneficial operations, and, though I am not inclined to fall in with the opinion that the taxes of the country should be raised by maintaining anything like present rates and fares, yet I believe we should generally have a balance of a million or two at the end of each financial year, that would go to reduce the National Debt. There are many other advantages that I could have mentioned, but I would rather occupy the time of the House in referring to the objections that are and will be raised against this proposal. I believe all the objections may be summed up in one word, and that word is "fears." I think I may safely say that every argument that has been used against the purchase of the railways by the State, has been urged before against the Post Office, the commencement of the Post Office Savings Banks, and lastly, the purchase of the Telegraphs; and yet, would anyone wish to see the conveyance and delivery of our letters in the hands of half-a-dozen private companies? Or, does anyone wish to return to the days of private telegraph companies? And so, when the great change may have been made in our railway management, people will wonder how it was we were so contented with the wasteful monopolies of the present day. Well, then, what are the objections that are urged? First and foremost is the one of the amount of patronage it would place in the hands of the Government of the day. I have heard a good deal of the evils of Government patronage; but all I can say is, I cannot imagine where such patronage would exist. The filling up the various offices would lie with the Central Board, or with certain district powers, who for their credit in working the railways would fill up such vacancies with the best men they could select, and I say they are as likely to make as good appointments as are made by present Boards of Railway Directors; and reference is made to the effect upon elections with some 300,000 railway employés; that seems to me an argument that will not bear inspection; how many constituencies are there at the present time where 2 per cent of the population would be employed by the Government upon railways, and even granting that there were a large number in a few constituencies, is it a benefit or not to any Government at an election time? The Government of hon. Gentlemen opposite was in power at the last General Election, but I cannot see that it was the slightest service to them in dockyard towns, where, far more than can ever occur by railways, Government control could be used; and has it ever been said that the Post Office, with 50,000 employés, has ever had anything to do with deciding an election? And if those influences have not acted before the introduction of secret voting, are they likely to act at all now? I cannot believe for a moment that vicious political patronage could exist; and at the first idea of anything of the kind the public, who keep so jealous an eye upon everything, would soon prevent it. And we must recollect that it is more likely that public opinion would be too vigilant—everybody almost travels upon railways, and everybody, more or less, understands somewhat of the advantages of the management of railways—and instead of there being any possibility of slurring over mistakes, the public will be more likely to be too exacting if any mistakes or errors are made. It seems to me that any of the evils that may arise from patronage are more likely to arise under the management of Boards of Directors than under that of a responsible Government. Then comes the argument of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who says it is the duty of the Government to govern and not to trade; but he says very truly that this is an argument which should not be pressed when a great public advantage, amounting almost to a necessity, would be obtained. The right hon. Gentleman acquiesced in the purchase of the telegraphs. If an equal public advantage would be obtained by the purchase of the railways, how could he refuse? And is there any reason why our telegraphic messages and our letters should be carried more economically or safer than our bodies? I fully agree with the idea that a Government should not interfere further than is necessary with the action and enterprise of the people; but I believe there is as great a principle on the other side of this question, and that is that the roads which have become by the advance of science and engineering the great highways of this and future generations, should be as open and free to all classes amongst us as it is in the power of man to make them. Then, another fear that people express is, that railways could not be managed and worked by the State. Why not? Why could not the best railway managers and directors form a sort of Board, responsible only to Parliament and the country, for the well working of railways? Cannot we believe that the skill and attention that distinguish some of our best railway managers would be given equally to the State, as are now given to railway shareholders? And why should not the various district managers be able to arrange and work the traffic in their various districts as well, and a great deal better too, when they have only to study the arrangements with a view to the public convenience, rather than, as they have to do now, to arrange it with a view of meeting, or not meeting the trains of other Companies' lines? I maintain that, under such circumstances, the working of railways might be much more easily and better performed. Then, my hon. Friend the Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid) referred to the difficulties of controlling the operatives, and talked of gigantic unions and strikes. I say we have as much and more fear of that at the present time. And who is there so proper to deal with that as the Government, who would be compelled to see that justice was done to the employees as well as the public, and who would have the power of controlling such organization as might exist? But what are the facts of the case? We have had strikes amongst engine-drivers and porters; but when have we ever had a strike amongst dockyard men or any other Government servants? I do not pretend the Government can make it smooth and easy sailing for every class of their servants; but I believe they can be the best judges of what is due to their servants, and what is due to the public, because they know that erring on either side will only bring upon them public reprobation. And there have been complaints amongst Railway Companies' servants of long hours of work and underpay that my hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Mr. M. T. Bass) has constantly been investigating, and which all of us must admit are, unfortunately, too often true. Another objection that has been raised to this proposal is this one—that if a new line is required it may become a hustings question, or it may prevent any new lines being made. There is no doubt that it would prevent a number of nominally competing but really useless lines; we have now too many of such lines, because the public encourages the making of them with the vain hope of obtaining competition, but it really ends in a combination with the other Companies; and then the rates and fares have to bear the cost of the construction of these new lines, when the old ones were ample for the traffic. It seems to me a simple question, because there would be a special committee of the Central Board to consider all applications for new lines; and the only two things that would have to be proved would be that the line was really desired by the inhabitants of the district, and that it would pay the expense of construction and working, and the interest of money expended upon it. I do not imagine there would be much difficulty raised to the making of a new line, if the local authorities or some responsible persons would guarantee the safety of the expenditure, if reasonable proof could not be given of the probability of the new line paying expenses. The only other difficulty of any importance raised against this proposal is what may be called the financial one. If I do not state to the House how I believe this question may be met, it is only because there is very great difficulty in dealing with figures in a speech—especially such enormous totals as are contained in the value and income of Railway Companies. One of the first questions which is asked I find to be—Will it pay? I am bound to admit that a great deal more information will be required before a correct idea of the value of the present railways can be stated. I believe the Government did obtain accurate and proper information of the value of the Irish Railways, and there need be no difficulty in obtaining the value of the English and Scotch ones, I wish to avoid all figures, or I would have shown the absurdity of some of the calculations that have been put forward by some gentlemen connected with Railway Companies, put forward, I presume with the idea of obtaining a better price when the time arrives for the bargain to be made. I believe, however, there can be no doubt that the purchase of the lines by the State would be a remunerative transaction; and there are two essential reasons, putting aside the question that Government could, under a watchful public, be more likely to manage the railways well and economically than a private company. I say one great advantage for economy will be found in unity of management. The late Mr. Graves, the respected Member for Liverpool, who was no theorist, but a cautious, prudent man, stated it as his opinion that with unity of management the working of railways would result in a saving of 25 per cent from the working expenses. From conversation with railway officials I am inclined to think that after a few years trial, 25 per cent would be rather under than over the estimate, but Mr. Graves' estimate would result in a saving of no less than about £6,000,000 a-year. I believe the other essential reason would be that, granted we had arrived at a fair amount of the value of railway property, the money would be had at a lower rate of interest by the security of the State, rather than by the security of a Railway Company. I believe, from these two sources so large a gain would be obtained, that a large reduction in the rates and fares would take place, and this would act as a stimulus to the trade and the travelling capabilities of the public to so great an extent, that the receipts would soon amount to the total before the reduction had taken place, when fresh reductions would be made. This is a tendency which we see over and over again in the revenue of the country, and it will undoubtedly follow in the railway management. I feel that I have said only a very small fraction of what might be urged in favour of so great a change. The railways of our country have been laid out without method or arrangement; they are dear beyond precedent, and precautions for safety are not readily adopted; also, the power that will lie in the hands of a few combined Railway Companies is opposed to the principle of a free and responsible Government, and must be a source of irritation and danger in coming years. What is to be our policy in the future? Are we to attempt to resist a policy of amalgamation, when such an attempt will fail, and is opposed to the interests of the country? Are we to follow the desires of the hon. Baronet and further control the working of railways, when we know that control without responsibility has always failed, and must always fail? Or, are we to take the only logical course, and face the difficulty by taking upon ourselves the control and responsibility? We have already delayed this question too long, and I would appeal to the Government boldly to take a course which I believe is inevitable, and one which, the sooner it is undertaken the better it will be for the welfare and the prosperity of the country. The hon. gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. PIM seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "when" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Railways of the United Kingdom should become the property, and be under the control and management of the State,"—(Mr. Lea),—instead thereof.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he hoped that the hon. Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lea) would excuse him if he declined to follow him over the wide field he had traversed on the subject of his Amendment. The question of the purchase of the railways by the State was of too vast importance to be tacked on to a Motion neither intended nor calculated to raise it. In respect to the real question raised by the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), he entirely concurred with what he had said at the outset. Whatever conclusions might be ultimately arrived at, he believed that such discussions as the one initiated by the hon. Baronet tended to produce great good, and to effect that object which they had all equally at heart—namely, to render more secure the lives and property of those who travelled by our railways. He had every reason to believe that the hon. Baronet had already conferred much benefit on the community at large by his previous efforts in the same direction. Without, however, meaning to lessen the importance of this discussion, or to weaken the attempts of the hon. Baronet, or any other Member, to improve the existing state of things, he thought it his duty to mention a few facts and figures in connection with this subject of railway accidents. The large increase in the number of accidents returned on our railways during the past year referred to by the

hon. Baronet was more apparent than real, and was due to the more accurate and searching character of the Returns, and not to an actual increase in the number of casualties. Since the year 1865 the number of accidents annually reported had continually decreased until last year, when they suddenly increased again; but it was a singular fact, and one which would afford a clue to the real state of things, that whereas the number of passengers killed in 1865 was 22, only 20 were killed in 1872. In 1850 the proportion of passengers killed to the total number of passengers was 1 in 4,500,000, whereas in 1872 the proportion was 1 in 19,000,000. In 1858 there were 139,000,000 passengers conveyed over the lines of the kingdom, and in 1871 that number had increased to 375,000,000. The number of locomotives in 1858 was 5,445, and in 1871 they amounted to 10,490; vehicles other than locomotives in 1858 were 175,000, and in 1871 they had increased to 311,000. It could not be said there was proof of such a formidable increase of accidents or of a railway carelessness and recklessness as to justify them in taking immediate action on the subject. He had no intention of deprecating the necessity of inquiries, the only question being whether the time had arrived for compulsory legislation. For his own part, he saw no reason why they need be contented with the present state of things, or why they should tolerate the negligence of Railway Companies in not adopting those means of safety which were shown to be necessary. With all that had been said by the hon. Baronet on that point he was able to agree; but he must observe that this subject had not been neglected during the present Session, because great attention had been paid to it in the other House of Parliament. No one could fairly judge whether or not legislation on this subject was at the present moment necessary without having made himself master of the evidence taken before the Lords' Committee upon the Bill introduced by Lord Buckhurst. The hon. Baronet thought he had greatly improved the position of the question by not taking the course taken by Lord Buckhurst in the other House. He (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) was not able to agree with the hon. Baronet on the point. The hon. Baronet appeared to think he was doing a kindness to the Board of Trade by not drawing a hard-and-fast line; but the hon. Baronet, if he (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) understood the Motion aright, proposed to impose on the Board of Trade an amount of power and discretion which no Department of the Government would be inclined to exercise, or the public to tolerate. Lord Buckhurst did not do that. He introduced a Bill which said in so many words that Railway Companies should supply two well-ascertained improvements—the block system and the system of interlocked signals. In the course of the inquiry on his Bill he was driven out of that absolute method of legislation, and proposed a provision which would afford time to certain railways to introduce these two systems, and made other exceptions. If there was to be any Bill of that kind, he (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) thought Lord Buckhurst's was the sort of Bill we must have. But the Committee obtained information which greatly affected their judgment. They found that the before-mentioned improvements were being introduced on the South-Eastern, the Bristol and Exeter, Midland, Lancashire and Yorkshire, Metropolitan, Caledonian, North Eastern, Great Northern, London and North Western, London and South Western, North British, and Highland Railways. Under these circumstances, the Committee recommended that the Bill should not be proceeded with during the present Session. They recommended however, that the Board of Trade should call for such information as might enable the Inspectors in their annual Reports to state the progress made in the adoption on all passenger lines of these improvements. Parliament would then be in a condition to decide whether more should be done to compel the adoption of them. It was evident that these improvements could not be produced in a day. The Committee recommended that Parliament should at least wait and see whether Railway Companies continued to introduce these improvements and fulfilled these large promises which they made to the Committee before resorting to compulsory legislation, which might be necessary, but which ought certainly to be avoided if possible. Of course, if every Railway Company was to be compelled under penalty to provide these appliances, a very considerable time must necessarily elapse before they could make it compulsory. He quite agreed, however, with the Committee of the House of Lords in the belief that nothing was lost by their not resorting to compulsory legislation. If that had not been his belief, it would have been his duty to have brought in a Bill on the subject, and he should not have waited for the Resolution of the hon. Baronet. Considering, therefore, the difficulties of the subject, he did not consider its present position unsatisfactory, and he believed that the attention which had been bestowed upon it by the House of Lords and the House of Commons would have a powerful effect. With regard to the Returns from the Railway Companies, he proposed to bring in a Bill upon the subject before the close of the present Session, requiring them to furnish Returns of the extent to which they are introducing the block system and interlocking signals. With these explanations he trusted the hon. Baronet would rest satisfied.

MR. GOLDSMID regretted that the right hon. Gentleman should have risen so soon, because, as the House was in a few minutes to be subjected to the Parliamentary process known as "a count," independent Members had no opportunity of speaking, and the only result of the debate would be an official expression of opinion. He maintained that the figures adduced by the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) were exceedingly misleading; indeed, in that respect they were only surpassed by the inaccurate figures of the hon. Member (Mr. Lea) who had moved the Amendment, which was by no means relevant to the question. He (Mr. Goldsmid) would be perfectly ready to meet the hon. Member for Kidderminster on the question he had raised; but as it had nothing to do with the Motion of the hon. Baronet, he did not propose to answer him now. The hon. Baronet recommended the use of the block system and interlocking as the universal panacea against railway accidents, and had quoted in support of it the authority of Captain Tyler. But what was Captain Tyler's own practice, where he could make his wishes respected? Why, Captain Tyler was an active Director of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, on which line the system was totally unknown. Now, on the subject of accidents, he (Mr. Goldsmid) desired to point out that for several years there had been a continuous decrease in the number of accidents on the railways of the United Kingdom, so that one of the safest places out of a house for an Englishman was in a railway carriage. There were more people killed in the streets of London every year than by the railways in five years. In 1847-8 one person was killed out of every 4,700,000 carried on the railways; while last year only one person out of every 31,000,000 carried was killed. Nor was this all, for there was yearly an enormous increase in the number of passengers carried, as well as in the number of miles travelled. The number of passengers carried in 1871 was more than 375,000,000, besides season ticket holders, whose number was over 188,000, and whose journeys were not counted. Moreover, the amount of compensation for railway accidents was decreasing every year, and the management of our railways would now compare most favourably with that of Continental lines. In France, where the railways were to a modified extent under Government control, all possible means were taken to conceal railway accidents, and the public had less security than if the lines were absolutely under the management of directors responsible to the shareholders and the public. Though he had no connection with any railway directors, he was certain that it must be their desire, as reasonable men, in their own interests, to lessen the number of accidents as far as possible. In the coaching days accidents were constantly occurring, but they were not noticed by the public. Again, railway servants who lost their lives frequently did so in consequence of their disregard of rules and regulations laid down for their special guidance and protection. How, then, could it be said that the directors were responsible for those accidents?

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. GOLDSMID, resuming, said, he had pointed out that the number of passengers carried was largely increasing, but it must be also remembered that besides this increase, there had also been an enormous increase in the carriage of goods, which complicated the traffic; and that, notwithstanding this, the safety with which passengers were carried had increased. In 1871 more than 67,000,000 tons of general merchandize were carried by Railway Companies in the United Kingdom, and 102,000,000 tons of minerals in the same year, besides luggage, horses, stock, carriages, parcels, mails, &c., &c.; and yet the proportion of fatal accidents on the railroads with so enormous a traffic was only as 1 to 31,000,000. No other country could show figures so favourable, and as no sufficient reason had in any view been shown for the adoption of the Motion, he hoped the House would not agree to it.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS expressed his astonishment at the remark of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Goldsmid) to the effect that the safest place out-of-doors was in a railway carriage. If he (Mr. Chambers) walked through his park, then, it would be dangerous, and he had better go to the next railway station and get into a third-class carriage. If he happened to walk along a country lane or anything of the sort, it would be dangerous, and he had better walk to the railway station forthwith and get into an express train or an excursion train. That was the proper thing to do in order to be perfectly safe.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at a quarter after Eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 21st May, 1873.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS REPEAL (1866—1869) BILL—[BILL 29.]

(Mr. William Fowler, Mr. Jacob Bright,
Mr. Mundella.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. W. FOWLER: I rise to move the second reading of this Bill, and, in doing so, I do that which is very painful to me, because I dislike to bring again before the House a subject in itself so repulsive. If last year we had divided on this question I might have thought it consistent with my duty not to have brought it on again in the present Parliament. Hon. Members know that since 1870—three years ago, within three days—we have had no division on the Main Question, but only on Supply or on the Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate. Since that time the Royal Commission has sat and reported. Two years ago, on the 14th of August, I made a Motion on going into Committee of Supply, but it was impracticable to get a proper division at that season of the year. Now, I wish to make one preliminary observation, in which I think the right hon. Gentleman who is going to move the rejection of the Bill will agree. If he is right, these Acts should be extended to the whole Empire. If he is wrong, they ought to be repealed. Our present position is entirely wrong; it is inconsistent with reason and logic. We are professing to benefit a particular class, and refuse that benefit to another far more numerous class. Yet, for all practical purposes, they are in the same position; for I will remind the right hon. Gentleman that if it be true, that soldiers and sailors, under our peculiar military system, are in a painful position as regards celibacy, the same thing is true of a far larger army of young men throughout the country, who are equally incapable of marrying. If I am wrong, I will frankly confess it, and vote for the extension of these Acts. If I am right, I am logical in asking for the repeal of these Acts. Two questions arise in this matter: the first is as to the facts of the case, and the second as to the principle on which legislation of this kind is founded. I have experienced a painful sense of the difficulty of arriving at facts from the Papers and statistics presented to us. Witnesses, apparently equally able to speak on many questions, are inexplicably at variance. The confusion is equal to what one meets with in the Court of Chancery in a lunacy or engineering case, when the scientific witnesses give evidence diametrically opposed to one another. I need hardly remind the House of the nature of these Acts. In the year 1864 an Act was passed which substantially gave to a policeman power to report to a magistrate that he had "good cause to believe" any given woman to be diseased, and therefore a fit subject to be examined, and taken to the hospital, if found diseased. That Act lasted till 1866, when the women were subjected to what is called periodical examination—that is to say, everyone of the women in the towns known or believed by the police to be fit subjects to come under the Acts, has, from time to time, to submit herself for examination. The object of this was to take care that if she were not well, she should be confined to the hospital until she should be cured. Another Act was passed in 1869, and its most important provision was that a voluntary submission by a woman had the same effect as an order by a magistrate, made after considering the facts. Now, I have to remark first, that the object of the Act of 1864 is not to diminish vice, but disease. There is not a word in that Act about doing anything for the reformation of women; it simply deals with the physical aspect of the question. The same remark applies to the Act of 1866, as it first came into the House; but a Select Committee who considered it, on account mainly of a protest of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford, and the right hon. Gentleman the present Commissioner of Works, inserted a clause, ordering that some provision should be made for the religious care of the women while they were in hospital. But be it observed that no woman under this law is to be in hospital except while she is ill. When well, she has a right to go about her business immediately. Supporters of the Acts rely on two sets of results, the moral and physical; but the statistics on which they depend are extremely unsatisfactory. Many of them are false on the face of them, as I shall have presently to show, and it is impertinent to ask us to legislate on such a basis. With regard to the moral results, there is one important preliminary observation to be made—namely, that these Acts were passed, not with the object of moral reformation, but with the object of preventing injury to the Army and Navy. Parliament interfered because soldiers and sailors were injured by this disease. This is proved by the literature of the question abundantly, nor is it surprising that this should be the case, for there was nothing in the previous history of this question to justify the assumption that there would be any great moral results from such legislation, because towns on the Continent where this system, or something like it, had been in existence many years, did not present a better appearance than the towns of England. On the contrary, their moral position was, and is, atrociously bad. Very eminent persons have used language with reference to the present condition of Paris, Hamburg, and Berlin, which I hardly like to quote to the House. Moreover, some so-called moral results mentioned in the Papers laid before the House are not the natural products of the Acts. For instance, when the police come forward, as they are said to do, and take a sort of paternal part towards those unfortunate women—warning them from their course of life, and so forth—they are doing that which the Act never gave them power to do. The Act of Parliament requires them to bring these women under examination. It may be very satisfactory that they should take a paternal interest in the well being of the women, but that is the result of their natural kindness, and is not required of them by the law. I will now mention a few of these so-called moral results. Great stress has been laid upon the alleged diminution of the women in towns, but these figures, especially with reference to Devonport and Plymouth, have been contradicted over and over again before the Royal Commission by the local police. Statements made by the Secretary of State before his constituents, on the authority of these Returns, have been repudiated by the magistrates of the towns to which they refer. These figures still remain among the statistics as if they had been affirmed in the most solemn and deliberate manner. As long ago as 1869 these figures were denied by Mr. Swain, a surgeon, acting under the Acts. He read a Paper to the Bristol Social Science Association, in which he said—

"We have been lately told that the number of prostitutes in our neighbourhood has diminished from 2,000 in 1864, to 770 at the present time. We have also been told, as a proof that vice has materially diminished, that clandestine prostitution has much lessened. Now, many people who are well able to judge, assert that there never were so many as 2,000 public prostitutes in the three towns, and although there are only 770 names now on the police register, it is believed impossible that that number represents the entire body of women who practice prostitution at the present. As far as Devonport is concerned, I know on the best authority, that the number of women has slightly increased during the last two years. It is thought that the gentleman who made this statement has been wrong at both ends—in overstating the number of prostitutes in the towns in 1864, and in understating the numbers at present practising this vocation. But to go on to assert that with this enormous decrease in the number of public prostitutes, clandestine prostitution has also diminished, is really to state a fact which runs counter to the experience of everyone who has studied the subject, which is, that clandestine prostitution invariably increases with the decrease of the number of women who gain their livelihood as public prostitutes."

Mr. Wreford, head of the local police, stated before the Royal Commission that Mr. Anniss' estimate was excessive. Dr. Row, a magistrate of the district, said the same thing. Mr. Wakeford, the superintendent of police under the Acts, described it as a "loose calculation." Mr. Wolferstan, surgeon for years to the Royal Albert Hospital, who knows more about it than any other man, also denies the statistics; and Mr. Ryder, a magistrate of the town, says there were never so many as 2,000 prostitutes in the towns, "nor anything like it." This number would show that 1 woman out of every 12, between the ages of 14 and 34, was a common prostitute. This the people of the neighbourhood indignantly repudiate. The case of Portsmouth is also curious. There the metropolitan police gave a lower estimate than the local, so this higher figure was put on the Return; whereas, at Devonport, the figure of the metropolitan police, as being far higher than that of the local, was taken. Mr. Westbrook, who is the Inspector at Portsmouth, gave evidence of the way in which these statistics were got up. He said, in answer to Question No. 11,465—

"These things are got up very often. I went to Southampton to put the Acts in force, and there I saw the Superintendent, or Inspector, and asked him, 'How many prostitutes are there here?' He said, '1,300.' I said, 'You have a large number to follow.' 'Yes,' he said; 'I always make a return of 800 every year. He sent an active officer with me for four days and we got 220 prostitutes, and about a great number of them there is a doubt, and now there are 120 at Southampton."

This is the evidence of a police Inspector acting under the Act of Parliament, and we are asked to take these figures and make laws upon them. It is evident that the police cannot know all the women. It is notorious on the Continent that the most dangerous women are those outside the power of the police altogether. There was abundant evidence to show that this is also the case at Plymouth and Portsmouth. The evidence told of a number who were on the border line, and depend upon it there are a great many more of whom our informants know nothing. If there is a belief among these men that a reduction would be agreeable at headquarters, they might put any number down. ["Oh!"] I do not say they do; but how can you say they do not? An Inspector might say—"This and that one is doubtful, I'll not put them down because I don't want to make a heavy return." I do not say it is so; but I say this is a very nice question, and it is very difficult for the police to say there are so many and no more. Now, I assert that all that has been done by the use of the powers given to the police has been done in other places without the aid of such Acts as these. There is a very remarkable Return, dated 1872, on the subject of the diminution of low public-houses in London and the country. I find a most extraordinary diminution came about altogether independently of these Acts. Take the metropolis. In 1867 there were 1,787 houses of bad character, in 1871 they had been reduced to 1,139. Another remarkable Return, made to the municipality of Glasgow, shows that in the year 1869 the number of thefts by prostitutes was 463; in 1870, 332; in 1871, 259; and last year, 188. In the year 1869 the number of thefts in brothels was 683; in 1870, 475; in 1871, 199; and last year, 39. The number of brothels in the city in the year 1869 was 211; in 1870, 204; in 1871, 79; and last year, upon 20th December, 50. In the Sixty-sixth Annual Report by the Directors of the Glasgow Lock Hospital, issued for 1871, the following paragraph appears—namely—

"In submitting the Sixty-sixth Annual Report of the Glasgow Lock Hospital, the Directors have, in the first place, to record a marked falling off in the number of patients—the number admitted during the year 1871 having been 394, as against 534 in 1870, showing a decrease of no less than 140."

This result has been brought about simply by the action of the police, without any of the extraordinary and indefensible powers conferred by the Contagious Diseases Acts. It shows how much may be done without offending the moral sense of any body. [Mr. BRUCE: It is under a special Act.] It may be a special Act, but it is not a Contagious Diseases Act. If there is any new law required to give the police fuller powers, I am not the man to oppose it; but I object to this peculiar legislation. I do not want to say anything offensive, but I should like to see a Return, if it were possible to get it, of the women who have been forced over the precipice, as it were, and made prostitutes by these Acts. [Mr. MUNDELLA: Hear, hear!] I should like to see how many women have been marked down by the policeman, and have been taken off to the examining-room and made prostitutes when they did not wish to be. Such a Return would be very instructive. People tell us there is no difference between these women. I say there is the greatest possible difference in their condition, and that it requires greater discrimination than we can expect a policeman to possess to distinguish one class of women from the other. The next point made by the supporters of the Acts is that the number of young girls in the towns is reduced; but Mr. Westbrook, in answer to Questions Nos. 11,137-8, says—

"That is the only fault of the Acts, it gives young girls too much encouragement. In what way? Because a young girl is almost sure to take the disease, and she is taken into the hospital. There is a young girl of 18 who has been in the hospital 17 times, and in such hospitals as they are it is like turning young pickpockets among housebreakers. They are ruined after having been in the hospital, because there are such things going on there."

That is the evidence of an Inspector under the Acts. The people of Devonport do not believe they ever had these 212 under 16, and 419 under 17, as is stated in the Returns; while Portsmouth had only 31 under 16 and 66 under 17 at the same time. This would give one in every seven or eight girls of that age in the Devonport district as common prostitutes. The people of Devonport look with horror at that statement of Mr. Annis, and I say that the evidence of such men ought not to be taken by this House as a basis for legislation. The great reduction in the number of girls is not conclusively proved. There may be a decrease, but I say the number existing when the Acts commenced has been exaggerated most skilfully. Supposing the number on the register had decreased, the experience of Paris is that though you may decrease them, a corresponding increase arises among clandestine prostitutes. But it is said, again, that the number of bad houses has been reduced by these Acts. I say the reduction is not due to the Acts. I have shown you that the number of bad houses in Glasgow and in London has been decreased without these Acts. It is true Glasgow has a special Act, but the police have abundant power under the ordinary law to put down these houses, and it is a mere fallacy to attribute the suppression of such places to these Acts. There is not a syllable in the Acts about putting down such houses; but, on the other hand, there is no doubt that the Acts have put the police en rapport with the brothel-keepers, who give the police very "valuable information," and this gives a quasi sanction to those places which the law does not countenance. [Mr. MUNDELLA: Hear!] The Bill of the hon. Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) has had an immense effect in reducing the number of these bad houses. That must not be forgotten. But the figures are here again most perplexing. I have a table in my hand which ought to make the House pause before it trusts to statistics. In Paper 149 we find it stated that in Devonport district there were, in 1865, 356 brothels, but the "judicial statistics" show us there were only 159 brothels there in that year. I do not know which is right and which is wrong, but it shows that the figures given in Paper 149 are not to be trusted. Another point much insisted on is the alleged reclamations, but they really form no part of the system. There is nothing about reclamation in the Act of Parliament. Even those who are supposed to be reclaimed are not really reclaimed. Annis had the effrontery to say that he knew all about the women who went off his register, and he stated that 90 per cent of them were actually reclaimed, while the chaplain of the hospital, Mr. Hawker, and Miss Bull, the matron, said this was a gross exaggeration. She said that not more than 5 per cent were reclaimed. Mr. Westbrook said that policemen knew very little about it. In the nature of things they could not. The women go away and are lost sight of. The policemen must then leave them. They may have returned to their friends, but the chances were they had gone to another district. These Returns put some down as married, but I am sorry to say that numbers of women carry on their trade after they are married. Women entered as "restored to friends" or "married," cannot be regarded as reclaimed, but it is sad to observe how few are returned as having gone so far as that. In 1872 there were 3,484 cases—I do not say individual women—who entered the hospital, of whom only 252 entered homes. But if the House is so anxious to reclaim, why does not it assist the Rescue Societies, who are languishing for want of funds? These Returns are, as I said before, most deceptive, because, even of those who enter homes, so many return to their wretched occupation. Miss Brown said she left her place as a matron because these women came back so repeatedly that she was discouraged. It is a very curious thing that the proportion of those who "go back to their former pursuits," as the Return says, at Devonport, was 48 per cent in 1865, and 83 per cent in 1872. Mr. Simon, in his famous Report, (11th Report to Privy Council), speaking of reclamation, says, at page 11—

"I fear, however, that such hopes as it at first sight would seem to justify, as to possible moral results of a Government superintendence of prostitution, would on any large scale show themselves essentially delusive; not, perhaps, as regards individual reclamations . . . but as regards the statistics of prostitution broadly and practically considered. If prostitution is really to be diminished, the principles of those who would diminish it must be preventive."

I believe the opinion expressed in these words is at the bottom of all sound legislation. Is it likely there should be much reclamation among women who know that they are taken care of by the State until they are well and can do no more harm by their trade? A woman knows that the object of the State is, not that she should be restored to virtue, but that she should be made clean, and that the law has nothing to do with her when once she is restored to health. We have a good deal of evidence upon this point. The surgeon of the Royal Albert Hospital said—"The women consider themselves as kept clean by the State for the use of men." Miss Brown said they thought themselves "Government women." In the nature of things, such a system tends to harden the women. Nine out of ten of these women are examined when they are perfectly well. Tens of thousands are examined every year who are not diseased. One doctor examined 70 or 80 in succession in one day without finding one diseased. The French women, long subject to this system, are absolutely impervious to moral influence, and evidence had been given by numerous doctors of the hardening effects of the examinations. One policeman, a witness before the Royal Commission, gave up a good position because he was disgusted with the business, and Dr. Routh says, "I treat her as a brute" in so examining her. Mr. Thomas and Mrs. Cook say the same. Evidence was also given of the bad effect of mixing women, younger and older, the hardened and the recent offender, in the examination-room. The scene of these women trooping down to the examining-rooms is most demoralizing even to boys and girls at school. Yesterday I presented a Petition from the inhabitants of Southampton living near the room complaining of the nuisance to them and their families of the proximity of such a place. But it is said that women are deterred from becoming prostitutes by this system. The evidence upon this point is very contradictory; but, however this may be, I am sorry to say that when the women are brought under the Acts it tends to keep them longer in the profession. Under ordinary circumstances they do not continue in their life much more than a year on an average. Miss Bull speaks very strongly upon this subject; she says:—(7836) "that periodical examination has a great tendency to harden and keep women in that life." It is, however, said, that whatever else may be alleged and denied, the condition of towns has greatly improved since these Acts came in force, and we have had a Return from Dr. Sloggett on this head. I must say I have very little confidence in the statements made in this Return. Yesterday morning I met a visiting magistrate of Dover, who denied a statement to the effect that the number of female inmates of the gaol had been reduced by the Acts. [SIR JOHN TRELAWNY: Name.] I will give his name to anybody who wants it. He will be quite ready to back up his statements before this House or anywhere else. He says, the Acts had nothing to do with the small number of these prisoners. The Vicar of Windsor, too, has stated that the closing of bad houses there was the result of his representations to the Mayor, and not the effect of the Acts. I have been shocked to read a great deal in this Return about the religious services carried on in the hospitals. The women are supposed to recite that prayer, praying to be delivered from fornication and all other deadly sins, while the whole cause of their being there is that they may be made clean to go out and commit fornication. Every woman knows very well that the intention of this Act of Parliament is to clean her up and make her fit for this horrible business. ["No, no!"] Then what does it mean? Now, as to the condition of the towns, we have better evidence than this Return. Referring to the alleged improvement of the district, we read in The Devonport Independent of the 8th of October, 1871, as follows:—

"The clandestine outlets of this stream of hideous vice have been greatly multiplied, and few people who reside in this district would believe that the number of absolute prostitutes is one less than it ever was."

["Oh, oh!"] Well, if the people of the neighbourhood are not to be believed who shall we trust? Dr. Row, a magistrate of the same district, says, they have as many rows in the streets from these women as ever, and in another answer he tells us that prostitutes are a petted class, and that they are as numerous as ever. Mr. Wolferstan says, distinctly, there is no improvement, and that men "felt they were safe and indulged more freely." Captain Browne gave some remarkable evidence. He says he heard a colonel tell the men, when on parade, that they must take care to go with clean women. The same witness says that the women are more insolent and that there was more solicitation. Mr. Westbrook said, there is no decrease of solicitation in Portsmouth. Even Dr. Staggitt admitted there was no change in the habits of the men. It would be an abuse of terms to call any such results as those mentioned by the advocates of the Acts, moral. All the Acts do is to make the occupation apparently more respectable. Dr. Barr said (13,861)—

"It has made the prostitute a more respectable person. I cannot answer it in any other way. If you look on prostitution as an institution and a required one, I would say then that it has made prostitution more respectable. It has certainly made the prostitute a more respectable woman."

There is a very large "if" there, "If you look on prostitution as an institution," and that is what we do not allow. Mr. Webster, a minister, stated that a soldier had made the following remark to him—

"It seems very strange that the authorities should provide chaplains for the Army, and compel soldiers to go to church, where they pray 'From fornication and all other deadly sins, good Lord deliver us,' and yet support the Contagious Diseases Act and keep up regimental bazaars in India and so on, by which men may indulge in vice with ease."

I agree with that. And now I ask the House to observe a very important point. If there is so great a desire for moral results, how is it that no pains are taken about any of these women until they become diseased. Nine out of every ten are free from disease, consequently very few of them are helped. When you have once got this woman, if you have a moral object, you ought, whether she is diseased or not, to bring moral suasion to bear upon her, and not to clean her up and send her away. Again, to serve another inconsistency. You try to help a man who gets a disease by wrong act, but you do not help a man who catches fever or small-pox through no fault of his own. The spirit of the law is to help those who may have a disease, which they need not have, if they would but obey the laws of God and man, but not to help the man who catches a terrible disease in the course of his ordinary calling. This House, apparently, selects this particular disease for its special attention, simply, on account of the health of the soldier. I say the health of the civilian wants protection as well. You have no right to select a particular class for your special patronage. If you are prepared to prove your case, go through with it. But, as we stand, we are in an absurd and anomalous position. The effect of the system on the country at large is well stated by Dr. Routh, when he says—

"I think in all those countries, so far as I have been able to learn, where you have prostitution under the superintendence of the State, you have a degree of immorality existing which is far greater than anything which occurs in England. I mean that it leads to the minds of people being habituated to this sort of thing, so that they fall into sexual excesses of every kind, and of the most revolting nature."

I believe that is a fact, for it is confirmed by all sorts of witnesses and is not seriously disputed as to other countries, though it is supposed that a system which works badly elsewhere, will for some strange reason work well here. I must now refer to the physical results attributed to these Acts, but not in much detail, as I argued it very fully on the last occasion. In the first place, the evidence on the subject shows that there has been gross exaggeration as to the need for any legislation of this kind. I would refer especially to Dr. Simon's statements in his Report to the Privy Council—evidence which is abundantly confirmed by various witnesses who were examined by the Commission. But even supposing the disease to be ever so serious, it is evident that as long as one sex only is examined, the disease cannot be stamped out. You would not think of vaccinating only boys; you would think it the wildest absurdity to leave the girls unvaccinated. So the men in the Army were formerly examined, but was given up because the doctors found it so disgusting. It seems that it is disgusting for a man to examine a man, but not for a man to examine a woman. But the examination is entirely fallacious as a test of health. Mr. Wolferstan says, that the cases that escape detection are cases of constitutional syphilis. Mr. Simon says the same. Mr. Square says that many of the gravest cases come from women with no visible sores. Mr. Henry Lee has expressed his strong opinion that the diagnosis of this disease is almost, if not quite, impossible, and that the very worst cases may come from those women who have been examined, and are registered. But although the security is so illusory, still, as men believe themselves to be more secure, they will indulge more, and the disease will increase. The tendency of the disease in our own Army, according to the last Return, is to rise, and I received a letter yesterday from Dr. Drysdale, in which he says the disease is as bad as or worse than ever on the Continent. It is easy to understand that there is more disease in Paris than there would be if the regulations were not so stringent. The victims of clandestine prostitution there shrink from discovering their disease to doctors; it consequently increases, and the authorities are now looking out for new precautions. M. Lecour says—

"These results show that prostitution increases, and that it becomes more dangerous to the public health. . . . The Administration has redoubled its activity; it has increased acts of repression as regards prostitutes, and it has, in short, kept the health of the ascribed (registered) women in a satisfactory state. But, on the other hand, the number of these women decreases continually, for in 1855 they were 4,257, and in 1869, 3,731; whereas, on 1st January, 1870, they were 3,656. This fact is the more important, as it coincides with a marked increase in clandestine prostitution. The Administration must succeed in turning clandestine prostitution into prostitution avowed, registered, and watched over."

The evidence before the Commission is full of proofs that no law can grapple with clandestine prostitution, which is fatal to the whole system. But we are told—look at the tables. I wish, however, to point out that even the figures on which we are asked to rely in this matter, are not conclusive. They give us no proof that there is a diminution of the really important disease. The "sores" mentioned in the Return are for the most part of no importance, and the Returns which we have in no way distinguish the important from the unimportant disease. They separate "sores" from the other and minor disease, but they do not distinguish one class of sores from another. Without this distinction such figures have no scientific value as a basis for legislation. Again, the figures do not seem worthy of credit. Captain Harris confessed before the Commission that his clerk had made a series of blunders, and that the Return of 1870 was entirely unworthy of credit. He has made a new Return which I hope is more correct. The last Return laid upon the Table is incorrect. It relates to the ratio per 1,000 of men diseased from 1865 to 1872. I have taken out the figures myself from Dr. Balfour's table given to the Royal Commission, and whereas the Return shows a decrease from 120 in 1865, to 54 in 1870, the real figures show a decrease of 110 to 65. This shows a very different ratio. Greater care should be taken in laying these figures before the House; they are extremely misleading. But not only are they inaccurate, we must be careful not to give them a false value. We know that many other causes contributed to a reduction of this disease. We know that the disease was declining before the Acts came into force, because of the greater attention paid in the Army to sanitary matters. Improvements have been made in the washing arrangements and the occupation and amusements of the soldiers, and in the homes for sailors, and in some cases there have been inspections of men on returning from furlough. But, after all, the disease in the whole Army has not materially diminished. There was a much greater fall between 1862 and 1866 than there has been since. But, it is said, even supposing the men are not much helped themselves, you must think of the innocent women and children. But your soldiers and sailors are, as a rule, unmarried, so they have no wives or children to be cared for. There might be some ground for the argument, if the Acts extended to the whole kingdom, but, even in that case, it would not be right for the State to provide clean women for married men. It is a monstrous proposition to say that the State is to find funds for a purpose so grossly immoral. Besides, the State does not care for the children of the drunkard, who vastly exceed in numbers the children who are afflicted by this disease; nor does it care for the children of the man who has had the small-pox. But it is idle to reason in this way. The Acts have not been passed for the protection of women and children; they were passed for the comfort and protection of the soldiers and sailors. So far, I have been talking of the results of the Acts. But I must also refer to the principles upon which all legislation of this kind is based. Now I say that these Acts are based on the assumption that prostitution is a necessity. If it be not a necessity; if men are able to take care of themselves, why do you want the Acts? The whole foundation of the law is, that men cannot help it, and must have this gratification, and are therefore entitled to protection. The Royal Commissioners Report on this subject as follows—

"Thus, it is said, prostitution is indirectly if not directly recognised as a necessity. On the other hand, it is contended that by placing prostitution under regulations it is not recognised as a necessity, but the fact of its existence only is recognised. It is difficult, however, to escape from the inference that the State, in making provision for alleviating its evils, has assumed that prostitution is a necessity."

Is not that a most dangerous proposition? Who is to blame in this matter, the men or women? You may say both; and if that be so, both should be under restriction. You do not treat them alike, and that is obviously unjust. You do not admit that prostitution is a necessary evil, yet it is acknowledged that it is only necessary evils that are regulated; evils that are not necessary are put down. Drunkenness is punished; you do not regulate drunkenness, you regulate the sale of drink because that is innocent in itself, and, if taking a glass of beer were like the act of illicit intercourse, you would scorn to grant a licence to a public-house. If prostitution is a necessity, houses should be licenced, and proper precaution should be taken for safe indulgence in it. M. Lecour says:—

"The licence of the brothels is at the root of all regulation of prostitution. In a multitude of cases, when, for example, one is thinking of imposing registration and sanitary rules on prostitutes without a home, these measures would be illusory if there were no brothels. . . . This licence aids the police in localizing the mischief by giving the power to superintend and repress it, and thus to re-

I have to say a few words, in conclusion on the powers of the police. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) in his protest at the end of the Report of the Commission, says he does not like the Act of 1864, because it entrusts the police with a most delicate duty. He does not mind the Act of 1866, but their duty under that is equally delicate. Under the Act of 1864 the policeman had to find out whether a woman was diseased; under the Act of 1866 he has to find out whether a woman is or is not a prostitute, and this is often a most delicate matter. In both cases he acts partly on his own knowledge and partly on information obtained from a variety of sources, including the keepers of bad houses. This is a discretion a policeman should not have. We are told that the police never make mistakes. The other day I saw in The Times the case of Mrs. Stone, who was forcibly removed from a railway carriage on the plea that she was a young woman of 15, who had eloped with a young man, when as a matter of fact, she was the mother of four or five children.

MR. BRUCE: What has that got to do with it?

MR. W. FOWLER: It is an illustration showing that the police do make mistakes. I have not forgotten that horrible case at Lille, where a person professing to represent the special police, terrified poor girls into submitting to his demands. That was a most fearful illustration of the danger which arises in such a case. We are told that these girls go to be examined willingly. Mr. Parsons says they go willingly rather than go before a magistrate.

MR. BRUCE interrupted.

MR. W. FOWLER: Unless they submit themselves they are obliged to go before a magistrate.

MR. BRUCE: They are not.

MR. SPEAKER: Order! order!

MR. W. FOWLER: I do not see why there should not be protection for the woman. It is all a case of suspicion on the part of the police, and the powers given them are enormous. Now, Sir, though I have much more to say, I feel that I must not trespass longer on the time of the House. I have shown how much may be done in the way of reclamation by voluntary means, and I have shown how entirely this system of coercion has failed in other countries. I repeat my proposition that there is no defence of these Acts except upon the assumption that indulgence is a necessity of man, and that if it be a necessity that it must be made as innocuous as possible. This is at the root of the whole case. I ask the House to divide upon that question. I know it is said we give no licence and we only recognize the fact. But is it not a licence to receive the woman time after time to be examined and sent out again? Does she not feel it to be a licence? In conclusion I denounce these Acts as immoral because they licence vice and confound the clearest moral distinctions. I denounce them as unjust because they treat the sexes unequally; they let the man go free and lock up the woman who is less to blame, because she is driven to the act by want. I denounce this law as unnecessary, because the disease was rapidly diminishing before it was passed. I denounce it as illusory, because the test used as to the health of the woman is utterly insufficient. I denounce the law as unconstitutional, because it is dangerous to give such immense powers to the police. Time will not allow me to go into many points which would have made my case more clear, but I ask the House with confidence to say it will not continue this system. To be consistent we must either go backward or forward. I ask you to go back and repeal this obnoxious measure.

MR. MUNDELLA seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. William Fowler.)

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in rising to move "That the Bill be read a second time that day six months," said, it was with much reluctance that he had taken upon himself the painful duty—which he thought should have been undertaken by some Member of Her Majesty's Government—of meeting the Motion of the hon. Member for the second reading of the Bill. In his opinion, it should not have been left to a private Member to vindicate these Acts, as the matter was essentially a Government question. The subject was one which touched the morals and the health of the people. It was one which had been legislated upon by the Government of the day; it had been inquired into under the authority of the Government; and, therefore, the Ministry ought not to have shrunk from meeting this Bill, either by boldly avowing their approbation and support of the Acts, or by boldly supporting their repeal. In opposing the measure, he was solely and exclusively influenced by a conscientious sense of public duty, and he had been led to take that course in consequence of appeals which had been made to him by hon. Members on both sides of the House, who were strongly impressed with the advantages to the community which had resulted from the operation of these Acts. It had been his fortune as a public man to have been officially connected with both the Naval and the Military Services of the country, and he had been a member of the Royal Commission, and of the Committee of that House which had sat in 1869 to inquire into this question, and upon those grounds it had been urged upon him that he ought not to shrink from the unpleasant public duty which he was endeavouring to discharge. He had yielded to the appeal, on the understanding that he should only be called upon to act in the event of Her Majesty's Government refusing, as he had hoped they would not have done, to take upon themselves the responsibility of meeting the Motion for the second reading of this Bill by a direct negative. The history of the Acts which it was now sought to repeal commenced in 1864, when, in consequence of the state of the Army and the Navy, a meeting was held, in which the Duke of Somerset, Lord Clarence Paget, Earl de Grey, the then Secretary for War, and other Gentlemen who had held office in connection with these services under previous Governments, including himself, took part, at which it was shown that in consequence of the effects of this dreadful disease a number of men in the Army, equal to between two and three regiments, were rendered unfit for active service. Lord Clarence Paget stated at that meeting that the condition of the great naval stations in the kingdom was such as to demand the immediate attention of the then Government. The meeting consisted of men of both parties, and he had never in his life heard a discussion conducted with a more earnest and honest desire to do that which was right and good for the community. Those who were present at that meeting, which was a very considerable and important one, were perfectly aware that the question had two sides, and that it could only be decided on a balance of considerations. They were fully alive to the moral objections which might be urged against the proposition to put down the evil in question by legislation, and were aware that by taking steps with that view they might be laying themselves open to the imputation that they were seeking to remove one check that then existed upon vicious indulgence. But, notwithstanding these considerations, the meeting arrived at the conclusion that so serious were the physical aspects of the question, that the time had arrived when it was absolutely necessary that there should be some legislation with regard to it. The result of that meeting was the passing of the Act of 1864, which was accepted by Parliament almost without opposition or even discussion. In 1866, however, it was found that that Act was inadequate to check the evil sought to be got rid of, and accordingly another Act was passed in that year, which made material alterations in the law on this subject. After the passing of the latter Act, a formidable opposition, not in itself extraordinary or unexpected, but which was, in his opinion, short-sighted and one-sided, was originated against these Acts. He fully admitted the truth of the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) who had moved the second reading of the Bill—that the Acts of which he complained were primarily passed with the view of dealing with the physical portion of the question alone, and without reference to the moral effect which they might have. He, however, wished to remind the House that about the time when this opposition was first commenced, public attention was attracted to the fact that the Acts were producing moral benefits to an extent which had not been foreseen, and which had assumed a most important character. In consequence of the opposition which had been raised against the Acts, Her Majesty's Government thought it desirable that some public inquiry should be made into the manner in which they had operated, and accordingly, in 1868, a Committee of the House of Lords was appointed to inquire into the whole subject. That Committee was followed by a Committee of the House of Commons in 1869, and by a Royal Commission of which he had himself been a member, in 1870. The Reports of those three enquiries were strongly in favour of the good effects produced by these Acts, which they declared had been productive of most beneficial effects in both a moral and physical point of view, and that of the Committee of the House of Lords even went so far as to suggest, that where localities should desire it, the operation of the Acts should be extended to their districts. For his own part, he regarded these Acts as a blessing to the country. It was true that, supported by about one-third of the Members of the Royal Commission, he had conceived it to be his duty to propose a counter Report to that of the Chairman; but he had done so merely because he felt that the recommendations of the Chairman's Report were not in accordance with the substance of it. [The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to read a mass of evidence from the principal ports and military stations, showing the wonderful benefits which had resulted, both morally and physically, from the operation of the Acts.] One most satisfactory result of them was, that young men returning to their homes were no longer assailed by these abandoned women in towns where they were put in force. Those who demanded a repeal of the Acts were bound to show that the evils they had produced were not more than counterbalanced by the good they had done. He challenged any hon. Member to contradict the assertion that the Acts had produced moral effects. Why, if they had done nothing else, they had cleared the camps at Aldershot and the Curragh of these degraded women who used to live in the ditches and under the hedges adjacent to those places, and whose condition was disgraceful to a civilized country. What was the answer of the hon. and learned Gentleman to that? If the Acts had accomplished only that result, they ought to be thankful that such Acts existed. Again, there was the evidence of the matron of the Kildare Lock Hospital to the effect that before the operation of the Acts the inmates of that institution conducted themselves as if they were savages or wild animals caged against their will; but that now cases of disorderly conduct were very rare among them, and he should like to hear the answer of the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge to statements such as that. In addition to those facts, moreover, the statistics published by the police showed that in districts where before the operation of the Acts the prostitutes amounted to hundreds, they now amounted only to units, and there could not be the least reason for doubting that the Acts in those places had put down the horrible system of juvenile prostitution. The evidence given before the Royal Commission as to the unhealthy state of the offspring of infected parents was corroborated by the fact that 80 or 90 of the most eminent medical men in the metropolis had presented a memorial to the Home Secretary, earnestly urging that nothing should be done to weaken the beneficial operation of the Acts. Last year 150 Members of the House—half of them being Conservatives and half of them Liberals, as nearly as possible, and the number might have been nearly double if longer Notice had been given—went as a deputation to the Home Secretary to present two memorials—one from nearly 300 medical practitioners within the districts operated on by the Acts, and the other from upwards of 2,000 medical men in all parts of England—against a repeal of the Acts. In the Army stations which had been placed under the Acts there had been a diminution of the more serious disease to the amount of fully one half. He had seen a remonstrance against the Acts which purported to be signed by 1,500 of the clergy, but, while he felt great respect for the names, he was sorry to be obliged to add that he felt a minimum of respect for their remonstrance, for he thought those gentlemen were taking a very one-sided view of a subject which they did not understand, because, while the Paper professed to deal with the whole subject, it contained no reference whatever to its physical aspect. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had mainly rested his case upon the erroneous statistics, as he asserted, of Devonport, which were presented to the Royal Commission. He (Sir John Pakington) would assume, for the moment, that the hon. and learned Member was correct in his supposition with regard to Devonport statistics, but that would only be striking out one from many proofs, and the facts which he had mentioned as to the operation of the Acts at Aldershot and other places would remain undisturbed. But for the sake of the police, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would cause inquiry to be made whether their Returns as to Devonport were trustworthy. It was very wrong, and on all accounts most undesirable, that the officers of the police force should be subject to such imputations as had been heaped upon them, if they were undeserved. In conclusion, he would implore the Government and the House, in the interests of morality, of public health, of reason, and of truth, to support his Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. J. D. LEWIS*: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House (Sir John Pakington) has informed you that he has done so with considerable pain. I can assure you that feeling is fully shared by myself on the present occasion. But I am sure of the indulgence of the House when I inform them that I have the honour to represent the borough of Devonport, the first, or almost the first, borough which put in force the Contagious Diseases Acts in their present form. We know something of the subject by experience. We are not reduced to gather our information from the pages of Shields, or other sensational publications which in times past, coming from Heaven knows where, have alighted upon, but certainly not adorned, our breakfast tables. I may further say that whatever effect, good or bad, may follow from the passing of my hon. Friend's Bill will be felt mainly by us the inhabitants of Devonport, Portsmouth, Winchester, and other places, who, although willing, and indeed anxious, that important changes and amendments should be made in the present law, are yet not as a rule—subject I must admit to some exceptions—desirous that they should be altogether rescinded. Speaking, Sir, for myself, I may say that I think it would be a much smaller calamity for the borough which I have the honour to represent to be disfranchised than that it should be deprived of the advantages which have been conferred upon it by these much misunderstood and maligned Contagious Diseases Acts. Sir, I will not trouble the House with what may be called the earlier statistics on the subject. They are contained in a well-known Blue Book, and I suppose, to use an expression sometimes heard at railway and other meetings, they may be “taken as read.” But I should wish to say a word as to the proceedings of the Commission and the sort of evidence which was produced before it. When we, Sir, in the towns that are subject to these Acts first heard that our case was to be submitted to a Royal Commission, we were, I think, perfectly ready to abide by the decision of such a tribunal, because we felt quite sure that we should be able to produce evidence which would be found a justification of these Acts. And I appeal to anybody who has read the Report of the Commission whether our anticipations were not fully justified by the result—whether, in short, the Report of that Commission did not contain an elaborate and exhaustive reply to all the objections that had been raised against the Acts, ending in this lame and impotent conclusion that in one important particular a sacrifice should be made to public clamour. I have carefully gone over the evidence produced before the Commission, and I find that some 83 witnesses were examined before it, of whom about 51 were favourable to the Acts. Of course it will be said—it has been said—that they were persons interested in their maintenance, I do not see that this position can be fairly maintained. Supposing these Acts were repealed to-morrow, you must still have lock hospitals, and military and naval surgeons and consulting surgeons and matrons, and the Metropolitan Police employed under these Acts would be told off to other and more congenial duties. But more than this, you had before the Commission a number of witnesses who cannot in any sense be represented as interested in the maintenance of these Acts. You had magistrates and magistrates' clerks, clergymen of the Established Church, Dissenting ministers, and what is more, chemists and undertakers, who had to deplore the falling off in their businesses, to which they were ready to testify. What was the character of the evidence produced on the other side? They had some great priori reasoners, if the term “reasoners” can be applied to such a lady as Mrs. Butler. They had a great philosopher whose memory I hold in as much respect as any Member of this House, but who, it seems to me, was occasionally inclined to express strong opinions on social and political questions which he had not maturely considered—I mean Mr. John Stuart Mill. Let me give a specimen or two of the evidence of these kinds of witnesses—

“Mr. Mill has no practical knowledge of the working of the Contagious Diseases Acts. He cannot tell, from experience, whether they have actually done moral harm, but it seems to him their natural effect was to do harm. He does not know whether they have done any physical good or no. He is unacquainted with the details.”

Mrs. Butler opposes them on high moral and constitutional grounds. I presume she is referring to the Constitution of England, and not to the constitution of Englishmen and Englishwomen—

"I do not believe," she says, "there is on this earth a supporter of these Acts who dares, in the privacy of his chamber, to entreat our God, who is of purer eyes than to behold this iniquity, for the continuance and extension of these Acts."

It would be difficult to find a stronger specimen of that kind of bigotry which consists in imputing to one's adversaries, not only views that are wrong, but views which they themselves are supposed to know to be wrong. Another witness, who bears, I am sorry to say, the not uncommon name of Lewis, but who is not, I can assure the House, in any way connected with me—for, in these days of woman's-right agitations, it is sometimes necessary for sane people to disown such connections as these—"is satisfied that the Acts are wicked from merely looking at her Bible." Dr. Taylor, of Nottingham, considers it "a violation of the liberty of the subject to restrict a prostitute in the practice of her calling when she is in a state of disease." Sir, I did not enjoy the honour of a seat on the Commission, and I remarked at the time, with some surprise, that no Dockyard Member was put upon it, or I should have asked that witness—"Should you consider that to confine a person suffering under delirium tremens—as clearly a punishment for one sin as venereal disease is for another—and brandishing a sword in the streets, was a violation of the liberty of the subject?" I suppose the reply would be no, because in that case the lives and limbs of innocent passers by would be in danger. But, Sir, a diseased prostitute endangers the health, not only of passers by—who, it may certainly be said, are not innocent—but of unborn generations, who, it must be admitted, come under that designation. There are two grounds of objection which are commonly urged to the Contagious Diseases Acts. In the first place, it is said by some that they do not diminish disease. Indeed, in a paper which has been extensively circulated by Mrs. Butler about the towns of this country, I find it actually asserted that they increase disease. The paper states that these Acts "promote immorality and increase disease." I do not understand that my hon. Friend goes so far as that, but I understand him at any rate to throw some degree of doubt on statistics which would tend to show that disease is diminished. The other objection is that even although they do or at any rate may diminish disease, the evils which they are calculated to palliate are replaced by other moral evils of a still worse description. I have promised that I will not trouble the House with what may be called the earlier statistics on this subject; but I cannot help, in passing, reminding the House of a few startling facts which illustrate the state of our forces in the year 1864, just previous to the introduction of this legislation. You have heard from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir John Pakington) that the loss to the British Army from venereal disease amounted to the loss of two and a-half regiments annually. It may be illustrated further in this way—it amounted to the loss of the entire force for one week, and the admissions to hospital for venereal disease were 290 per 1,000. In the Navy the perpetual loss to the service amounted to 460 men; or in other words, to cutting off one entire iron-clad from the British Fleet. To illustrate this state of things in the merchant service, I may add that from the years 1864 to 1868, of the patients admitted to the Dreadnought floating ship, one in every three suffered from venereal disease. Now it may be interesting to know what at that very time was the state of an Army which has since overrun a considerable portion of Europe, and which may boast that it is the Army of the most highly civilized Continental power. I allude to the Prussian Army. Before the Medical Committee which sat just before the passing of these Acts, and whose recommendations were one of the principal causes of this legislation, about which I now speak, Mr. Cutler, the eminent surgeon, gave the following evidence:—

"A friend of mine went to visit a camp in Prussia last year (1864). The Prince told one of his aide-de-camps to go with my friend and show him the hospital, in order that he might see the treatment of persons there. There was a camp of 20,000 men. My friend was not a medical man, but he told me that the aide-de-camp took him just over the borders of the camp, where there were six little cottages, in which there were about six or seven men and three or four women. The officer told him that was all the venereal disease they had in that camp, and every man had orders as soon as he had any appearance of a sore, to appear before the medical officer."

Now, in 1864, to put the matter in another way, the average number constantly ill from venereal disease in the British Army was 19·11 per 1,000. This will be found in the Report of the Commission, page 815, and the average on 20,000 men would have been just 380. The diminution which has taken place in disease in the British Army, viewed as a whole, has been conclusively shown by the right hon. Baronet, and I will, therefore, now only remind you that, for the worse form of malady—syphilis—the annual average disease in protected districts is only 53 for 1,000. But, Sir, since the general statistics on this subject have been so ably placed before you by the right hon. Gentleman, I would prefer to confine myself to salient facts deduced from the borough which I have the honour to represent. The hon. Gentleman who has introduced this Bill has taken great exception to the statistics which have been produced with regard to the great number of prostitutes in the three towns, and the diminution that has taken place. I am not altogether prepared in this place to uphold those statistics, for I think it possible that both with regard to the number of prostitutes and the number of brothels some error may have slipped into the calculation. I would prefer to say on that part of the subject that most unquestionably the number of prostitutes and the number of brothels have very considerably decreased. I will quote a passage from the Report of a society in no way connected with the administration of the Contagious Diseases Acts, and which to the best of my belief contains some who are even opposed to these Acts, and which, moreover, illustrates another point of importance connected with this discussion. The last annual Report of the Plymouth Female Home—the Report for 1872—contains the following passage:—

“Notwithstanding the well known diversity of opinion which exists with respect to certain recent Acts of Parliament, which need not further be specified, one fact is sufficiently obvious that the number of fallen women in this town has of late most perceptibly diminished. It is impossible not to trace here the operation of these Acts. Another circumstance equally observable is that a large proportion of those who seek shelter in the Home come thither from the Royal Albert Hospital, Devonport, of which institution they have been for a longer or shorter period involuntary inmates.”

Mr. J. D. Lewis

Well, Sir, now, to trouble the House with a few statistics on another branch of the subject, on which, I venture to say, there can have been no mistake. In 1864, the average admissions for the more important disease—venereal syphilis—was at Devonport 110 per 1,000. My hon. Friend has taken exception to the classification adopted relating to these diseases, but he will allow me to tell him that the term “more important disease” may most fairly be justified. There are, as the House knows, two classes of this sad malady—one comparatively unimportant, and the other of a far more serious nature, and of a character to be transmitted to posterity. Well, Sir, I employed a part of my Easter vacation in a most disagreeable manner—if one has a right to call anything disagreeable which is done in the discharge of a most solemn duty. I paid a visit to Devonport with a view of obtaining the last and most accurate information on the working of these Acts. I called for the last Return. It is an official Return of the working of the Contagious Diseases Acts in the port. I wanted to know what had been the state of things during the past week—a week which I may say was taken entirely at hazard. I found that for the week ending April 5, 1873, out of a number of men, seamen, and marines, amounting to 7,638, there had been two cases of the more important venereal disease sent to hospital, only one of which was contracted in port. That is at the rate of 104 in a year. You will judge of the difference between the 104 cases from among 7,638 men, and 110 cases in 1,000 men. In point of fact, I believe that the last annual ratio per 1,000 men at Devonport was 36, and excluding 4 cases contracted out of the port, I believe that it only amounted to 20 per 1,000. I will give a further illustration of the effect of these Acts in the three towns. In 1865 the first 200 women examined were all found diseased. The average now—not to trouble the House with decimals or minute statistics—is about 1 in 10. I was anxious to get a further illustration of the effect of these Acts, and I found that in the Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse workhouse in the two years ending 1864, the admissions of venereal disease of all kinds amounted to 471, and that of the two years ending 1872, they amounted to only 22. Similarly in the prisons there has been a decrease of two thirds. At Dartmouth, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir John Pakington) has told you, in 1870, when the Acts were first put into operation, of eight women examined six were found diseased; now there are only three prostitutes in the town, and there has not been one case of venereal disease for the last 18 months. Now, Sir, I do not know what my hon. Friend says to all this; but I must just notice here, even although not strictly in place, a most extraordinary argument which he gave utterance to in the course of his able address. He said, granting that the Acts did considerable good in certain localities, it is quite clear that you cannot extend them generally, and therefore you ought not to keep them up locally. It seems to me, Sir, that is a complete non sequitur, and that if we can show that they have done considerable good in certain localities, that is an argument for keeping them up there, at any rate; even though public feeling may not admit of their being more generally extended. As I have been speaking of the effect of the Acts, it is important that I should notice an important objection that has been raised, and which will be found contained in the protest of the four dissenting Commissioners specified in the Report of the Royal Commission. They say—

"We are of opinion that in considering the effects of the Acts on the Army and Navy, it is most important to observe that for several years prior to 1865 the prevalence of venereal disease had been materially diminished; in fact, that the proportionate decrease had been greater between 1860 and 1865 than it has been during the subsequent five years."

My calculations, and I have made them carefully, certainly do not bear out this statement, more particularly with regard to the Navy. I will not trouble the House with them, but will point to the experience since 1870, the time at which the Royal Commission sat, as being most certainly conclusive against this theory. You have just heard from the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich, that in the unprotected districts, the ratio per 1,000 of syphilitic cases has risen from 99 in 1865 to 123 in 1872, while in the protected districts it has sunk from 120 in 1865 to 53 in 1872, and there are piles of other statistics which I will not stop to quote, which tell us a similar tale. Thus in Plymouth, of 92 women placed for the first time on the register during the past year who came from unprotected districts, 72 were found diseased on their first medical examination; and of 46 placed on the register who had previously lived in protected districts, five only were found to be diseased. At Aldershot 182 women were examined for the first time from unprotected districts, 107 were diseased; 128 were examined from protected districts, 33 found diseased. At Shorncliffe 18 were examined from unprotected districts, 12 were diseased; 33 were examined from protected districts, 8 were diseased. I may add that as soon as the Contagious Diseases Acts were put in force at Winchester 43 per cent of the women were found to be diseased, which was four times the proportion at Devonport. No wonder that, although wherever the Acts are put in force there is a partial opposition to them at first, the inhabitants soon become favourable to them. I am informed, that at Canterbury, the Mayor, who was at first strongly opposed to these Acts, has now become one of their warmest supporters. Similarly, at Southampton, where considerable opposition was manifested, the greater part of the magistrates have entirely changed their opinion. Perhaps I may be permitted to mention as a reason which accounts for this change, that a friend of mine well acquainted with Southampton in earlier life, recently visited that town, and he informed me that he could not account for the remarkable change which had come over its aspect; that the prostitutes whom he remembered in earlier life infesting the streets and molesting the passers-by, with their solicitations, had now disappeared from the stage, and when I informed him of what he did not know before, that the Contagious Diseases Acts were now in force in that borough, he exclaimed—"Ah, that accounts for the change for the better, which has come over its aspect." Now, Sir, I should be content to rest the case of these Acts on the immense diminution of disease which has unquestionably taken place. Some persons are inclined to make light of this disease in what I have called its more important form. But what really is the character of syphilis? The right hon. Baronet has read you a passage from one of the most eminent of living surgeons, Mr. Paget, and volumes of such passages could be read. I will content myself with citing one—merely one—because it is from the pen of a very eminent man, who was recently, and may, for ought I know, still be the President of the Society for procuring the repeal of these Acts, Dr. Chapman, the editor of The Westminster Review. I presume my hon. Friend will be willing to accept his testimony. This is what Dr. Chapman wrote in The Westminster Review for July, 1869—

"Its ravages are ceaseless. It counts a greater number of victims than all those added together, who, from time to time, have fallen sacrifices to scourges which have swept over and filled mankind with dread. It pervades every rank of society. Its traces may be discovered in almost every family."

Some extraordinary information to this effect will be found in the evidence produced before the Committee of Surgeons to which I think I have referred. Dr. Farre, of King's College Hospital, testifies to commonly seeing six cases of children affected with syphilitic taint of a morning, sometimes 12, never less than one. Mr. Hutchinson says that one case in every five of ophthalmia is due to syphilis, and similar testimony was given in relation to skin and other diseases. Mr. Berkeley Hill, before the Royal Commission, referred to a Paper containing an account of the offspring of 106 syphilitic women. Seventeen infants were prematurely born, 11 died of hereditary syphilis; of 14 others born living, four lived for three months; while of 41 others the average life was 26 days. These are terrible facts, illustrative of the frightful character of this disease, and which more off-hand assertions of philosophers like Mr. Herbert Spencer, who do not enter into details, are quite unable to contradict. Well, Sir, but I must now say a word or two about the moral effects of these Acts. My hon. Friend, in the course of his speech, stated that nothing whatever was done for these women unless they were diseased; that they were kept in hospital until cured, and were then turned adrift to minister to the lusts of lascivious soldiers and sailors. Now, Sir, that is a complete misapprehension. During my recent visit to Devonport, I carefully went into all the mode of procedure at the Albert Hospital, and I learnt from the excellent matron, that after a woman was cured, if she mani-festes the slightest inclination to abandon her vicious course of life, she was kept in the hospital till a place was found for her in one of six homes, not immediately connected with the hospital, but which received patients from it. I asked the matron whether there was any difficulty on the part of the women in obtaining employment from these homes, and was informed that not only was there no difficulty, but that the applications for them in the capacity of domestic servants greatly exceeded the supply. My hon. Friend alluded to some of these reformed women who subsequently got married; and he rather gratuitously, I think, asserted—for he furnished not a shadow of proof in support of his assertion—that the great proportion of them resumed their abandoned life. I suppose he will say that the women so received into these homes merely come in at one door to go out at another, and that the whole proceeding is a complete sham. The records of these institutions show that the average stay of each woman amounts to something like 130 days, or, in other words, it is five months, sufficiently showing that there is here no mere pretence at reformation. Well, Sir, more than that, I learnt from the matron that if any woman who had been once admitted to the hospital, "rang at the bell," to use her own words, as late as 12 at night, and intimated a desire to become an inmate, even although not diseased, she was taken in, and kept till she was similarly handed over to one of these asylums. Again, my hon. Friend alluded to young girls, who had, perhaps, only made their first step in a career of vice, and who were put into these hospitals and herded with common prostitutes of long standing, just as, I think he said, young pick-pockets might be turned into a pen of confirmed burglars or other malefactors, and what process of reformation, he asked, could be expected to have effect under similar circumstances? This, again, Sir, is a complete misapprehension of the facts of the case. Young girls are carefully placed apart in a ward by themselves, and are constantly visited by the excellent chaplain, who is incessant in his efforts to divert them from the path on which they have entered. I may remark on this matter that the number of young girls—that is to say the number of girls under 17 has decreased from 205 in 1865 to 1 at the present time. Well may the learned Attorney General have said when speaking recently in this House on the Seduction Bill of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Charley)—

"That these Acts had, at any rate, had one effect. They had absolutely stamped out juvenile prostitution in the towns in which they were enforced."

My hon. Friend has told us also of the voluntary system, and has intimated that all the beneficial effects that we claim for this legislation might be equally produced by that system. Well, let me tell you that we tried for some time the voluntary system, and we found as the result that 25 per cent left physically, and, of course, morally uncured, and similar results were testified to before the Commission as having taken place at Portsmouth. Whenever a fresh regiment comes into a town, whenever a ship comes into port, out go these women in large shoals, and very often you cannot get them into the voluntary asylums until they are in the last stage of disease. Just let me quote to the House a short passage from The Lancet newspaper, which illustrates the working of the voluntary system—

"In January, 1871, in 79 women examined at Dover, three cases of syphilis and two cases of gonorrhoea were found, but in consequence of an outbreak of scarlet fever in the house where the examinations were conducted, they were suspended between March 14th and April 15th. On the resumption of periodical examination, of 80 women 15 cases of syphilis were detected and sent to the hospital. It would be difficult to bring forward stronger proof of the value of these inspections, and of the hopelessness of staying the spread of venereal disease without them, for during this month of interruption any woman who had desired to go to the hospital would have been dispatched thither by the authorities on her own application; but, contrary to what is asserted by the opponents of the Acts, these 15 syphilitic women preferred to roam at large until compelled by the law to undergo seclusion and treatment."

Well, Sir, my hon. Friend has again urged a point which has been frequently raised out-of-doors against these Acts, that they increase clandestine prostitution. I maintain, on the contrary, that they tend not inconsiderably to diminish it. In a Paper read by Dr. Acton, who has made prostitution a special subject of study, before the Social Science Congress at Plymouth, I find the following passages. He goes on to contrast the state of morality at Birmingham and

Manchester with that which prevails in other towns that have been for some time under the influence of the Contagious Diseases Acts. He cited the Royal borough of Windsor—I see my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Mr. Eykyn) below me, and he will be able to say how far Dr. Acton's statements are justified by facts within his own knowledge—where formerly the seductions of maid servants and shop girls were the two main sources from which prostitutes were recruited before the Acts were in force. The girls, after business was over or household work ceased, used to ask leave to go out on pleas of every kind. Seduction, and its inevitable consequence, coming on the streets, were sure to follow. A medical officer lately informed him that out of 32 women now registered, there are only two Windsor girls on the list, and he was told by tradesmen that since the introduction of the Act, they can keep their servants virtuous, as the girls have a wholesome dread of misconducting themselves. Let me, by the way, if I am not troubling the House, say one word as to the state of morality in the Northern towns to which Dr. Acton alludes, and with which he contrasts the state of things in protected districts. Dr. Acton refers to the brothels of a superior class which are to be found in our great Northern towns, such as Birmingham and Manchester. He speaks of one in Manchester where there are pianos in every room, and the inmates are women of education, the landlady and the girls forming a sort of co-operative Society, in which the profits are shared between them. Dr. Acton stated that these filles de joie agreed with Mr. Jacob Bright that the introduction of these Acts into Birmingham or Manchester would be highly demoralizing to their own feelings, and that their influential supporters, including Members of Parliament, would resent as an injustice the violation of their persons, for, as at present advised, no Government interference could make their private medical attendance more perfect, as was attested by their freedom from disease, and their health was well looked after by the landladies. Now, Sir, such institutions as these have been utterly suppressed in towns subject to these Acts. While speaking of these effects, I must further notice that 142 girls at Devonport, from 14 to 25 years of age, have been rescued from prostitution without being inspected or placed on the register, and the police are furnished with the names, places, and abodes of these women, so that there is no mistake whatever about the matter. Similarly, young girls from Cornwall used to come up very frequently to the three towns with a view to practising prostitution, and have been deterred by the stringent effects of this legislation. Sir, there are other objections which I have not time now to enter upon; but there is one point of the highest importance which I think it necessary to refer to, as there is no point in connection with these much abused Acts, which has rendered them liable to greater misinterpretation, especially in the Northern towns of this country. The excessive power which is vested in the police is constantly thrown in the teeth of their supporters, and has been reproduced as a phantom, to warn the House, by the hon. Gentleman in his speech this day. It is believed, I understand, in the North of England that these Acts render any respectable woman walking in the streets liable to be pounced upon by the police—that she may be taken up and borne off to some dismal place of torture amidst the jeers, or it may be the sympathies, of an excited multitude—just as we read that in the days of the French Revolution people were suddenly seized and hurried off to execution at the nearest lamp-post. Indeed, I find as much as this affirmed in a paper which Mrs. Butler has extensively circulated in our large towns. These Acts, as Mrs. Butler in one of her circulars states, endanger the liberties and honour of respectable females. In another circular, it is said that the rich man can protect his wife and daughters. "Yours, as they go to their daily work will be at the mercy of a policeman in plain clothes." Now, Sir, in my constituency I have between 2,000 and 3,000 working men whose employment keeps them nearly the whole day from home, in the dockyard and steam factory, with the exception of one hour or one hour and a-half for dinner, and their wives, who go about making purchases for them, would be particularly exposed to annoyance of this kind. I have never, during the five years I have represented the borough, heard of one single complaint on this head. In another circular, it is said—

"Fancy, dear, you to be tapped on the shoulder by a policeman, and examined to see if you are in a healthy state; the law gives power to stop anyone, however seemingly respectable. Is it not infamous?"

Sir, I say it is infamous that such malignant untruths should be scattered broadcast over the land. Now, what are the facts of the case? The Acts are administered by a body of Metropolitan Police specially told off for this duty; they are in all cases men of proved character, and I believe they are also required to be married men. A policeman is required to give notice to his Inspector before any woman can be proceeded against, and he must not give such notice until he is in a condition to swear in a Court of Justice that she is a common prostitute. The Inspector is then himself required to investigate the case, and if he is satisfied he gives notice to the woman. In case of voluntary submission on the part of a woman, the law is most carefully read over and explained to her by the Inspector—for no ordinary policeman has the power. She is then accompanied by a nurse to the Attendant Surgeon, who is himself required—and on this point I have thoroughly satisfied myself—to investigate the case before he proceeds to examine her. I have spoken of a case of voluntary submission, but what is the case with a woman who denies being a prostitute? What is the mode of proceeding? The policeman gives notice to his Inspector, the Inspector investigates the case, and gives the woman notice, and she denies, as I will suppose, being a prostitute. Well, what has the Inspector then to do? He must report to his Superintendent, and the Superintendent is again compelled to investigate the case, and if she still denies the fact, he must report to head-quarters, which I take to mean Scotland Yard; and, again, it is investigated at head-quarters, and if after having passed through these various stages, the charge is held by those in authority to be fully proved, they are empowered to apply to a Justice, who may, if he thinks fit—for mark, in cases of this kind it is not compulsory—issue a summons to the woman. She is not compelled to attend in person; she may, if she thinks fit, appear through a friend or through an attorney, and I believe that the investigation may, if she so wishes it, take place with closed doors, so that her name never comes out, and I understand the Justices at Devonport have occasionally held such investigations in private. Well, Sir, I know that the conduct of "the Great Unpaid" has frequently formed the subject of strong animadversion; it is said they frequently make mistakes—but I ask is it likely that the most careless among them would make a mistake in such a case as this, an error of which it is certain he would never hear the end to his dying day, and which would certainly come to form a subject of debate in this House? Some days ago we heard that an hon. Member of this House actually employed some sort of agent, whom he commissioned to go down into Shropshire to inquire into the conduct of the Justices there in reference to some trumpery case. I, Sir, have the honour to be a magistrate in a district included under these Acts, and if such a case was pending before me, I can only say that, whenever I took a walk about the somewhat lonely promontory on which my house is situated, just as the Roman poet describes the ancient traveller, who sees in the moving of every bush in the night wind the person of a footpad or an assassin, so I, Sir, in every suspicious-looking personage who crossed my path, should fancy I beheld an emissary of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester. Let me, before I conclude, say that it never has been proved that any respectable woman has been interfered with. Oh, yes, I beg to correct myself. There was a case at Portsmouth, where a woman was found late at night drinking in a public-house, consorting with prostitutes, and chaffing the police. She was summoned to undergo an examination, which, after all, on inquiry, she was not compelled to submit to. Sir, in conclusion, let me assure the House that the agitation on this subject is slowly, but surely dying out. It was always loudest, or perhaps I should rather say, shrillest in proportion to the distance of the persons who raised it, and the localities where they lived, from the places where the Acts were practically known and appreciated. It was never greater than that which was raised against vaccination on its first introduction by old women of both sexes. But the House of Commons of that day stood firm, and I trust that the House of Commons of this day will stand equally firm, and not proceed to decree the unrestricted circulation of venereal poison to the detriment of posterity, whose curses we should incur, and, what is worse, we should merit. I trust there will be no successful effort made to tamper with these Acts, which in localities where they have been in force have done more in a few short years to alleviate one of the most frightful scourges which can afflict humanity, to improve the condition of the towns, to eradicate juvenile prostitution, to bring to bear a moral influence on the unfortunate women who are subject to them, than all the voluntary efforts of all the philanthropists who have ever existed. Sir, I thank the House for the kind indulgence which it has extended to me while undertaking this most painful subject. I beg to second the proposition of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich, that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir John Pakington.)

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH, in supporting the Amendment, said, he could not help expressing his strong approval of these Acts, which were now on their trial. He trusted that an overwhelming majority would show that it was the general opinion of the House and the country likewise. He thought that the Petitions which had been sent out in favour of their repeal were signed by women who knew nothing of that to which they had appended their names. He was strongly in favour of their continuance, and hoped he should be right if he congratulated the House on the fact that it was possible that was its last discussion on the subject. If so, it would be nothing but right, for there should be an end put to such topics previous to the admission of female Members of Parliament.

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I should have been glad if I could have given a silent vote, partly on account of the nature of the question, and partly because I am suffering physically. But seeing that the right hon. Baronet opposite the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) has appealed to some one who took an opposite view to himself to meet his arguments, if they could be met, I trust the House will allow me to perform some part of the difficult task of answering some of the statements which the right hon. Baronet and the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. J. D. Lewis) have put forward. My interest in the question arose from the fact that I was one of those unfortunate Members who were selected by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department to sit upon the Royal Commission, which investigated this subject; but, in listening to the speech of the right hon. Baronet, I almost questioned whether I had served upon that Commission. In common with other Members of the Commission, I was so startled by the views the right hon. Baronet expressed on our behalf, that I almost wondered whether I could have taken part in that important investigation. I was afraid, from conversations I have had with hon. Members of the House on the subject, that not one in ten of them have read the evidence contained in the enormous Blue Book; and my impression is that many of those who are in favour of the Contagious Diseases Acts have been unwilling to read the evidence on the other side. The right hon. Baronet complained that the duty of addressing the House upon the question had been imposed upon him; but those who take the other side of the question have the most right to complain, for this legislation originated almost entirely with the right hon. Baronet. Indeed, the first Bill introduced on the subject was a private Member's Bill, bearing the names of Sir John Pakington and Lord Clarence Paget. The right hon. Baronet said that, in the year 1864, the physical condition of the Army and Navy was so dreadfully bad that it was needful to call together a number of gentlemen to consider what could be done to meet the outrageous circumstances of the case; and one would suppose that physical disease in those Services had been steadily growing worse and worse until in 1864 it culminated in the highest rate of increase that had ever been known. Now, the House will be surprised to know that for years before 1864 disease both in the Army and Navy had been steadily and regularly decreasing, and it is still, from causes apart from these Acts, on the decrease. I do not deny that medical science has done, and will do, much much, to reduce these diseases; but the reduction is not wholly due to the Contagious Diseases Act, as is proved by the statistics of Dr. Balfour, the chief of the Medical Staff of the Army. Dr. Balfour gives us the following number of cases admitted to hospitals in Devonport, Plymouth, Portsmouth, Chatham, Sheerness, Woolwich, and Aldershot:—2,433 in 1860, 2,368 in 1861, 2,040 in 1862, 1,863 in 1863, 1,729 in 1864, 1,720 in 1865, 1,673 in 1866, 1,698 in 1867, and 1,628 in 1868. When I became a Member of the Commission, I resolved that whatever conclusion the evidence led me to I would boldly and publicly avow it, whether that avowal pleased my constituents or not; but the conclusion at which I arrived was the very opposite of that drawn by the right hon. Baronet. Nor was I alone in that. There were 25 Members originally of the Commission, and fully one-third of the number, distinguished gentlemen connected with the medical profession and the Church, were members of the Society for the Extension of the Acts to the civil population. Two of the Members could not serve; but I believe that out of the remainder only one was a pronounced opponent of the Acts, and that was the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands). I attended nearly every sitting of the Commission, and as our inquiry progressed the fact began to dawn upon us not that voluntary hospitals could not be maintained, nor reclamation be carried on, but that a great deal more might be done by hospitals and by reclamations, and that what had been done at military and naval stations in those respects might be extended to the whole of the nation. These conclusions, however, the right hon. Baronet has cunningly mixed up with compulsory examination and the legalization of vice, and has made out that all the good we looked for from hospital accommodation and voluntary reclamation would result from police administration upon this question. I did not belong to any organization or society connected with this question, but the late Mr. Charles Buxton, one of the vice-Presidents of the Society for the Extension of these Acts, the Rev. F. D. Morris, and Dr. Holmes Coutt, one of the first practitioners in the world with respect to these diseases, all came to the conclusion that the Contagious Diseases Acts were no longer tenable as they stood. The extremely able manner in which the right hon. Baronet has advocated his cause fills me with admiration. No one, I am sure, could have surpassed him in the wonderful manner in which he has manipulated the few facts at his command. I shall ever remember his performance of this afternoon with amazement. The right hon. Baronet said that the Commissioners came to a lame and impotent conclusion; but the reason of this is that the right hon. Baronet and six Friends who joined him were anxious that the Commission should agree upon a recommendation in which they would be unanimous. For my part, I much regret having signed the weak and contradictory Report of the Commission. The first recommendation was that the periodical examinations of women should be discontinued. Twenty-three members of the Commission signed that, the name of the right hon. Baronet being the first. Why does the right hon. Baronet now support the view of seven members of the Commission, and pass by the recommendation of the 23? One of the most important witnesses before the Commission was Miss Lucy Bull, who had been matron of the Devonport Hospital since 1863. She showed that women were much more hardened since the passing of these Acts, the scenes in the street worse, and the scene outside the examination-room such as ought not to be tolerated in a Christian land. She told us of men driving the women up to the examining-houses and waiting for them to return for the purposes of fornication. ["Oh!"] It is impossible to discuss this question without referring to abominable details. I am disgusted with the literature the agitation against the Acts brings to our houses. Well, all the witnesses insisted that the keystone of our system is periodical examination, yet the Royal Commission recommends it to be done away with. Some of the chaplains who were examined approved the Acts because they bring these women for the first time under their influence; but it was surely not necessary to that end to examine, as some of the surgeons said they had, some 60 women a-day, only to find no cause for their detention, and then to send them about their business to carry on their fearful trade. The Commissioners recommended also that women after examination should be admitted to a certified hospital, which was, in fact, recommending that voluntary hospitals should be established throughout the country, and should be open for these women to enter. The 7th recommendation was that every keeper of a public-house or common lodging-house harbouring bad characters should be deprived of his licence, and the 10th recommendation was to amend the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, by extending from 12 to 14 the age at which seduction was a criminal offence. It was found that the most fruitful source of vice was among very young girls trained up in such a state of degradation, filth, and misery that they glided almost unconcernedly into evil courses. It was found even that parents prostituted their own children of tender years. Another recommendation was that girls under 16 leading an immoral life should be sent to a Home or industrial school for a period not exceeding two years, if they could not be otherwise provided for to the satisfaction of a magistrate; and this it has been shown would have the effect of sweeping thousands from the streets, and putting them in a way to become decent members of society. It is not, therefore, fair to assume that those who take an opposite view to the right hon. Baronet were unwilling to do all in their power to reclaim these poor creatures, and to reduce the extent of disease. The right hon. Baronet admits that public opinion is not ready to permit the extension of these Acts to every town in England; but if it were ready, all the forces of the country would not be able to carry them out in the great industrial centres. What is going to be done in the case of the 16 new military centres? Are the Acts to be extended to them? You dare not extend the Acts to them. And why not? Because those centres are in great manufacturing districts, where it would be impossible to enforce them. It would be impossible in towns where there was a large population of women to put a hand upon any woman seen talking to, or laughing with, a man in the street, and ask her to make voluntary submission. ["Oh, oh!" and "Hear, hear!"] Well, that is the course now. ["No!" and "Hear!"] One of the best witnesses before the Commission was Mr. Phillips, who had been 14 years in the Metropolitan Police Force. He stated that information as to the character of women was obtained from various sources, and he had plenty of cause to believe that women were falsely accused. This witness was so distressed with what he saw that he returned to duty as a police constable, sacrificing 7s. a-week rather than continue to discharge the disagreeable duties imposed upon him. Captain Gore Jones, one of the Inspectors of Dockyards, attributed the diminution of disease in the Navy to the better administration, under which men were paid off promptly and sent home at once, stating that from that cause alone there was a reduction of one-half in the number of cases. The same thing holds true with respect to the administration of the Army. Soldiers are much better conducted than formerly, because they are much better cared for and much cleaner in their habits. Professor Huxley, one of the best hands at analysis in this country declared, after an examination of the statistics to which the right hon. Baronet has referred, they were utterly unreliable and valueless; surely the right hon. Baronet will not dispute that statement by Professor Huxley, and I may remind him that he did not secure Professor Huxley's signature to his protest. Two of the medical men on the Commission protested against the Acts altogether, from 1864 downwards. The terrible pictures that have been drawn of the prevalence of disease have been scandalously overdrawn. I brought in a Factory Bill last year, and two able men, who had served on the Contagious Diseases Commission, were appointed to inquire into the actual condition of factory children throughout the United Kingdom. They examined no fewer than 10,000, and reported an almost entire absence of diathetic diseases—scrofula, rickets, and syphilis. Am I entitled to draw any conclusion from this, that the children are not suffering from the evil courses of their parents? There are 240,000 people in Sheffield. I wish the right hon. Baronet could look at the width and weight of the men I represent. The right hon. Baronet has charged some of us who oppose these Acts with ignorance. I may tell him that between 1,000 and 2,000 medical men, comprising some of the ablest practitioners in England, have petitioned against the continuance of the periodical examinations, and though, with respect to the 1,500 or 2,000 clergymen who have taken the same course, the right hon. Baronet may think well of their hearts and but little of their judgment, it cannot be disputed that they know something about morals if they do not understand physic. A good deal has been said by the hon. Member for Devonport in regard to the evidence of Inspector Anniss; but that witness has been contradicted in almost every particular. He has been contradicted point blank; in fact, the witnesses said as plainly as possible—"Annis is a liar;" and if the right hon. Baronet says those statistics ought to be proved, I agree with him. Let them be proved. Let a Committee be appointed to investigate Anniss's statistics. I guess what the result will be, for every witness said the same thing of them. The chief of the police was perfectly startled when he read to him Anniss's statement. He said—"It is perfectly impossible; it is not true." My hon. Friend the Member for Devonport made a good point when he spoke of the Prussian Army, and the small amount of disease found there. I quite agree with him; he is quite right; but does he know that the secret of that is not in the regulation of prostitution, but in the constitution of the Prussian Army and Prussian society? The Prussian Army is drawn from all ranks. The soldier is not tabooed; he is received into the homes of the citizens of every town they visit. It is the universal custom, because the householder knows his own son may want hospitality in a like case. Everything possible should be done to protect soldiers against disease and immorality; but it must not be that in order to do that we place women in a position from which reclamation is an impossibility. Compulsory examination degrades women into brute beasts. If you want to see what this system has done elsewhere, look to the Commune. ["Oh, oh!" and "Hear, hear!"] The women who burnt down the public buildings of Paris were women who had been subjected to compulsory examination. I agree that the former state of the camps at the Curragh and Aldershot was a disgrace to a civilized people; but the change observable there is not due to the Acts, but to the system of police adopted in consequence of the Acts, and there is no reason why that system should not be adopted irrespective of the Acts. If the House will thoroughly examine the Report of the Commissioners, I am satisfied it will adopt it as far as the 1st, 7th, and the 10th and the 11th recommendations are concerned. We shall drop compulsory examination, and extend the blessings of a general system of hospital accommodation throughout the country, thus stimulating private benevolence to add special wards to all hospitals. I trust we shall also put a drag-net round children. I hope the House will adopt such means of dealing with the matter vigorously, and not resort to a vicious system which has proved ruinous wherever it has been tried, which is in opposition to public morality, and which, if persisted in here, will compel us some day to retrace our steps with shame.

MR. BRUCE said, he had heard with astonishment the language which his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) had permitted himself to use with respect to Inspector Anniss. He had great respect for the character of his hon. Friend; but he felt bound to say that after the best inquiry he had made on the subject, he believed Inspector Anniss to be as truthful a man as his hon. Friend. Addressing his constituents in Renfrewshire in 1871, he quoted from memory, but quite accurately nevertheless, the statements contained in the Report of the Royal Commission as to the diminution of prostitution in what was rather unfairly called the Devonport district—he said unfairly, because Plymouth was responsible for a great amount of it. Speaking in round numbers, it appeared that the prostitutes in that district before the Acts, were 2,000, and just before the Commission the number was reduced to 600. Of juvenile prostitutes under 16 years of age, the number before the Acts was something over 200; at the time of the Commission they had almost entirely disappeared. It had been contended that the diminution which had undoubtedly occurred was due to other causes rather than to the Acts themselves, and with reference to that contention, he had no doubt that other causes were in operation; but he must be permitted to observe that the gradual operation of these good causes would not account for the sudden and rapid diminution which had been effected. His hon. Friend who had moved the second reading of the Bill might doubt the figures he had given; but what could he say to the statistics quoted by the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. J. D. Lewis), which showed that not only in the hospitals, but in the workhouses, in the gaol, in the Home, and, in fact, in all the public institutions of the district, the reduction had been still greater. Then there was this striking testimony to the beneficial operation of the Acts—that in every town in which they were in force, we had the leading tradesmen and the clergymen hoping they would not be repealed. The House might, perhaps, be of opinion that other Acts applicable to the whole country might be substituted; but when we had so many persons qualified to judge coming forward and speaking in favour of the Acts, the House ought to pause before substituting legislation which might not be equally effective. Reference had been made to what had been done in the City of Glasgow. In 1866 that City came to the House, and induced it to pass a most stringent Act for the regulation of their streets, and that Act had been rigorously enforced. Well, it was the object of the Government in the Bill they introduced last year to substitute for the present Acts legislation of a stringent character, which proceeded, nevertheless, upon the general recommendations of the Royal Commission. One of the charges against these Acts, which made a very unfavourable impression out-of-doors, was that, important as they were, and affecting the rights and liberties of so many as they did, they were introduced surreptitiously and passed without the knowledge of the country. That might be true of the first Act, the Act of 1864, but it could not be true of those that followed, because after 1864 a Committee of the House of Lords sat; the Report which they made was largely discussed in the newspapers, and the Acts of 1866 and 1869 were founded on that Report. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield himself had put his name to a recommendation that the Act of 1864, the only Act passed without inquiry, should be restored, for the 2nd recommendation of the Royal Commission was practically to restore the Act of 1864. But the Government, in the Bill they introduced, did not follow that recommendation; they rather agreed with the right hon.

Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), that the arguments against the Act of 1864 were as strong as against the subsequent Acts. They thought it better to propose the repeal of all these Acts. But what was the consequence? Almost immediately after the introduction of the Bill which was intended to give satisfaction to the entire country, attacks were made upon it from all quarters, and he received a deputation of 150 hon. Members from both sides of the House, protesting against the repeal of the Acts. Under those circumstances, the Government felt that it would be idle to waste the time of the House by proceeding with the measure. He admitted that there was a large amount of respectable public opinion against the Acts, and that it would be impossible to extend them all over the country; though he would himself rejoice if at any time a measure should be introduced which could be made general in its application. But the Government were not prepared to introduce such a measure now, and the question was, ought they to repeal the present Acts? He was not prepared to vote for their repeal. Whatever doubts might be entertained in other respects, no one could have any as to their deterrent effects, and therefore he should not feel justified in voting for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. HENLEY: Sir, when legislation of this kind was first put on the Table, I protested against it, on the ground that it was not right for Government to provide clean women for sinful purposes, I have heard no reason since to satisfy me that the Government of this country through its officers should take official cognizance of a class of persons habitually living in defiance of the laws of God and man, not for any purpose of deterring them, not for any purpose of punishing or reforming them, but simply that they may be proved fit to carry on their evil practices without sanitary inconvenience to their co-partners. I do not believe that can be defended. I believe that to be a downward course of legislation. Many organizations have sprung up in connection with carrying out these Acts. My opinion is, that if the Acts be wrong, no sanitary result will justify them, and that if you do obtain a result, you will be paying a heavy price for it; but your Returns are made out so vaguely that no results can fairly be substantiated from them. These are shortly the grounds why I shall support the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) for repeal. Something has been said respecting the people who carry on this agitation against the Acts. It is complained that the agitation is carried on by women, and therefore little value has been attached to it; but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that women are most affected by this legislation. We do not know what women suffer. If they do not tell us, men cannot. History tells us that women, in all ages, when they believe they are right, have put their feet upon the Rock of Ages, and nothing will force them from their position. They knew full well what a cross they would have to bear, but they have resolved to take up the cross and despise the shame. Much has been said in the course of this debate on the reforming tendency of these Acts; but if you make vice more attractive, if you remove its attendant penalties and even reduce, it may be, the number of persons who are engaged in this traffic, would not that account for the uniform testimony that the women are better dressed, and therefore in every respect more attractive? I hold to the principle laid down in the Royal Proclamation, against vice and immorality, that there are many things which the law cannot altogether prevent, but that Proclamation calls upon all persons in authority to discountenance vice, and I do not think any man can lay his hand upon his heart and say—"This legislation is discountenancing vice and immorality." Do you not rather say you are content to tolerate the vice, believing you will get compensation in an improved sanitary condition of some portion of the population? You have reduced the result of this Legislation to a money value. You have Returns showing what that money-value is. If we are to act solely under the influence of money-gain, we should all of us consider who it is we serve by so doing. This is a painful matter to me, because I am obliged to differ from so many hon. Friends with whom I usually agree. Still, I have, from the beginning, raised my voice against these Acts, and I believe we are entering on a downward course in following the example of other nations in this respect. If we test results in those countries which have publicly countenanced prostitution, and see how many children are born in wedlock and how many out of wedlock, and compare the condition of those countries with our own, we should find, thank God, that for the last 35 years we have been going on improving. How can we expect to continue this improvement, if we barter away the morality of the people for some small possible sanitary gain?

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY, as one of the members of the Royal Commission, had attended 43 out of 45 sittings, and felt bound to say that he concurred in everything which had fallen from the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington). He believed that the right hon. Baronet had not made a single statement in excess of the truth; if anything, he had understated the facts. On the other hand, his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), considering the Report to which he had put his hand as a Royal Commissioner, deserved the Victoria Cross for his present course in denouncing the Acts. [Mr. MUNDELLA observed that he was not responsible for, and did not concur in, the whole Report.] He would remind the hon. Member that he had nevertheless just said that "the police" ought to "sweep the young girls into reformatories." In that he (Mr. Mundella) was inconsistent with the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler), who had deprecated the employment of the police in these matters, and who yet was inconsistent with himself, inasmuch as he had pointed out the good the action of the police produced in the streets of Glasgow. In the question before the House, he (Sir John Trelawny) had never particularly cared for the statistics, because, if they were on the side of the supporters of the Acts, it would be complained that they made vice easy by diminishing its risk; while, on the other hand, if the statistics were unfavourable, it would be complained that public money was spent in vain. He contended that the Acts were neither illegal nor unconstitutional, and he would admit that if the Acts failed in those respects, the Acts would not stand. A rope was no stronger than its weakest part. What was the worst that could be said in that case? Why, that if a woman was persistent in leading the life of a prostitute in a certain district, she was liable to be told that unless she married, or left the district, or expressed her intention to retire from her avocation, she must come under the Acts. Now, was there much hardship in that, considering the mischief she had done? As to the police, it was impossible that they could long be mistaken as to who were common prostitutes. Such persons usually followed one beat, and though a policeman might be wrong one night, or two or three, there could be no doubt on the fourth, or afterwards. The same sad dejected face might be seen night after night in the same locality, and there was no grievance in telling her that she must be treated in hospital, if she continued in her way of life. What was to be done in the case of a prostitute evidently suffering from small-pox? Was she not to be treated? Yet that—with vaccination—was interference with personal liberty. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) seemed to prove too much in contending that the Acts tended to immorality by making vice easy, and women more attractive to men. Was he prepared to leave the women altogether without treatment? Was nothing to be done to improve them? If anything was to be done in this way, that, whatever it amounted to, necessarily made the women more attractive to men. He would conclude with expressing his high opinion of the valuable services of the the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich in support of this legislation, services for which he would have the thanks of future ages.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE: Sir, the last statistical Reports of the War Office show that the operation of these Acts have failed to diminish the most serious of the diseases. My hon. Friend (Sir John Trelawny) says, that after all the only injury that can be done under this Act of 1869 is, that some unfortunate woman may be obliged to leave the district, but surely he has forgotten the effect of these Acts upon public morality. Consider what is attempted to be done by this compulsory surgical examination. Consider the position in which it puts the Government of the country. The surgeon, the recognized authority of the Government, undertakes carefully to distinguish those women who are healthy from those who are unhealthy. The nine-tenths whom he finds healthy, he sends back on the streets, with the stamp of the Government authority to inform the public that they have successfully passed his examination. The expectant consorts of these women wait at the door of the hospital, or congregate near a neighbouring public-house. This verification and announcement of the soundness of these women is not one of the proper functions of a Government. The compulsory registration of all public women by the police tends to enrol these women in a permanent and organized body. It puts a difficulty in their way when they wish to abandon the profession, for when they announce such an intention to the policeman or the surgeon, they are met with incredulity and suspicions which are not always well founded. The physical health and strength of our soldiers and sailors and of the classes from which they come are of national concern; but the moral health and force of all classes is still more important, and more to be cared for by the representatives of the nation, and the Legislature will fail in one of its highest duties if it continues this league between the State and prostitution, by maintaining laws which aim at rendering prostitution more safe and alluring without any concomitant attempt to discountenance or eradicate it.

MR. W. FOWLER: What has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department ought to satisfy us that these Acts are wrong. He admits that no Government can impose them on the whole nation. They cannot then be maintained for any part of it. I feel more than ever confirmed in consequence of this debate in the justice of the course I have taken.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

BILL.—[BILL 118.]

(Mr. Callan, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Mr. Downing.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

COLONEL STUART KNOX moved that the Order be discharged. He did not believe the Bill was in existence, and, moreover, the hon. Gentleman, its promoter, was absent.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for the Second Reading of the said Bill be discharged."—(Colonel Stuart Knox.)

MR. BRUCE hoped the hon. and gallant Member would not persevere in his Motion in the absence of the hon. Member having charge of the Bill.

MR. J. LOWTHER thought the hon. Member having charge of the Bill was bound to be in his place. He, therefore, hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would persevere with his Motion.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 108; Noes 128: Majority 20.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday 11th June.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 3) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to confirm two Provisional Orders made by the Local Government Board under "The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867," with reference to the city of Coventry, in the county of Warwick, and the parishes of Mid Lavant and East Lavant, in the county of Sussex, respectively, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Mr. STANSFELD.

EAST INDIA (RAILWAY SHARES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. GRANT DUFF, Bill to enable Indian Railway Companies to issue and register Shares and Securities in India, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GRANT DUFF and Mr. AYRTON.

GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HERON, Bill to amend an Act passed in a Session held in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of King William the Fourth, chapter one hundred and sixteen, intitled "An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to the Presentment of Public Money by Grand Juries in Ireland," ordered to be brought in by Mr. HERON, Colonel WHITE, and Mr. BAGWELL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 170.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 22nd May, 1873.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Callan Schools, nominated; Boundaries of Parishes, Unions, and Counties, nominated.

Report—Tramways (Metropolis) [No. 222].

PUBLIC BILLS.—Ordered—First Reading—Public Prosecutors * [173].

Second Reading—Rating (Liability and Value) [146]; Valuation [147].

Report—Metropolitan Tramways Provisional Orders * [76-172].

Third Reading—Gas and Water Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 2) * [126]; Consolidated Fund (£12,000,000), and passed.

GAS COMPANIES—INCREASED PRICE OF GAS.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the President of the Board of Trade, if Mr. Reilly, the legal Commissioner appointed by the Board of Trade to report upon the increased price for gas demanded by the Chartered Gas Company, had been in several preceding Sessions Parliamentary draughtsman and Counsel to the Chartered and other Metropolitan Gas Companies; and, whether it was the intention of the Commissioners that the Western Gas Light Company (Limited) should increase the price of cannel gas from 5s. to 6s. 3d. per thousand feet, whilst the Company only claimed from the consumer 5s. 5d. so recently as the 4th of April last; that Company having only recently been amalgamated with the Chartered Gas Company, and having handed over a large reserve fund to meet the increase in the cost of material and wages?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE in reply, said, he regretted that the hon. Baronet had put his first Question, because, of course, it meant to impugn the impartiality of the legal Commissioner appointed by the Board of Trade to conduct that recent inquiry. Mr. Reilly was a well-known gentleman, whose character stood so high that it was entirely unnecessary to defend him in that House. He had not inquired at all whether Mr. Reilly had been employed by the London Gas Companies or not, but had every reason to believe, as he was in large practice on those subjects, that he had been, and also by the Corporation of the City of London and by the Metropolitan Board of Works, who were the opponents of the Companies in the recent inquiry. He had likewise been employed by the Government, and, in the opinion of all parties, the inquiry was admirably conducted. In respect to the second part of the hon. Baronet's Question, the revised price of gas applied to the amalgamated companies. The hon. Baronet seemed to labour under a mistake when his Question implied that the Western Gas Company only was to increase the price of their gas. The facts were that the Western Gas Company now formed part of the Chartered Gas Company, and the revised price was fixed by the Commissioners for the United company. Indeed, the Western Gas Company could have raised its price if it remained still in existence. But having united itself to the Chartered Gas Company, the amalgamated gas companies could only charge 5s. 5d. until the inquiry of the Commissioners took place. With respect to the reserve fund being handed over by the Western Gas Company to the Chartered Gas Company, it was proved before the Commissioners that the reserve fund had been applied in the year 1872 to the purpose of making up the dividend of the year. The question which the Commissioners had to settle was the price of gas for the year 1873. Bound by the Act of 1868, under which the inquiry took place, they fixed such a price as was calculated to yield to the company, after due care and management on their part, a dividend as near as might be, but not exceeding 10 per cent per annum.

INDIA—PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT —OFFICERS OF THE SCIENTIFIC CORPS.—QUESTION.

MAJOR TRENCH asked the Under Secretary of State for India, whether he will explain to the House why it is that Majors in the scientific corps (i. e. in the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers) employed in the Public Works Department, or holding Staff appointments in India, receive emoluments much smaller in amount than those drawn by Majors in the Cavalry, Infantry, or Staff Corps, filling precisely similar posts?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, the salary known as Staff salary granted for the performance of the same duties, whether in the Public Works Department or in Staff appointments in India, is, of course, the same whether the persons performing those duties belong to the Scientific Corps or to other branches of the Army; but the regimental pay of a major in the Scientific Corps being not in India only, but all through the British Empire, smaller than that of a major of cavalry or infantry, the total amount of money yearly received by these officers, in whom the hon. and gallant Gentleman is interested, is less than what would be received by majors of cavalry and infantry. I need hardly add that artillery officers in India only accept Staff appointments because they prefer so to do, and that engineer officers in India are almost always paid for their services by a lump sum per mensum, known as consolidated salary.

MAJOR TRENCH said, as the answer of his hon. Friend did not meet his Question, he would give Notice that to-morrow he would put his Question in the following form:—Whether he would explain to the House why it was that officers in the Scientific Corps employed in the Public Works Department, or holding Staff appointments in India, received on promotion to the rank of Major the rate of pay drawn by Captains, while Officers in the Cavalry, Infantry, or Staff Corps holding the rank of Major received the full benefit of the emoluments of that rank?

JURIES (WALES).—QUESTION.

MR. O. STANLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he has considered the desirability for the due administration of justice in Wales of amending the Law as regards Juries; and, if he will introduce a Bill for Wales similar to the one just introduced for Ireland, enacting that persons unable to speak, read, or write the English language should be exempted from serving as jurors in Wales; and also for raising the property qualification of jurors?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that there was a Bill before the House on the subject of Juries, and he thought the most convenient and satisfactory way to deal with the difficult and important question his hon. Friend had raised would be to place Amendments to it on the Notice Paper, which would enable the Government fully to consider his proposition.

Mr. Grant Duff

ARMY—MILITIA BANDS.—QUESTION.

MR. GREVILLE-NUGENT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is in contemplation to place the Bands of Militia Regiments in the United Kingdom on the same footing, with respect to an annual allowance, as enjoyed by the Bands of Regiments of the Line?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The cost of music, so far as it is necessary for military purposes, in Regiments of Militia, is defrayed at present by the public. This will continue to be the case; but it is not intended to do anything further.

FOREIGN OFFICE—CONSUL GENERAL (EGYPT).—QUESTION.

MR. W. LOWTHER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Colonel Stanton has resigned his post as Her Majesty's Agent and Consul General in Egypt; and, whether Colonel Stanton's successor has been or is about to be appointed?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Colonel Stanton has not resigned his post as Her Majesty's Agent and Consul General in Egypt. He is about quitting his post for a period of leave which has been granted to him, and temporary arrangements have been made for the performance of the Consul General's duties during this absence.

PROBATES, &c., OF WILLS (SCOTLAND). QUESTION.

MR. DODDS asked the Lord Advocate, Whether arrangements can be made to render probates of wills and letters of administration duly granted in England available in Scotland without the necessity for having them marked in the books of the Commissary Court of Scotland in Edinburgh?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: In answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman. I may say I have not myself heard of any complaints against the existing law on the subject referred to in his inquiry, or that it leads to any grievance or practical inconvenience. It is no doubt proper that the subject should be discussed; but it would require the greatest consideration before any alteration could be made in the existing law.

NINEVEH EXCAVATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. MACFIE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he has taken into consideration whether the Government might not, with public advantage, supply Mr. George Smith, now engaged in excavating at the King's Library in Nineveh, with further personal and pecuniary help, in order to secure for the British Museum the literary treasure in the Great Mound, which the telegram from Mosul, dated 19th, says "large sum of money are required to lay open?"

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the hon. Gentleman seems to think that as soon as a telegram arrives in this country stating that large sums of money are required to proceed with a particular enterprise, I have nothing to do but to rush in and fill up the vacuum. In that opinion I do not agree with him. In the case to which he refers it has been found impossible to continue the work in the hot weather, and those engaged in it are about to return to England. If we wished, therefore, nothing could be done just yet.

QUESTION.

COLONEL BARTELOT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he will state to the House upon what grounds the treasure taken at Kirwee in January 1859, shortly before the end of the insurrectionary war, in the house of Mukhoond Rao Jamdar, a rebel enemy, was held not to be legal booty?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I have to say that the money having been found a considerable time after the capture of Kirwee was restored to its rightful owner by the civil authorities in the ordinary course of their duty.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL—THE NEW CODE.—QUESTION.

MR. GORDON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, seeing that the School Boards in Scotland require, not later than 12th June next, to intimate to the respective parochial boards the sums of money which they estimate must be assessed for the expenditure during the ensuing year, and that such expenditure will in many parishes depend to a considerable extent on the regulations as to building grants contained in the New Scotch Code, he will now state when the Code will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: No time is being lost in connection with the subject of the inquiry of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and I hope to be able to lay the Scotch Education Code on the Table of the House certainly before the Whitsuntide Recess.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD ACT, 1872—PROSECUTIONS.—QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether, having reference to a paragraph that appeared in the "Pall Mall Gazette" on the 17th of May, inspectors of markets, nuisances, or weights and measures, as the local authority may appoint, are not bound to prosecute under the terms of "The Adulteration Act, 1872," upon receiving a certificate from the local analyst; and, whether under such circumstances an analyst is not abusing the confidential nature of his position in sending notice of the adulteration to the seller? The paragraph to which he referred was as follows:—

"Dr. Corfield has just presented his first Report as food analyst to the Vestry of St. George, Hanover Square. Of 15 samples of ground coffee only four were genuine, while nine were adulterated with chicory, caramel, &c. He had analyzed 20 samples of milk, and found five only genuine. Two or three were deteriorated, some were adulterated with water, besides having been skimmed. He proposed to send notice of the adulteration to the seller. The Report was ordered to be printed."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, that of course he did not pretend to know whether the paragraph upon which the noble Lord grounded his Question was correct or not. Looking at the 6th section of 35 & 36 Vict., c. 74, it seemed to be clearly laid down that when the analyst had brought under the notice of the Inspector a case of adulteration, it was the duty of the latter to make a complaint before the magistrates, and it was their duty to issue a summons. What might be done thereupon was, of course, for the magistrates themselves to say. As to the second Question, he could give the noble Lord no authoritative opinion. There was nothing in the Act of Parliament to forbid the analyst sending notice of the adulteration to the seller, and he could only say that if he were analyst he should not do it, but there were other men who might take a very different view.

FOREIGN OFFICE—GREEK LEGATIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. ION HAMILTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the report that the Greek Government have decided to suppress all Legations to Foreign Courts except Constantinople; and, whether the Greek Legation in London is, in consequence, to be withdrawn?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Her Majesty's Minister at Athens, Mr. Stuart, has reported that he had been informed by the Hellenic Minister of State, Mr. Deligeorges, that the Hellenic Government intended to suppress all their Legations abroad, with the exception of that at Constantinople, but up to the present moment no notification had been made either at Athens or in London of withdrawing the Greek Legation from this country.

INDIA—DEATHS BY SNAKE-BITES.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he will state to the House the number of persons killed annually in India by Snake-bites; and, whether any more active steps are about to be taken for the destruction of poisonous reptiles, as well as for ascertaining methods of cure?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to the hon. Baronet's first Question, I am sorry to say that 14,529 persons would appear to have lost their lives by snake-bites alone in the year 1869. The later Returns we have received do not distinguish deaths caused by snakes from deaths caused by other dangerous animals; but in 1871 the total deaths caused by dangerous animals amounted to 18,078. In reply to his second Question, I have to say that the subject of the destruction of snakes and of the medical measures to be adopted in consequence of snake-bites is occupying much attention in India, and I think that Dr. Fayrer's very remarkable book, of which 340 copies have been sent to India for distribution, is likely to produce excellent results.

The Attorney General

PARLIAMENT—FORMS AND USAGES OF THE HOUSE—PRINTING OF BILLS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he wished to put a Question to Mr. Speaker with reference to the forms and usages of the House. It would be recollected that he had yesterday moved that the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of the Borough Franchise (Ireland) Bill should be discharged. He had taken that course because the Bill having been nominally on the Table of the House since the 2nd of April, and the hon. Member who had charge of it never having taken any steps to have it printed, he thought it was very unfair that many hon. Members should be brought down to the House week after week to look after what was, in point of fact, a dummy Bill. He now wished to ask, Whether it was within the forms and usages of the House for an hon. Member to obtain leave to bring in a Bill, to obtain an order of the House for the printing of the Bill, and then to postpone it time after time without taking any steps to have it printed and circulated among hon. Members?

MR. SPEAKER: The question of the hon. and gallant Member refers to the Borough Franchise (Ireland) Bill, upon which a Vote of this House was taken yesterday. I find on reference to the Votes that Leave was given by the House for the introduction of the Bill upwards of six weeks ago, and that on the same occasion the Bill was ordered to be printed. No doubt it is opposed to the usage of the House that so great a delay should take place between the Order of the House for the printing of the Bill and the circulation of the Bill among hon. Members. Perhaps the House will allow me to say, with reference to what occurred yesterday, that when the Clerk at the Table, at my desire, read the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of this Bill, the hon. and gallant Member for Dungannon (Colonel Stuart Knox) rose in his place and moved that the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of the Bill should be discharged. The hon. and gallant Member did that without Notice, and I trust that the House will allow me to say that that is a precedent which I hope will not be followed in the future, because I am satisfied it would be productive of much inconvenience to the House. When the hon. and gallant Member for Dungannon made that Motion I called upon the hon. Member having charge of the Bill (Mr. Callan) to state what course he proposed to take with regard to the Bill. As the hon. Member for Dundalk was not in his place on that occasion, I deem it my duty to say that every hon. Member having charge of a Bill owes it to the House to make known to the House what course he desires shall be taken with regard to the Bill when it is called on.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE)

BILL.—[BILL 146.]

[Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Hibbert.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Stansfeld.)

MR. CAWLEY rose to move that the Bill be read a second time upon this day six months. It was impossible to discuss this measure without at the same time discussing the Valuation Bill, which immediately followed it in the list of Business for to-night, because the two measures formed part and parcel of the same subject, and if passed would together form the foundation of all our future legislation with regard to local taxation in its relation to Imperial taxation. Under these circumstances, it was of the first importance that these Bills should be fully and carefully discussed, otherwise but a short period would elapse before fresh measures would have to be introduced in order to correct the mistakes which it was certain would be made if these Bills were passed hastily and without being sufficiently considered. He was aware that he should be met at the onset by the objection that all the matters to which he was about to refer were only questions of detail, which could be more conveniently considered in Committee; but his experience in that House had shown him that it was impossible for a full and exhaustive discussion of a Bill to take place at any of its stages but that of the second reading. Turning to the Bill now before the House, he found that it endeavoured to deal with the question of liability in a very summary way. He, however, ventured to suggest that not only this measure, but the one that immediately followed it, instead of settling matters, would really unsettle much that had been settled by the onerous labours of the Courts of Law, and would lay the foundation for endless litigation, misunderstanding, and disputes, which would have to be settled hereafter by the Legislature. By the 3rd clause of the Bill it was proposed to extend the liability to three classes of property. In the first place, it proposed to extend the liability to mines of all kinds. But it happened that there was nothing which had a less definite legal meaning than what was included in the term mine, and unless the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was prepared to state distinctly on the face of the Bill what he intended to include in that term, he would be doing that which must inevitably lead to much future confusion. There was no difficulty connected with the definition of an ironstone mine when worked from below; but iron ore which could be got from the surface of the ground by throwing off the earth with which it was mixed, would escape taxation as a mine. Take the case of clay—clay had been held to be a mine when worked from below, in the manner of coal, and not a mine when worked from the surface. Every day fresh kinds of earth, shale, &c., were being brought into use. He apprehended that the real object of the Bill was that all these things, which were produced from the earth, should be taxed. If that was its intention, let the Bill contain a distinct declaration to that effect, instead of leaving it to Courts of Law to determine what was rateable under the Bill. At present he was not discussing the question whether this was property that ought to be rated in the same way as other property; he was merely drawing attention to the uncertain phraseology of the Bill. If he was to take this Bill in connection with the other Bill which provided for valuation he utterly failed to find how the annual value of growing timber, as distinguished from underwood, was to be ascertained. Nothing had been introduced to render more definite the mode of ascertaining the value; but the words "from year to year" in the Parochial Assessment Act were to be changed into "one year with another." He, as well as some of his legal friends, was puzzled to know what was the legal interpretation of the phrase "one year with another," literally it meant the average of two years. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean that, or did he mean an average of five years, for which he proposed the valuation list should hold good. He next came to the proposal to repeal the Act passed by the present Parliament which exempted ragged schools and Sunday schools from rating. He regretted exceedingly that the right hon. Gentleman, in his love for abolishing exemptions, should have asked them to abolish the Act which was passed, after considerable discussion, by that very House. The whole country was against the repeal of that Act, and in favour of the exemption of such institutions as those schools which were carried on, not for the benefit of any private individual, but for the benefit of those who needed help, and could not help themselves. If the Government proceeded with the clause for the repeal of the Act he hoped the Committee would strike out that clause. To some extent scientific and literary institutions should also be exempt from rating. He would also draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the difficulty he had created by the introduction of a supposed principle of rating in the other Bill. In that Bill there was a provision which required the rating of places which were almost valueless. The next important point was that which dealt with the rating of property belonging to corporations and municipal governments. When the right hon. Gentleman admitted that the time had come when this description of property should not escape without rating, he expected the Government would have come forward and enunciated a principle on which Government property should be rated; but he failed to discover here anything more than might be set forth in the resolution of the House, to the effect that such rating ought to take place. He could not understand why they should be asked to simply affirm in an Act of Parliament a particular proposition that the Government should prepare a scheme and then ask Parliament to sanction it after it was done. In his opinion, the whole initiation ought to rest entirely with the Government. Then it appeared that if a scheme should be propounded and laid before Parliament, and a Bill

founded upon it should be introduced, the very delightful privilege was given to the assessment committees to petition against the measure and fight out the matter, as was done in regard to a Private Bill. He confessed that was a privilege which most persons would be glad to get rid of. He admitted, without hesitation, that there were classes of property belonging to and used by the Imperial Government, which either ought not to be rated at all, or only at very small sums indeed. Take the case of fortifications. If fortifications were at places where they did injury to property around them, the owners of such property would be entitled to compensation. But fortifications stood on a wholly different footing from Government offices. The question, however, came back—on what principle were these structures to be rated? He contended that the House ought not to be asked to sanction a measure of this kind without a principle of rating being laid down which could be carried out by the assessment committees. The Bill also failed to state any definite process for valuing the property of local authorities, and the powers given to the surveyors of taxes by those Bills which far exceeded those given in the metropolitan Act, would raise objections from one end of the country to the other. The valuation list was to be sent in duplicate to the surveyor, and he could put in his own statement as to the value of the property, and on the list being returned to the assessment committee, the latter were bound to accept the surveyor's figures, unless they were proved to be wrong. Such a proposal would give great dissatisfaction to the country, and if adopted, would create much mischief. No hon. Member was so blind as not to detect the object the Government had in view. In reference to Imperial taxation, the object was to raise the value as high as possible. Hon. Gentlemen were perfectly well aware that there had been all along a constant dispute as to where the line of rateability with regard to machinery in some form or other was to be drawn. Without stopping to define it himself, he insisted that no Act should be passed dealing with the subject which did not particularly define what machinery should be rated. In practice the limit did not usually extend beyond the steam-engine when fixed on the masonry and what was known as the first motion and the main shafting. But some machinery was necessarily secured by screws or bolts, and it was held to be thereby attached to the freehold, and became part of the hereditament. It thus became rateable, but an absurd contradiction arose. In some cases a large quantity of machinery was worked from a single engine. The engine and boiler were in that case rated; but if each machine was worked by a small separate engine affixed to it, the boiler and steam pipes only were rateable. Another very common anomaly was that of two machines precisely alike; one would be rated because it was fixed on stone, and the other was not because it was fixed on timber not part of the freehold. If machinery was to be rated at all, the law should clearly state what machinery. Though we had got something approaching to a system as regarded a certain class of rateable property, it was by no means satisfactory; he referred to our great works, such as railways, canals, ironworks, gasworks, docks, and so on. He ventured to say that these were matters which deserved the attention of the Government before dealing with this great question of local and Imperial taxation, and that some method of settling these questions ought to be laid down. The present system was most difficult and unsatisfactory, and neither of the Bills helped them in dealing with property of that class. When they were rating property which did not admit of being let to a tenant they had to take a hypothetical tenant, and make calculations founded on hypotheses which had no relation to fact in order to arrive at some figure or other. It was impossible to say how far, in many cases, they were taxing the profits of trade, and not the hereditament itself. The Bill did nothing to diminish the difficulties; but, on the contrary, by introducing the surveyor of taxes, would increase them. The interpretation of the word hereditament given in the interpretation clause was very large. Take also Clause 55 of the Valuation Bill, which was introduced to meet the case of large mansions. When any building not used for purposes of trade or commerce could not—

“By reason of its size, character, use, or any exceptional circumstances, be properly valued according to the annual rent which a tenant might reasonably be expected to pay,” it was to valued “according to the annual value thereof to the person occupying the same in respect of its actual use and occupation.”

He could not conceive words more open to objection, and he defied any one to lay down a clear and definite rule for carrying out that clause. There were many cases in which a nobleman or gentleman inherited with a large and valuable estate a moderately sized house which was of little or no value to let to another person, but with which, from family considerations, he would not dream of parting. Who would undertake to say what its annual value was to him for use or occupation? Or take the case of a gentleman coming into an encumbered estate with a house three times the size he needed, having regard to his actual income from the estate. What was the value of it to him in respect of his use or occupation? He would be thankful to get out of it, but could only do so by letting it at a nominal rent. Such property should be dealt with according to its actual letting value; and he doubted whether, under the words of the section, a ragged school, hospital, or other charitable institution could be assessed at all, because no man could say what was its value for use or occupation. Another important point was the deductions which were to be made from the gross value in order to fix the rateable value. He ventured to say that the distinction between gross and rateable value was little more than a myth. In point of fact, the valuers, so long as they got a fair rateable value, did not trouble themselves about gross value; but when the gross value was the measure of the property tax, it became necessary to have the gross value correct, as well as the rateable value. The right hon. Gentleman had proposed that there should be a maximum reduction, applicable all over the country. The deductions were intended to cover the costs of repair, insurance, and other expenses necessary to maintain the hereditament at its annual value, and the deductions proposed by the Government were set out in the schedule. He (Mr. Cawley) controverted absolutely, and without qualification, the doctrine that in order to be equitable, deductions ought to be everywhere at one and the same rate. The rent which a man paid for a house depended upon its situation, and included not only the building, but the value of the land. In large towns a house would let at three times the rent that it would bring in the country; the cost of repairs in each case was pretty much identical, but the proportion which they bore to the rent was a totally different percentage. He demurred, therefore, to the conclusion that because in one case one-fourth was deducted, and in another one-sixth, therefore these deductions were erroneous. If they applied one universal rule to the country at large they were likely to do harm, and more-likely to create injustice and inequality than to remedy one. With regard to mills and factories, one-third was proposed to be taken off, with regard to house property one-fifth, and with regard to land with buildings and houses one-tenth. One-third off a factory might be very fair if we were dealing with the machinery itself, but very few would maintain in the case of a good sound mill that one-third must be expended in keeping it in condition. The thing was absurd on the face of it, and therefore we should make a mistake if we laid down a table of maximum deductions, leaving it uncertain how it was to be applied. They had got no fewer than six classes of property to which the note was appended—

"To be determined in each case according to the circumstances and the general principles of law as amended by this Act."

What those general principles of law were he confessed he did not understand. He could only imagine that whoever drew the Bill put in these words because he felt himself utterly at sea, and unable to lay down any principle of law. His objection to these Bills was not so much against the machinery. He objected to them on the ground that they settled nothing; that they laid the foundation for greater disputes and difficulties; and that they inevitably entailed the necessity of dealing with the question in a more clear and distinct form at a future time. Instead of pressing forward these measures, the Government ought to take these points into consideration, and lay upon the Table a complete and comprehensive measure, dealing with the whole question. The Valuation Bill appeared from its size a somewhat important measure; but to a great extent it was taken up merely in changing the machinery of the assessment committee and the appeal to the Quarter Sessions which at present existed. He did not see the great advantage to be derived from this change; but he could well believe that it would create considerable confusion. In saying that he put out of view the introduction of the surveyor of taxes, an alteration which would hardly recommend itself to the country. In conclusion, he must say that the measures before the House were crude and ill-digested, and ought not to be proceeded with in their present state. He ventured to add that though it might be true that most of the questions he had alluded to were matters of detail, nevertheless they were matters so important that they ought not be left to depend on Amendments suggested by private Members in Committee. They were questions which should come before the House with all the weight which the consideration of the Ministry could give them, and until the Ministry had given them that consideration the measures ought not to be proceeded with. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. CORRANCE, in seconding the Amendment, said, he was by no means disposed to repudiate this Bill because it provided for the extension of rating to property hitherto exempt. Why, then, was he driven to agree with his hon. Friend (Mr. Cawley) that it should not be allowed to proceed beyond its present stage? When the Bill was introduced he said that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was insufficient to convince him that he had mastered its details. The right hon. Gentleman had avoided giving the House any clear or distinct intimation how his proposal was to be worked out. He, however, expressed a hope that when the Bill was in their hands they might be able to satisfy themselves on many debateable points. Did the Bill do this? It did not. The right hon. Gentleman called the Bill unphilosophical; he also admitted it was illogical; but he said it was a small Bill. He should not quarrel with it as a small Bill if it had laid down any clear and sound principle; but it was vague, shadowy, illusory, and unjust. The right hon. Gentleman was doubtless prudent in limiting its extent, for if he had attempted reform in too many instances there would have been a combination against him. One curious feature of the measure was this, it laid the burden all on the same sort of property—it rated owners to relieve the occupiers. The Bill proposed to rate Government property; but in that matter he thought they should only rate the ground rent, giving to the locality that advantage, but no more. As to the definition of a mine, he hoped the difficulty of obtaining a definition would be overcome, and that mines might take their fair share of the burdens of the country; and as to woods, he must object to leave the matter in the hands of the assessment committee, assuming a basis and rating the property in any way they liked. The right hon. Gentleman was bound to give the assessment committee some general principle on which they might act. With regard to game, the local committee ought to have power to rate the sum derived as rent to its full amount; but he could not go beyond that, because it would be found where much game was kept there would be a deduction made in the rent, and where little game existed the value of it would be included in the land. He contended that the Bill was not a just one. Its intention was that all property of all descriptions should be subject to a rate; but the 13th clause constituted it a Bill of exemptions of the most serious character. Rating of stock in trade might be said to be obsolete and impracticable in England. But in France, in 1793, the first act of the Convention was to sweep away all those personal taxes which had proved so onerous, because they were confined to the lower classes; and from that time every inhabitant of France had paid, in lieu of any tax upon personal property, a tax upon his rent or rental, which, in 1867-8, was fixed by law at one-twentieth part of the rent paid by each resident upon the portion he resided in. And what was the case in America? There personal property had been taxed to an enormous extent, and no one ever dreamed of exempting stock in trade from a personal tax. He had before him a Return of the proportion of the taxation of real and personal estate in various States, cities, and counties of America; and the ratio of personal to real varied from 1 to 1·20 to 1 to 10·46. Commissioners who had been appointed to inquire into the subject, thus wound up their labours—

"That to tax one man for one species of property, because, through his honesty, ignorance, or inability to escape, he can be laid hold of,

and to fail to tax another man, because he is cunning and unscrupulous, and so cannot be laid hold of, is not taxation, but arbitrary confiscation." And again, "In almost every community, it is not so much the extent as it is the inequality which constitutes the burden of taxation, and the Commissioners have been much impressed with the circumstance that, in conversing with the heaviest taxpayers of the State, it has not been so much the burden which is complained of, as it is that, while the individual in question claims to pay, his neighbours and associates in some way manage to escape."

In fact, he could find no instance in any foreign country where some equivalent was not given for the remission of taxation on personal property. Stock in trade had been taxed in this country upon the income annually derived from it; it was a class Parliament which exempted it, and not a ratepayers' Parliament; and it was obvious, with the power which had been gained by the working classes, this exemption was absolutely unsafe. He had no fault to find with the Bill in its details; but as it accepted a principle which was unsafe, he was bound to resist it at this stage.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Cawley.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. PEASE observed, that if the proposal to throw aside this Bill would give satisfaction to the constituencies of the hon. Gentlemen by whom its rejection had been moved and seconded, it would certainly have the opposite effect on his own constituency, who would regard the throwing out of the measure as a great disaster. He accepted the Bill as a small but important step in the settlement of a great question. He believed that it would bring under rating in the North Riding of Yorkshire something like £100,000 annual value of metallic mines, and also a large number of lead mines in the county he had the honour to represent (South Durham.) According to the Bill personal property was not to be rated, neither was the tradesman's stock. If the trader was rated on his stock-in-trade the farmer must also be rated on his cattle and implements, the rating must come out of profits, and the landlords must reduce their rents. There was but little difficulty in the rating of game or wood lands. Where the game was reserved by the landlord and re-let the tenant paid less rent; and with regard to the planting of trees, the tenant should pay as much as when the land was arable. The question of rating of personalty was a very large and important one, which it would take a strong Government, indeed, to deal with, but which he trusted the party opposite might be able to grapple with when they came into office. The general question of rating was a question which, in his opinion, the House could only deal with piecemeal and seriatim. Several ineffectual attempts to rate metallic mines had already been made; and on the last occasion, when the mineral mine-owners had agreed to be rated under the Bill of the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham), the right hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) proposed the omission from the Bill of every provision except the statement that the mines were to be rated. Against this proceeding the then Attorney General (Sir Robert Collier) protested and the Bill was withdrawn, yet this was what the right hon. Gentleman now proposed. The present Bill was a very bold measure, and in some respects a good one; but when his right hon. Friend (the President of the Local Government Board) came to the really difficult point he evaded it. Surely his right hon. Friend must know very well that the difficulty of rating metallic mines could never be solved without some definition of a mine. It was not merely a hole in the ground and the machinery for drawing materials out of it, but sometimes there was a mile of railway connected with it. In some cases, in Durham and Yorkshire, mines had been sunk at an expense in rent alone of £30,000 or £40,000 before any benefit could be realized. Such a mine was not to be rated. A Return presented to the House, on the Motion of his hon. Friend the late Member for Whitby (Mr. Bagnall), showed that to arrive at the net estimated rental of a coal mine—that at Belper, in Derbyshire—the deduction from the rent taken by the landlord was 25 per cent; at Hayfield, in the same county, 10 per cent; at Bishop-Auckland, 20 per cent; at Durham, 25 per cent; and in Weardale, 50 per cent. Again, to take one or two instances from the district with which his hon. Friend was himself connected: At Oldham, 33 per cent was deducted; at Blackburn, 25 per cent; and other places in Lancashire showed as great a variation. Turning to Wales, he found that at Pontypool every ton of coal was rated at 8*d.*, whereas in another union the rate was only 4*d.* At Newport, the deduction was 13½ per cent, and at Neath 5 per cent. As his right hon. Friend brought in a large area of mining property, he would be simply perpetuating and extending the existing anomalies unless he laid down a definite rule as to the assessment of mines, instead of vaguely stating that all those differences and difficulties were to be determined according to the circumstances and the general principles of law. Under the present Bill the valuation made by the assessment committee was to be the basis of rating for five years, and to this proviso he offered at present no objection, except that no exception to the rule was made in the case of mines, although it was well known that many a colliery would yield twice as much coal in one year as it would in another, and by rating for five years injustice would be done to the union and to the miner. All these, however, were points of detail which might be fitly discussed in Committee, but which could hardly be debated on the Motion for the second reading. As far as the metallic mines were concerned, a great injustice would be done to the unions if they were not brought this year into the rateable area, and for that reason he should support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he would support the Bill because it accomplished what many private Members had vainly attempted to accomplish. There were a great many difficulties connected with the assessment of mines, the value of which varied considerably in different districts. In one small district in West Cumberland the annual value of the iron mines was £344,000 a year, and yet they contributed nothing to the rates. It had been suggested that a variety of schedules might be drawn up to take effect in different parts of the country, but he doubted whether the House would ever agree to such a scale. He would be able to show in Committee that the royalty of a mine was in no sense its rateable value, and while it was one thing to allow people in Cornwall or Devon, as the Government proposed, to rate mines in that way, it was another thing to force the system on the rest of the country. The Government had approached the subject in the only way in which it could be satisfactorily dealt with. The method of valuation was yearly improving, skilled valuers being increasingly employed, and it was only when the powers of assimilation had been carried further by local action that Parliament would be able to step in and lay down rules for the rating of mines. To attempt this now would simply cause confusion and injustice; but that was no reason why property worth nearly £11,500,000 a-year should remain exempt from rates.

MR. REED wished distinctly to enter his protest against the repeal of exemptions granted to Sunday schools and ragged schools by the Act of 1869. Some doubt had arisen on the Acts of 3 & 4 Will. IV., and when, in order to confirm the exemptions granted by those Acts, he brought in the Bill of 1869, it was supported by 228 against 71, and its principle was assented to by the Government then and still in power. Now the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, proposed to repeal the later Act. What would happen? He would leave unrepealed the statutes of William IV.; and the consequence would be that half the schools in the country would still remain exempt, while the other half would become liable to this heavy tax. When the Bill of 1869 was introduced there were 1,400 Petitions containing 171,000 signatures. A great amount of popular feeling existed in favour of these schools. They were carried on without a shilling of cost by people who thoroughly possessed the confidence of the country, and whose work, by inculcating virtue, must lead to reduction of rating through diminishing the annual cost of crime. Now it was proposed to levy a tax which would amount in some cases to from 40 to 50 per cent of the present outgoings. At Stockport, for example, an excellent school of the value of £5,000 would probably be closed by the effect of such a provision as this. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider the question; but if not, he should feel it his duty in Committee to go more fully into the subject. Great care was taken that these schools should be used for no other purpose than teaching, and he thought they were fairly entitled to the consideration of the Government.

MR. HUNT said, the conclusion at which he had arrived, after listening to the discussion which had taken place, was that the Government were trifling with the farmers in introducing these measures at the present time, and it was quite clear that the schemes of the Government were not intended to pass during the present Session, if it was intended to pass them at all. With regard to the first two Bills, the Government did not appear to have made up their minds on many important points, and had left them in very vague outline. The machinery proposed by the second Bill with regard to rating was the special and quarter sessions, when the Government had stated their intention of moving for the appointment of a Committee with the view of constituting a new local authority for local administration. Now, if the Government had any such intention, it was somewhat surprising that they should lay on the Table a Bill continuing the old machinery of the quarter sessions. These Bills showed that they had been introduced by the Government, not with the idea of passing them into law, but merely to prevent the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) from proceeding with his Motion on Local Taxation. There was no clear statement as to how country houses and public buildings were to be dealt with—all that was left as shadowy as possible, and as to the proposal to rate Government property it simply amounted to this—that a scheme was to be framed by the Treasury and laid before Parliament for confirmation. Parliament long ago made up its mind that all exemptions should be abolished, and if the Government had been in earnest on the question they would have had the Treasury scheme already prepared and they would have presented it to the House concurrently with these Bills. Bills which dealt with such intricate and difficult matters as were involved in the question of rating and taxing could not be expected to become law when they were not presented to Parliament until near the end of May. The Bill which dealt with valuation undertook to provide uniformity of valuation, but it really provided nothing of the kind. In the Bill which he introduced in 1867, it was provided that there should be a valuation Board in every county to decide on the valuations and to issue instructions which should be binding on the different assessment committees of the county. But in the present Bill there was no such common authority for framing a scale of reductions. The Bill laid down what was to be the maximum; but there might be a very wide margin below that maximum within which the different assessment committees might act as they thought best, and the result might be, that several different scales for reductions would be in operation in one county. All this pointed to the fact that the Bill was not intended to become law, and that it had been introduced simply to make a show, and to serve the purpose of the moment. It was simply a skeleton Bill which the Government had made no attempt to fill up. If the two Bills were read a second time he presumed they would be sent to a Select Committee; if that was not the intention they had better be withdrawn at once, for it would only be a waste of time to proceed with them in their present shape. He did not think the appellate tribunal provided in the present measure was by any means so satisfactory as the one provided in the Bill which he introduced in 1867. In his Bill it was originally provided that appeals should be referred to a skilled barrister of so many years standing; but the Select Committee to whom that Bill was referred substituted a County Court Judge for the special assessor originally proposed. But in the Bill of the Government two appellate tribunals were proposed—the petty sessions and the assessment committee of the quarter sessions; and in that a very mischievous feature had been introduced into the Bill, which, if it were carried out, would add considerably to the expense of appeals. For his own part, he could see no reason for more than one appeal. He trusted, therefore, that the Government another year when they brought the subject forward again would place before the House a complete and mature scheme, and one which, above all, would work.

Mr. STANSFELD said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had that evening exhibited a courage which he had never seen equalled by a man occupying the position which he had done, and which he now did. The right hon. Gentleman was not content with disputing the merits of the measure, but had taken upon himself to define and determine the motives of the Government. He had stated that the measure was so inefficient as to be dishonest, and that it was not intended by the Government that the Bill should be passed during the present Session. Statements of that character did not become the right hon. Gentleman. And upon what foundation had the right hon. Gentleman based those statements? Upon a comparison of some small details of the present Bill with the details contained in a Bill formerly introduced by the right hon. Gentleman himself, and on a criticism of the schedule of the Bill. He (Mr. Stansfeld) had no intention, upon the second reading of this Bill, to discuss at length the schedule of deductions. There was only one way in which the question of reductions could be dealt with, and that was by scheduling the maximum reductions, and allowing them to be varied according to the local circumstances of each place. Local conditions varied so much that there might properly be a schedule which would allow variation in the reductions. He maintained that the Government had adopted the right course in providing a maximum, and allowing the local authorities, from local knowledge, to determine how they would deal within that maximum with the cases which arose before them. The right hon. Gentleman, having exhausted his small criticisms, fell back upon the Motion and the speech in support of it of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley). That hon. Gentleman's objections to the Bill were of a very wide character. He said it was vague and indefinite; that it unsettled actual law, promoted litigation, and would be incomplete without further legislation. There was no foundation for these assertions. With respect to the charge of vagueness, the hon. Gentleman asked what was the legal meaning of the word "mine," and whether tracts of land from which clay and ironstone were taken without digging deep into the earth were to be assessed or exempted. But the hon. Gentleman before asking such a question, ought to have ascertained what the Bill did, and what the law on the subject was. Under the law as it existed land was rated from which clay or ironstone was taken, because they added to the annual value of the property and the profits of the soil. The only reason for extending the present law was that the Act of Elizabeth, by expressly exempting coal mines, had been held by the Courts of Law to exclude all other mines. Then, as to plantations, the hon. Gentleman asked how was it possible to value them? There was no necessity for supplying a method of valuation in the Bill, as no difficulty was now found in assessing the value of beech and underwood. The hon. Member thought, too, that the phrase "the value, taking one year with another," was very unsound, and not understanding it, he consulted a legal friend, whose views on the subject must have been somewhat hazy. There could be no difficulty in the matter, as the annual value would be ascertained by taking the average of a number of years. Then, again, the hon. Member attacked the measure because it was, as he said, incomplete—a skeleton—and that argument had been endorsed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northamptonshire. It was incomplete, it was asserted, because it did not enter into all the difficult and complicated questions connected with rating—because it did not go into every detail as to the rating of mines, gasworks, and railways; and the hon. Gentleman charged the Government with having put before the House a Bill which was not worthy of their support. But the hon. Gentleman knew that the Bill was but a part of a larger scheme to which the Government were pledged, and if they had attempted to deal at present with all the complicated questions he had mentioned, they would have been fairly open to the charge of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northamptonshire of having introduced the Bills, not to pass them, but only for the purpose of delay. They had, in part fulfilment of their pledge, brought in Bills of limited dimension, but of much practical value. They proposed to abolish exemptions, but to do so it was not necessary to go into complex questions of value. The second Bill was a considerable measure of reform, but they desired to confine it within limits which would enable them to pass both measures—as he hoped and believed they would do—during the present Session. Under the Bill before the House the same basis of valuation was secured for Government taxes and for rates of all kinds, while the litigation which now obtained, owing to a multiplication of appeals, was avoided. Now, any individual ratepayer might appeal against any rate, but, under the Bill, when once the valuation which might be appealed against was finally settled and came into force, no further appeal on the ground of valuation could be brought. He believed that had the Government undertaken a greater task they would thereby have postponed the consideration of the greater questions of local government and the relations of local and Imperial taxation, which must necessarily follow the enactment of the present measures. The hon. Gentleman had contended that the introduction of a surveyor of taxes tended to centralization; but if it were desirable to have the same basis for Imperial taxes, the income tax, the house tax and local rates, the Government had no option but to propose the appointment of an officer representing the Inland Revenue for the purpose of hearing and deciding such questions as might arise. The hon. Gentleman, too, overlooked the fact that there was an appeal from the decisions of that officer to the local tribunals, with an ultimate appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench. He would also remind his hon. Friend that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) provided in his Bill that there should be an appeal from the surveyor of taxes in the same way. The speech of the hon. Member for East Suffolk (Mr. Corrance), who had seconded the Motion for the rejection of this Bill, was to his mind a curiosity; and he had been really at a loss for a very considerable time to know by what ingenious process he would bring himself to second the Motion for the rejection of the Bill. From the speech he had made to-night, as well as on a former occasion, it was evident that there was a great deal in the Government measures, taken as a whole, which met his approval and commanded his support. But the hon. Gentleman had made a discovery as to the Act relating to the exemption of stock in trade from rating. He told the House that the Act was passed in 1844, at a time when the landowners were unavoidably absent from Parliamentary duties; but surely the landlords and sportsmen of the country had not been absent in every Session since 1844 when that annual Act was before the House. The hon. Member seconded the Motion for the rejection of this Bill, because he said he traced in it the "cloven foot"—namely, that the Government did not intend to relieve the realty from any part of the burden of local rates, and that the provision in question was a declaration of that intention. He had much satisfaction in assuring his hon. Friend that it was no declaration of any such intention on the part of the Government; but that the object of the clause was simply to relieve the House from the necessity of passing an annual Bill, to which no objection was ever raised. Another hon. Gentleman (Mr. Pease) would be glad if he would take away all discretion from assessment committees in regard to the rating of land, and fix a rule by which they were to uniformly rate in every part of the country. To attempt that, he would be impossible, and he proposed to agree with the hon. Member for Cumberland (Mr. Percy) that any such attempt would result in failure. It did not necessarily imply a want of courage to decline to improve upon the present system of this kind matters, but to avoid unnecessary differences upon these and other points, the Government proposed to proceed with deference to the suggestions of the hon. Members. The hon. Member would address the House by the hon. Member (Mr. Reed) next, and he trusted that the Government would be satisfied with the result of the debate. He had been told that an effort had been made to value the Government property in Plymouth in this way, and that the valuers on both sides having agreed, there was no need of an umpire, and the matter in by the hon. Member is perfectly correct to say that the Government accepted it as a rule, no doubt made should be to the fact that it was entirely changed, not then proposed involving a change from rating to valuation, now laid down in the Bill. The hon. Member far was not prepared to show that the Government were to assess themselves, and that there was to be no appeal from their valuation, which was likely to be of any value. The Treasury also were not to be asked to make any re-assessment of the local authority applied to them on the subject. There was also no means for rectifying any impropriety in the assessment. It was true that a Bill was to be laid before the House in case of complaint; but there was no provision for carrying the matter any further. According to the Government proposal, a man in certain cases would be the assessor of his own property, and the person before whom the appeal might be made. What he thought would be agreed by the House with satisfaction was some such arrangement as this—namely, in places where Government property was situated the authorities in those places should name one valuer and the Treasury another, and in the event of disagreement an umpire should be called in to decide the matter in question. That plan would be more just and reasonable when it was considered that in Portsmouth and other towns with large Government establishments there was generally a large amount of pauper property. He had been told that an effort had been made to value the Government property in Plymouth in this way, and that the valuers on both sides having agreed, there was no need of an umpire, and the matter

Bill; but when his hon. Friend's Amendment was before the House, and when he had stated his objections to the proposal, if it should then be the wish of the House to deal exceptionally with institutions of that character, he was not prepared to say that the Government would offer an obstinate resistance or consider the subject in an unfriendly spirit. He gave no pledge, however, until he had seen the form the proposal of his hon. Friend took, because it was one of some delicacy and danger as regarded the general principle of the Bill; but he should be glad to discuss the matter with the hon. Member for Hackney, whose arguments should have every consideration. As far as the second reading was concerned, he trusted that the House would be of opinion that no reason had been alleged why the Bill should not at once pass through this stage.

Mr. SCOURFIELD said, he was afraid that long before the Bill left the hands of the House the "logical perfection" which the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last claimed for his measure would be destroyed, and the demand for the exemption of ragged schools from rating would show how very soon the House would deviate from strict rules and get into the consideration of practical matters. It appeared to him that only two Gentlemen had as yet expressed a determination to vote for the second reading, and one of them—the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease)—rather reversed the office of the prophet, and, instead of blessing the Bill, seemed to end by cursing it altogether. He himself regarded the Bill as an illustration of the "something-must-be-done principle"—at which he was always rather alarmed. The 7th clause, referring to the complaints of parishes where there was Government property, was also an excellent exemplification of another great principle—namely, "how not to do it," because it said that—

"The Treasury shall cause a Bill to be introduced into the House of Commons for confirming every such scheme, and if any Petition is presented to the House of Commons against any such scheme, or any part thereof, the scheme or so much thereof as is referred to in such Petition may, if it is thought fit, be referred to a Select Committee, and the petitioner shall be allowed to appear and oppose as in the case of a Private Bill, and the Treasury may appear in support of the scheme."

He did not envy the local authorities who had to pay the costs of such an opposition. In the name of the ratepayers he protested against the proposals of the Government being anything like a logical carrying out of the decision come to by such a large majority of the House of Commons last year. The position might be put in this way. There were two circles, one containing those who did not pay rates, and the other those who did pay. The people of the last circle wished that those of the other one should contribute something to the rates; but all that this Bill did was to shuffle the cards somewhat in reference to those who already paid, without bringing in those of the other circle to their support. He admitted that there was difficulty in rating many kinds of property; but this difficulty was surely no sufficient answer when there were many modes by which some arrangement to meet the justice of the case might be carried out. As to local administration, he thought that it would be dangerous to give further power of putting hands into other people's pockets without restraint. Besides, many of the acts of the local authorities were forced upon them by the Government itself. For instance, lunatic asylums must be provided by the counties, and that upon a scale which was very much determined by the Government Inspector. Further, the counties being compelled to do a certain thing, had not received from the Legislature sufficient powers properly to carry out the work. They had no compulsory power to acquire land, and in the event of having to enlarge the asylum, they were frequently at the mercy of persons who owned the adjoining land in reference to the price to be paid for it. Persons who did not pay rates were extremely energetic in forcing those who did to spend money, and were always ready to enlarge the expenditure. The non-ratepayers forced upon the ratepayers a scale of expenditure which to the latter did not seem necessary. They also annoyed the ratepayers by constantly lecturing them upon what was supposed to be their duty. They naturally complained, as the nigger did—"Preachee or floggee, Massa; but don't preachee and floggee both." It was said to be desirable to approach this subject piecemeal; but it was rather dangerous to do so by imposing burdens and postponing exemptions, because you were sure to pay but not equally sure to receive. There had been a shadowy reference to some future Board of admirable prudence and virtue; but, whatever the failings of the magistrates, he had never found them err on the side of extravagant expenditure. They were almost over-careful of the public purse, and he did not think more economical administrators could be found. The tendency now-a-days to throw everything on the rates was an alarming symptom, and the prospect of new outlay under the Sanitary Acts and the School Acts was viewed with great anxiety. If you wanted to make people more patient under the pressure of rates, it was necessary to remove the existing inequality; but the Bill did not profess to do so, and merely shuffled the cards without affording relief. The character of this Bill reminded him of the old lines—

"Too bad for a blessing, too good for a curse—
I wish from my soul it were better or worse."

The Government were mistaken if they supposed that this measure would satisfy the feeling which gave rise to the great majority in favour of the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) last year.

Mr. STONE differed altogether from the view taken by the hon. Member (Mr. Cawley) who had moved the rejection of this Bill, that legislation on this question should be delayed until Her Majesty's Government had devised a better mode of dealing with the subject. If the Bill were not founded in justice it ought never to have been brought into that House by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board; but if it were founded in justice the various Committees were entitled to demand the immediate removal of the existing exemptions on particular classes of property, and every day's delay in legislating on this subject would be but adding to the injustice they had already been made to endure. On this ground, therefore, he hoped that the House would not listen to any suggestions in favour of further delay in dealing with this question. As to the justice of removing the exemptions enjoyed by Government property, he might state with reference to Portsmouth that the nation chose to carry on the trade of ship-building and ship repairing in that town because it was the most convenient place they could select for their purpose, and not in order to benefit the town. The profit of the private manufacturer took the form of money and the profit of the Government dockyards took the form of national safety; but in both instances a profit was gained by carrying on the trade, and therefore the premises where such trades were carried on should equally be liable to contribute to the local burdens. This question was rising into greater importance than before; because, in consequence of the intention to establish military centres throughout the kingdom, the Government would shortly become possessed of a large additional quantity of property. He believed that the Government desired to do what was right in this matter, and therefore he wished to bring to their attention that it was desirable that there should be some better mode of assessing Government property. By this Bill the Treasury were to assess themselves, and there was to be no appeal from their decision which was likely to be of any value. The Treasury also were not to be called on to make any re-assessment until the local authority applied to them upon the subject. There was also no sufficient means for rectifying any improper assessment. It was true that a Report was to be laid before the House in the case of complaint; but there was no provision for carrying the matter any further. According to the Government proposal, a man in certain cases would be assessor of his own property, and the party before whom the appeal might be brought. What he thought would be accepted by the House with satisfaction was some such arrangement as this—that in places where Government property was situated the authorities in such places should name one valuer and the Treasury another, and in the event of a disagreement an umpire should be called in to decide the matter in question. That plan would be more just and reasonable when it was considered that in Portsmouth and other towns with large Government establishments there was generally a large amount of pauperism. He had been told that an effort had been made to value the Government property in Plymouth in this way, and that the valuers on both sides having agreed as to the value there was no need of calling in an umpire, and the matter was satisfactorily settled. He hoped that the Government would consider this proposal, and the strong objections made to the Ministerial plan of assessing property before the Bill went into Committee.

Mr. STANHOPE said, the question which suggested itself to his mind was this—whether it was worth while to abolish those exemptions when the great exemption of personal property was not touched by the Bill. He recollected, when presiding at petty sessions in the West Riding of Yorkshire, as many as 70 appeals having formerly been on the list. All those matters were now settled by the assessment committees, and he had heard that during the last three years at the quarter sessions of the West Riding there were only four appeals decided and five appeals repited. He was very glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill that he was willing to consider favourably one at least of the exemptions which the Bill proposed to abolish—namely, the exemption of Sunday schools and ragged schools from rating. The feeling in favour of that exemption was very great throughout the country. In reference to the Valuation Bill, he thought the adoption of one general rating for all purposes would be very desirable if it could be carried out. But as to the appointment of a surveyor of taxes, the assessment committees would probably look upon such an officer with much jealousy. He hoped that his duties would be clearly defined, so as to prevent any misunderstanding between the local and the Government authorities. He highly approved the proposal of the Government—that the quarter sessions should be the final Court for the hearing of appeals. He should be disposed to establish the quarter sessions as the centre from which all arrangements should emanate, and in order to remove all objections as to this tribunal he thought it would be wise to allow certain representatives of the ratepayers to act upon the committee for the purpose of assessment. With respect to the valuations of mansions, he agreed with the remarks of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley). In Clause 54 it was stated that the annual rent should not be estimated at less than the actual rent, except in particular cases. That appeared to him to be an unreasonable impediment in the way of the assessment committee, and would give rise to much trouble and inconvenience. As to the rating of machinery, that was a very important question, and so was the rating of mills. The structures put up in connection with some of our textile fabrics were almost palatial, while in connection with metallic manufacturers they were often little more than sheds. Some different principle of rating seemed to be necessary in these two cases, and he hoped ample time would be given for the consideration of these points before the Bill went into Committee.

Mr. MUNTZ said, that every hon. Member must be aware that the question of rating personal property had occupied the attention of some of our greatest statesmen, and that not one of them had ever been able to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. He concurred with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Scourfield) in regarding this Bill as an excuse for the "something-must-be-done" policy. And having said that, he was sorry to add that there was very little else about it with which he could agree. He hoped it would come out of Committee a very different Bill from what it was now. For example, he strongly deprecated the attempt to rate such institutions as ragged schools, and other charitable institutions which were now exempt. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) had shown great moral courage in proposing to repeal this exemption, and he would certainly be defeated if he persisted in it. The question of mines he (Mr. Muntz) left to be dealt with by more competent hands, and then he came to the question of rating fishing and shooting. A cry had been raised that there was great difficulty in rating fishing and shooting, but he saw none at all. They had only to see what people would give for it to arrive at its value. They then came to the question of rating scientific and literary societies. These were sanctioned by a special Act of Parliament, and they had grown up under the protection and sanction of the Legislature. If these clauses should be condemned by the Legislature it would be a breach of faith towards everyone of these societies, and he trusted his right hon. Friend would not put himself in antagonism with those who were his best friends. The question of rating steam power and machinery was one that would require careful consideration, because steam engines and machinery were not always attached to the freehold; but if they intended to rate them there was no reason why locomotives used for agricultural purposes, and thrashing machines, should not also be rated. At present the want of a definite principle of rating machinery produced great difficulty among overseers, great irritation among ratepayers, much litigation, different systems of assessment in different parishes, allowances in some, and in some instances no rate at all. The subject must be well considered in Committee, or the Bill would not pass this House. There should be no mistake about the matter—no shuffling, no quibbling. They must have a Bill that would answer the purpose for which it was required, or no Bill at all. Believing that the Bill, though incomplete, might be made a useful one, he should support the second reading.

Mr. HENLEY contended that these Bills were not a fair response to the Resolution come to by the House last year, and would not allay the impatience—the “ignorant impatience” if you liked—which was pretty generally felt in town and country under the pressure of local taxation. With respect to the first Bill, it was perfectly true that a certain number of tubs were thrown out to the whale, but they were likely to catch merely some few persons, because the propositions did not go to the root of the question. On the contrary, the measure itself tended indirectly to perpetuate the system of inequality which was complained of two years ago. The manner by which they were to be brought into operation would create ten times more ill-feeling than the amount of money to be raised under them. There were no indications of the principle on which mines and timber were to be rated, or whether it was to be timber in hedgerows as well as timber in plantations, the fact being that in many parts of England the timber growing in hedgerows was infinitely greater in value than the timber grown within fences. Again, it was impossible to fix upon a hard-and-fast line for regulating the deductions to be made on account of repairs. The percentage which would maintain a house of £4 per annum would be totally inadequate to maintain a building of £1.

Mr. Muntz

Repeated valuations acted as a sort of blister; they aggravated the people beyond anything, and were the cause of far more annoyance than the actual demands. Peace and quietness were worth something, and would not be dearly purchased by a few irregularities which could not be wholly redressed.

Mr. COLMAN: Sir, the discussion to-night has travelled over a wide field. I have heard the hon. Member for East Suffolk (Mr. Corrance) express his respect for the members of the Cobden Club, but I am not aware whether this included the principles Mr. Cobden's name is identified with. He also discussed the question of how far the working-classes are represented in the present House. It is not to be wondered at that the discussion has thus extended itself from the Bills immediately before the House, for the question, as a whole, is most important, and I venture to think that when the country reads the debate on these Bills, it will be more particularly interested in the wider branch of the subject—namely, local taxation in general, than these particular rating and valuation Bills. The right hon. Gentleman who has charge of these Bills has told us to-night they are to be regarded simply as “part of a larger scheme,” and it is as such I accept them and trust they may be read a second time with a view to alteration in Committee. I think we may infer from what has been said, that in the part relating to Sunday and ragged schools the Government is prepared to yield to the general wish of the country, and continue their exemption from local rates. The hon. Member for Salford who has moved the Amendment to-night, complains of the Bills as unsettling the question. I confess that I fail to see this, but think with the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) that so far as they go they remedy an injustice, for they bring under rating certain classes of property which have hitherto escaped. Now, Sir, we have been told in discussions which have gone on during the past few months, that those who have raised this question do not know where they are going. I must leave hon. Members opposite who more particularly represent the agricultural and landed interest, to answer this for themselves; but speak for the owners and occupiers of town property, and more particularly of houses, I venture to say we are quite prepared for whatever consequences may result from this agitation, and that we are anxious for them too. At all events, if there be any fallacy in our complaint, it is quite certain to be pointed out. We have had some learned disquisitions as to whether the rates on houses fall on the occupier or owner. I venture to say with the hon. Member for Rochester, the rates press on both; and any one who happens to be the owner of property in highly-taxed towns will know that this statement is correct. Houses, moreover, wear out, and have to be made good. The bricks and mortar deteriorate as time goes on, but I do not find the taxes lessen in amount. I hold in my hand the Return of a certain block of houses in my own city with the taxes for the years 1862 and 1872. During those years, the houses have been lessening in real value. They have been—to use the phrase of the First Lord of the Admiralty—"consumed;" but I find the taxation on them remains practically the same—for though the poor rate has diminished, the Board of Health rate has increased to nearly a corresponding amount; and I have no doubt, if hon. Members will enquire into the facts in their towns, they will find this experience confirmed. But apart from the question of how far the taxes fall on the occupier or owner, I want to put the question, why there is this undue taxation at all on real property? Take the following case:—One man has £1,000 which he invests in real property—say in cottages—he pays income tax of course; but beyond this that particular £1,000 is subject to heavy local rates, and I am putting them moderately if I say £15 per annum. Now take another £1,000, put we will suppose into the shares of the London and Westminster Bank. It pays income tax, but as to local taxes practically nothing, or at least only an infinitesimal portion of the rates paid on the building in which the bank carries on its Business. Take again the question of machinery. The hon. Member for Salford spoke very forcibly of the anomalies of our present system, which are very great. One man may have £50,000 or £100,000 worth of buildings and machinery, which in certain trades would be a considerable portion of his capital, for in some trades this item comes to 25 per cent, and in some to 50 per cent of the entire capital. He is subject to local taxes perhaps up to £1,000 per annum; whilst his neighbour who happens to have very little machinery or buildings, but simply stock-in-trade, escapes almost free. We have been told to-night that the time is past for taxing personal property. I am not urging that point now, but I am pointing out that there are anomalies which need some correction. If the Bills before us had been submitted as a settlement of this question, I would not vote for them; but trusting, as the right hon. Gentleman who introduced them has said, that they are only parts of a great scheme, and believing as I do that, so far as they go, they are honest attempts to remedy some amount of injustice, I support their second reading, looking for some modification when we get into Committee.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, nothing could be stronger than the representations made on this subject to preceding Governments by the very highest authority which had to deal with matters of rating—he meant the Court of Queen's Bench—that they should endeavour in some way or the other to lay down a better principle of rating, which should be a guide for the future, especially in the case of mines and railways. The Court of Queen's Bench recommended that some other better test of value should be provided than what a tenant from year would give for such property, because no tenant from year to year would be likely to take such property at all. Great disappointment would be felt by the public that the matter had not been more fully considered, and some great principle laid down by which the country should be guided. There was one point with respect to the rating of timber which, he believed, had not before been brought to the notice of the House. All matters of rating were connected with a beneficial occupation of the property to be rated. Supposing a man to come into a large estate with a great deal of timber upon it not ripe for cutting, though he should be only tenant for life and would not have any benefit from the timber, he would still have to pay all the rates, while the tenant who came after him would enjoy all the benefit. He thought the Bill ought to provide some way by which such a tenant for life might recoup himself; and if it did not, its authors ought to explain upon what grounds a person was to be rated who could have no beneficial occupation of the property for which he paid rates. With regard to the rating of Sunday and ragged schools, he thought the House was decidedly opposed to any measure of that kind. He must express the greatest disappointment at the way in which the question of rating Government property was dealt with. There was one thing, at all events, which a Bill of this kind ought to do, and that was to lay down principles by which the rating authorities should be guided, otherwise the rating authorities would not only have to make the rate but to find out the principles upon which they should make it. It was quite true that in one part it was said they were to have regard to the circumstances of acquisition, appropriation, or use. Well, if the Government obtained a valuable acquisition for a song, were they to be rated accordingly? The rating authorities were to have regard to the effect of such acquisition, appropriation, or use on the rates of the adjoining district. Did that mean that if the Government erected buildings which raised the value of the adjoining property they were to be rated very low? On the other hand, if they depreciated the value of the adjoining property, were they to be rated very high? Then the Treasury, without any guidance in the Bill, were in their Report to lay down the principles upon which they acted in preparing their scheme. But what the principles should be was to be entirely at the pleasure of the Treasury itself. In that way what they would give with one hand they could take away with the other. It was quite clear that the Government had not probed this matter to the bottom, and the Bill was therefore in a crude and imperfect shape. Another point upon which he wished to make some remark, was the proposed system of appeal against the rules. It was a matter of complaint with reference to these, as well as other Bills, that they did not present a complete code of legislation on the subject with which they dealt. They incorporated a great number of Acts and left a great number of sections unrepealed, but no one except a lawyer could practically get hold of the law. These Bills ought to have started afresh, and presented a complete code on the subject. The present system of appeal had proved perfectly satisfactory to all concerned. It was not very long since the assessment committees were formed; people were beginning to understand their working, and having started them they were now going to unsettle the whole matter and begin afresh. They were by the proposed newfangled system of appeal putting great expense upon the parishes, which in the long run would lead to no practical result. He would urge that the present assessment committee should be continued, and that there should be an appeal to the quarter sessions just as at present. The main sections of this Bill were taken almost in ipsissimis verbis from the Act for the assessment of the metropolis. Under that Act great inconvenience had been felt from conflicting decisions between the justices who had to sit in the county of Surrey, in Middlesex, and the City of London, and to avoid discrepancy of decision in matters of detail it was arranged that all these separate jurisdictions should send representatives to form one assessment sessions. So far as the metropolis was concerned nothing could be better; but when they applied this system to the counties the whole analogy failed, for each county had its own quarter sessions, and there were no conflicting jurisdictions whatever. He hoped the Government would look into this part of the Bill and leave matters as they stood.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he wished to enter his protest against the policy which the Government had thought fit to pursue in reference to the question to which these Bills related. He had never desired to deal with this question in any factious or party spirit. He wished calmly and candidly to consider the Government proposals, and to see how far they met the just expectations of the country, how far they fulfilled the pledges of the Government, and how far they carried out the decision of the House of Commons, expressed in the Resolution of last year. This was not a new grievance. It had been cropping up continually for the last 30 years. The sore had been continually growing and festering, but the attention of the country had been specially awakened to it during the last few years by the increase of existing impositions, and the continuous addition of fresh charges for national purposes. In 1868 he first took up the subject, and asked for a Royal Commission. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government refused that request, on the ground that it would lead to delay, and said that the Government would take it up as soon as the Irish Church question was settled. Since that the Irish Land, Elementary Education, University Tests, Army Regulation, Licensing, Ballot, and Public Health Bills had been introduced by Government and passed. In 1871, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Admiralty introduced Bills on this subject, but he (Sir Massey Lopes) would not further refer to them except to say that they admitted the grievance by professing to give £1,200,000 of Imperial taxation for local purposes. The Resolution which was adopted last year declared that no legislation would be satisfactory which did not remedy the injustice of imposing taxation on one description of property only. How had the Government met the grievance of which they complained? They had systematically and designedly evaded it. What they claimed was a re-adjustment of taxation between reality and personalty with reference to those objects which were national in their character, from which the whole community derived equal benefit, and over which expenditure, ratepayers had little or no control; but the Government had narrowed the question to a re-adjustment of taxation upon the same description of property. The Government had raised a false, distinct, and separate issue; they had drawn a red herring across the path in order to take them off the scent. These Bills were going to extend the very injustice of which real property now complained—to extend the very principle which was universally condemned. Instead of giving relief these measures were going to impose fresh burdens. They removed exemptions which now existed with respect to small portions of real property, but they did nothing with regard to the great exemption of all—exemption of personal property; on the contrary, they actually inserted a clause in their Bill formally and perpetually to exempt a portion of personal property which by law of Elizabeth and decision of Law Courts was rateable. They thus made comparisons between real and personal property more odious than before, and the anomalies more apparent and conspicuous than before, and instead of meeting the grievance of which they complained they aggravated it in every possible form. He admitted that some of the proposals of the Government contained many valuable reforms and necessary improvements, while others were open to very serious objections; but none of these suggestions were new, nor were they necessary preliminaries to relief. There was one peculiar point in connection with these Bills. They consisted of general enactments, general principles, and abstract and vague propositions; but there was no detail and no prescribed way in which these principles were to be carried out. They simply said that mines were to be rated, that Government property was to be rated, and that sporting was to be rated. But Government property was to be rated by their own officials, while other property was to be rated by the local assessors, with the aid of the surveyors of taxes. He thought that would lead to a vast deal of litigation and contention, and any relief which they would get would be swallowed up by the expenses entailed by the operation of these Bills. What would be the effect of the Valuation Bill? To force up and increase all assessments for local as well as Imperial purposes; to raise the income tax and the house duty. By increasing the assessments you would only nominally lower the rate in the pound. The rate in the pound was no index of increase or decrease of ratable burdens. By raising the assessments you might have a reduced rate in the pound, and yet the expenditure might be very much increased. The Government had shirked the responsibility of adjusting the boundaries of parishes, unions, and counties by referring it to a Committee. After boundaries were adjusted, local self-government was to be re-organized, and, last of all, local taxation was to be investigated with a view to relief. If this was to be the order of things, he was afraid very few would live to see this happy consummation. He would like to illustrate their grievance in this way. Let them suppose that in the time of Elizabeth personal property only was rated, and that real property did not exist, that the relative portions of real and personal property had been reversed, that personal property had then been the only or chief source of wealth, and that real property was comparatively unknown, and that consequently the chief burden of local taxation had been imposed on personal property instead of lands and houses. Would not the owners of personal property have agitated for the re-adjustment of those burdens, so that all property should pay alike? A hard-and-fast-line which existed 300 years ago might have been just then, but would be totally inapplicable now. Would they not under these circumstances have advocated Imperial imposts for Imperial purposes, and protested against their property being exceptionally mulcted for the benefit of the community. The Bill did not in any shape or form refer to the grievances to which the attention of the House was now called. Instead of settling everything the Bill would muddle and unsettle everything. He believed the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) to be honest and earnest in his endeavour to solve the difficult problem in which he was engaged; but he had long odds against him on the Government bench. Very serious contingencies might intervene and interfere with any mere promise of relief postponed to an indefinite period. He did not say that these Bills were a pretext for delays, but this he feared would be the result. A bird in the hand was worth two in the bush. He thought the provisions of the Bills were not satisfactory, inasmuch as they did not touch the grievance complained of, they removed no anomaly, they relieved no injustice, on the contrary they aggravated and intensified it by extending the operation of the present unjust system.

Mr. HIBBERT said, he was not surprised that the hon. Baronet should be dissatisfied with the Bills which the Government had placed before the House. At the same time, he must remember that it was only the first instalment of the scheme, the remainder of which was to follow. The hon. Baronet had denied that the abolition of exemptions would relieve the ratepayers; but it was clear that wherever, as in Westminster, Government property existed, as also in the parishes containing metalliferous mines, estimated to produce £11,000,000 or £12,000,000 annually, a sensible relief would be afforded. Instead of relieving the local ratepayer by letting him put his hand into the Imperial Treasury, he would be relieved first in this way. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had described the Bill as intended to worry the ratepayers; but the fact was the very reverse, as he would doubtless admit when it came into operation, for instead of three or four assessments there would be but one, and while these were now subject to alteration every year the new valuation list would last five years. It was worthy of consideration whether, as urged by the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross), it would be desirable to call the magistrates and the Bar together specially for the hearing of appeals, which might be very few in number. As to the appeal to petty sessions, the Bill simply carried out the present law, merely giving the tribunal greater power as regarded valuation lists. Much had been said on the desirability of providing for the rating of mines, canals, and railways. Coal mines had been rateable since the reign of Elizabeth; and yet up to the present moment no uniform mode of rating them had been adopted. Therefore, the Government ought not to be censured for not at once defining the method of rating metalliferous mines, which varied in character much more than coal mines. The coal mines in Lancashire were at the present moment rated on three different systems. In some cases the profits, in others the coal rent, and in others, again, the coal rent together with the value of the sheds and buildings were taken as the measure. A gentleman of great experience in the rating of mines who had been in communication with the Government since they had taken up this question preferred the latter method. At his (Mr. Hibbert's) request, this gentleman drew up a scheme for rating coal mines, and it was shown to several gentlemen interested in the coal trade, but none of them approved it. No doubt, it would be most desirable to define some principle by the Bill, but the task was an extremely difficult one. This remark was also applicable to the rating of gas works, canals, and railways. In Scotland, the rating of railways was intrusted to a paid Government official, who rated the whole of the line, and apportioned the rates among the parishes through which it passed. That system had worked well, but it could not be introduced into this country, where the general opinion was in favour of leaving such matters to the assessment committees. As to the rating of timber, an Act had been in operation in Scotland since 1854 and in Ireland since 1853. In Scotland wood lands were rated according to the yearly sum at which they might be reasonably expected to let from year to year as pasture lands. Well, when his right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) introduced this Bill he stated he had not inserted any definition on this point; but at the same time expressed his willingness to listen to any proposals which hon. Members might make. The hon. Member for Norwich (Mr. Colman), in speaking of his own town said, that between 1862 and 1872 the poor rate had decreased there, while the health rate had increased enormously. This, in his (Mr. Hibbert's) judgment, was a most satisfactory state of things, because the poor rate was a mere burden on the ratepayers; whereas the health rate was expended on objects which would benefit the ratepayers in the future. The hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Stanhope) supported the two Bills generally. The hon. Member for East Suffolk (Mr. Corrance), and other hon. Gentlemen had alluded to the rating of personal property. They maintained that the Bill did not go far enough, or it did not widen the basis of taxation. He asserted, on the contrary, that the Bill did widen the basis of taxation, though not in the direction those hon. Gentlemen desired. The rating of machinery had been spoken of; but there was a well-known rule of law that where machinery was attached to land it was rateable, and that where it was not attached to land it was not rateable. No doubt, it would be very pleasant to the owners of real property if they could impose a rate on personal property; but if this was difficult in former times it was difficult now. The late Sir George Cornewall Lewis, when examined before a Committee of the House of Lords in 1850 said, the law with regard to the rating of personal property was very obscure, and that the rating of stock in trade would give very little relief to the agricultural parishes. With respect to the rating of personal property, the system pursued in America had not given satisfaction, and he thought that the experience of America would prevent this country from entering upon such a scheme. In conclusion, he remarked that as all the subjects brought forward to-night had reference to details, they might be considered when the Bill got into Committee.

MR. FLOYER feared that there would be some difficulty in bringing together magistrates more frequently and from different parts of the country to hear appeals as a committee of quarter sessions. They would also labour under a great disadvantage in not having the assistance of leading members of the Bar. That was a great objection to a committee such as that which had been proposed in the Valuation Bill, and he was glad to hear that that portion of the Bill was likely to be abandoned. With regard to the difficulty of assessing personalty and stock in trade, no doubt the authority of Sir George Lewis on that point would be most valuable if that right hon. Gentleman's evidence had applied to the existing state of things. But the state of things had materially altered since that evidence was given, by the passing of the Union Chargeability Bill. By the present Bill the House was asked to sanction a new principle, for it proposed to assess the privilege or right of shooting and fishing. If the right was let, the rating would assume a tangible form. It would become rent, and would be easily assessable. If the land was let at a lower rate than its value, with the view of a large preservation of game, there was no doubt that the owner of the land ought to be assessed for game purposes. But if, as in ordinary cases, the landlord said to the farmer, "I promise you there shall be no quantity of game to do you the least injury," the case would be very different. In whose interest was it that the rights of shooting were to be assessed? Was it in the interest of the farmer or of the public? He thought the contention had found its solution in the complaints that had been made to the House with regard to the preservation of game, and justly, too, where preservation was carried to excess. But if an assessment was made on game, it would operate with great hardship where very little game was kept, and it would not be for the interest of the farmer that game should be assessed. There was one other matter to which he wished to allude, and that was the very different manner in which the House dealt with taxation when the money came from the public purse and when it came from the local rates. The taxpayer had first the great advantage of the vigilance exercised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, while the money could only be voted with due formalities by a Committee of that House; but when it came from the county rate very little vigilance was exercised, and there was no protection for the local taxpayer. When the question of local taxation was before the House he hoped this point would not escape the attention of the Government. The amount raised by local taxation was a very large sum indeed, and required equal protection to that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer exercised over the public purse. He thought his hon. Friend (Mr Cawley) had shown good reasons for hesitating before proceeding further with these Bills, and if he pressed the matter to a division he should give the Motion his support.

MR. DODSON said, the Rating Bill of the Government recognized this principle—that property which had not hitherto contributed to local burdens should contribute to them in future. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) complained that personalty was not brought in in aid of local rates; but personalty could never be locally rated, as it had not got “a local habitation and a name.” The law originally contemplated the rating of personalty, but owing to inherent difficulties, had been compelled deliberately to exempt it. There were, however, three ways by which personalty could be brought in in aid of local rates—first, by carrying further the legislation of Sir Robert Peel and making contributions from the Exchequer in aid of local charges carefully selected, so as not to destroy thrift and vigilance in local administration; second, in the mode proposed by the Government, by surrendering an Imperial tax in aid of the rates; or, lastly, by a mode which had not been sufficiently considered, and which would, perhaps, be after all the best mode—namely, that the Government should select some special object now carried out by local burdens and should take it into its own hands, defraying the entire expense. All these methods, however, presupposed a surplus, and one still available; whereas the House of Commons had with one consent disposed of the year's surplus, and nobody had suggested that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should impose a match tax or increase the legacy duty in order to enable him to relieve local burdens. Under these circumstances, though he did not understand the Government to flinch from their former proposal—that Imperial funds should in some way or other be applied in aid of local taxation—that question must necessarily stand over for another year; in the meantime the House need not be prevented from passing a Bill which dealt with property capable of being locally rated but which had hitherto escaped through caprice or accident rather than intention of the law. Complaint might perhaps fairly be made that the question as to the incidence of burdens between owners and occupiers was not dealt with, and the expediency of transferring some existing burdens in whole or in part from occupiers to owners must be carefully discussed before the question of local taxation was disposed of. He trusted that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cawley) would be satisfied with the discussion which had taken place, and allow the House to go into Committee on the measures without further delay, because it was in Committee alone that Bills of this character could be properly discussed.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, the present Bill, though it went somewhat in the direction of a remedy, did not deal with the subject in a fair spirit, because its one ruling principle was to seek out every atom of real property upon which you could impose taxation, and to excuse personal property. When the House got into Committee upon the Bill he should move an Amendment that would go to the whole root of the question of taxing personal property. But the main question was—What good would the present Bill do in towns? He had received many communications from towns, and especially one from a large manufacturing town in the county he represented (North Wilts), urging the rating of incomes derived from Government securities and public companies. That was the point on which he would venture to move an Amendment when the Bill went into Committee, as personal wealth was the proper class of property which ought to bear the burden according to the ability of the inhabitants. One reason why he would not oppose the second reading of the Bill was the pledge which he understood the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) to have given, that Government was not disinclined at some future time to go into the question of some relief from Imperial sources towards local burdens. He only wished to point out, with reference to the rating of timber, that there was no analogy between plantations in England and in Scotland. The Scotch plantations were generally on a hillside, amid land of little value; while in England, though generally on poor land which would grow nothing else, they were generally surrounded by land worth several pounds an acre annually.

Mr. McLAREN said, he should vote for the second reading, but he would like to see an alteration in the 2nd clause which said that the Act should not apply to Scotland or Ireland. The effect of these words might not be seen at first sight; but, in his opinion, they would work a great injustice. In the City of Edinburgh there was a good deal of Government property, and the contribution of this Bill extended to Scotland might amount to £2,000 a-year as for the city alone was concerned. Why, therefore, should the people of Edinburgh have to pay £2,000 a-year, when in England it was admitted that all Government property should contribute to the local burdens? What he would suggest was that the words, "which shall not apply to Scotland and Ireland" should be omitted from all clauses except Clauses 7 to 11, which were the clauses which dealt with the police and its machinery.

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH was attacked with the criticism which had been levelled on the Bill as a mere skeleton of a Bill, and said, that the parishes in which Government property was situated were looking forward to deriving a great benefit from it. Government property was of two separate kinds. When Government stood in the position of an employer of labour or occupier, there could be no question that the property should be rated; but it was quite a different thing to regard rating the Government establishments such as those in London and elsewhere. He did not know whether the House of Parliament were to be rated, and if so, why was the parish of St. Martin's

In reply to Mr. HUNT, Mr. STANSFELD said, it was not proposed to refer the Bill to a Select Committee; it was quite ready for discussion in Committee of the Whole House.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday June 9.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, that the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill was fixed for Monday, the 9th June, as was also the Education Bill. Now he understood the two Bills just read a second time would be on the Paper for the same day. He wished to know which Bill would be proceeded with?

Mr. GLADSTONE: The Supreme Court of Judicature Bill, and before that Monday they would state the course to be pursued with the other Bills.

NATIONAL EDUCATION COMMISSIONERS—THE CALLAN SCHOOLS—DISMISSAL OF REV. MR. O'KEEFFE. NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Select Committee on the Callan Schools:—On Motion of The Marquess of HARTINGTON, Mr. Secretary CARDWELL, Mr. GATHORNE HARDY, Mr. WHITBREAD, Mr. BOURKE, and The O'CONNOR DON nominated Members of the said Committee.

Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, who had given Notice of his intention to move, as an Amendment, the addition of the names of Dr. Lyon Playfair and Mr. Cross, said, it was with much regret he found the Motion made without explanation on the part of the Government. The justification of his unusual Amendment was to be found in the peculiar character of the Motion. The question to be considered by the Committee was the conduct of an Executive body; and one would have thought that the party to have sat in judgment upon that Executive body in the first instance was the responsible Government of the Crown. He regretted that the Government had not formed and expressed an opinion upon the conduct of that body instead of transferring their responsibility as a Government to the House of Commons. It was in the power of the Government to deal with the National Board if they thought it was in the wrong. The Government had said, that the Board had been misrepresented and misunderstood; but the Board seemed to have assumed the character of the lady on the French stage, the Femme incomprise. By whom was the Board misunderstood? not, he presumed, by Her Majesty's Government. He could not vote against the appointment of the Committee, because he could not share the responsibility of a course which might result in the extinction of the National Board. But, in accepting the Committee, it was desirable they should know what it was to do when it was appointed. That was exactly the thing which the Government had never told them. The Order of Reference was one of the most ambiguous he had ever seen placed on paper. It said the Committee were to report on the circumstances connected with the Callan Schools. That might mean anything, everything, or nothing. He learnt from general rumour that the Committee were only to consider the facts of the case; but the House had never been informed authoritatively that there was to be any such limitation to their province. Even assuming that they were only to investigate facts, experience had taught him that one of the most difficult things in the world to ascertain was a fact, and that when the fact happened to be an ecclesiastical fact, its ascertainment was not difficult, but impossible. That was not a matter merely affecting the schools of a parish in Ireland; it involved one of the largest questions which could possibly be conceived, and which was now agitating every part of Europe—namely, how far ecclesiastical authority was or was not to be supreme over the civil authority of the country? It was because the Government knew that to be its character that they preferred to cast the responsibility of deciding it on the House rather than take it upon themselves. Therefore, the House could not be too careful at every stage in seeing that the ground on which they went was firm. This was, indeed, a preliminary step. But it was a step in a very important proceeding. In so grave a matter the House ought to have had more time to consider how the functions thus thrown on it should be discharged. As to the composition of the Committee, everybody would feel that the Gentlemen proposed were as fit as any that could be named from either side of the House. But that was not the whole question. A Committee of five Members was not a usual thing in that House, and was adopted only in very exceptional circumstances. Why had such a Committee been proposed in that instance? Either the Government should take the responsibility of deciding that most momentous issue or should decline it; but he could not understand why they should throw the responsibility on the House and at the same time keep the balance of power in the hands of the Government. In a Committee of five the weight of the casting vote of the Chairman was far greater than in a larger Committee. Unless there were three to one against the Chairman, no proposition adverse to his opinion could be carried. It might be said that was immaterial because the Committee was not to report opinions, but facts; but it was impossible to distinguish between that which was a fact and that which was an opinion. If, for example, they reported that the course taken by the National Board was in conformity with the precedents on which it had acted in former instances, he supposed that would go a long way to decide this case. But he asked, whether a finding that it was in conformity with former precedents was a fact or an opinion? The question, therefore was, whether the House should delegate its authority in regard to a question of that magnitude to so limited a body as five of its Members, however unexceptionable their names might be. Not one of the five Gentlemen proposed was chosen from below the gangway on either side. Why should not the Committee be composed from all sections of the House, so as to be adequately representative of its authority? The names he had to submit to the House were equally unexceptionable with those proposed by the Government, and his Amendment was conceived in no hostile spirit. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Dr. Lyon Playfair be one other Member of the said Committee."—(Mr. Vernon Harcourt.)

did not desire to offer any serious opposition to the adoption of such a course. Nothing, however, which had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken had convinced him that it was expedient the number of the Committee should be extended. The Government had no intention, he could assure him, in appointing it, that it should enter into the question whether the Roman Catholic Church was to exercise a less or a greater influence in State affairs, but that it should ascertain the facts of a case upon which they themselves as well as the House would ultimately have to come to a decision. The majority of the Commissioners were anxious to obtain a hearing before their conduct was condemned, for, although the bare facts might have been already before the House, they felt that they ought to have an opportunity of stating what had been their previous practice and what were the rules and principles on which they had acted—matters which could not, in the opinion of the Government, have been satisfactorily elucidated by means of a discussion in that House. They therefore thought it was an act of simple justice that the Commissioners should be heard, and there was in the Order of Reference nothing whatever which invited the Committee to pass judgment on their conduct. He should be surprised, indeed, if a Committee of that House travelled so far beyond the Order of Reference as to pronounce any such judgment. As to the composition of the Committee, the Government thought the duties which it would have to perform would be best discharged if its number were small, while they deemed it unnecessary to appoint a large Committee which would be in some degree supposed to be, though it would not be in reality, representative of the various opinions in the House. As to having no Members below the gangway on the Committee, he would merely remark that some of those who had been named—such as his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) and the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Bourke)—must be considered as independent as any that could be chosen. The speech of his hon. and learned Friend went much further than his Motion. He could only express his great astonishment that, with the view which his hon. and learned Friend entertained of the functions of the Committee, he should have voted for its appointment at all. If, he might add, the object of the Government had been, as had been alleged, to secure delay, they could best have attained that object by making the Committee a larger one—nominally representing all parties in the House—who would have deemed it necessary to call a great number of witnesses. But the House, he thought, would agree with them that a small Committee, fairly selected, was the best calculated to arrive at the result which the majority of hon. Members had in view. He hoped, therefore, the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman would not be accepted.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, this Committee must either be of importance or it ought never to have been appointed at all. If the functions it had to discharge were of importance he objected altogether to its constitution, because, having gained considerable experience by serving on Committees appointed to investigate delicate subjects, involving religious or political questions, he knew the unfortunate results which followed from Ministers and ex-Ministers being placed on them. He thought that five gentlemen might have been selected to serve on this Committee whose judgment would have been accepted outside that House as being perfectly impartial without having recourse to Ministers or ex-Ministers. He thought it very unfortunate that the Government should have thought it necessary to place a Member of their own body and a Member of the ex-Government on the Committee. He should therefore support the Amendment.

MR. BOUVERIE said, his hon. and learned Friend below the gangway (Mr. Harcourt) must by this time have repented of having allowed his innocence to be seduced by the noble Lord so far as to induce him to vote for the appointment of this Committee, because the result of this discussion was to show that no such Committee ought to have been appointed. The House, however, having decided the other evening by a small majority that the Committee should be appointed, all they had now to do was to see that it was properly constituted. The names of the Gentlemen who had been mentioned were unexceptionable, but he could not lose sight of the fact that the Secretary of State for War had been mixed up with this Education Board ever since its establishment—indeed, the right hon. Gentleman was the parent of it, and it was just possible that parental partiality might tend to cloud the ordinary clearness of his vision when the existence of his child was at stake. With regard to the duties of the Committee, what the aggrieved parties asked for should be done, their statement should be heard, and what they said in their defence should be reported by the Committee to the House. Let the House accept the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend, because both the Gentlemen he had named were capable men, in whose impartiality the country could confide. Let the statement of the facts by this Committee be stamped by the authority of these hon. Members, as well as the five Gentlemen whom the Government proposed. He had heard objections taken out of doors to the composition of this Committee, in which he himself did not share; he had declined to resist the appointment of it; but he thought there ought to be some understanding as to what the Committee was to do.

MR. NEWDEGATE: From the memorial presented by a section of the Commissioners to the Government it is perfectly clear that the majority of the Board of National Education in Ireland have already submitted their case to the Government. Are we, then, to understand that this Committee is to pronounce a judgment upon a judgment, pronounced by the Government upon the conduct of the Commissioners in the matter of Mr. O'Keeffe's displacement. It appears to me, that this would be a most extraordinary proceeding. Is the Government the Executive of the State or is it not? With whom rests the power of judging of the conduct of those Commissioners? Does it rest with Her Majesty's Ministers? I believe it does. Well, then, I want to know, if Ministers have already identified themselves by approval with the conduct of these Commissioners, why they now ask this House to intervene at all? For if they have approved of the conduct of the Commissioners, what reason have they for appealing to this House, except that by the appointment of this Committee they seek the judgment of the House upon their own conduct, just as much as upon the conduct of the Commissioners? I cannot, for the life of me, see anything but confusion in this proceeding. This House has means of its own of pronouncing a verdict on the conduct of the Government, without the intervention of a Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) has given Notice of a Motion impugning the conduct of the Commissioners. What does the Government then do? It puts in a plea for delay by asking us to appoint a Committee to inquire into—what? To inquire into the conduct of this National Board, whose conduct they have already approved. I repeat that I can see nothing but confusion in such a proceeding. If, however, the House is pleased to appoint a Committee, by all means let it appoint a good Committee; and, I believe, that the additions which are proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) will make the Committee more satisfactory. Still, I want to know upon what points the Committee is to direct its investigations. Is it to be on the conduct of the Commissioners for National Education in Ireland, distinct from that of Her Majesty's Government; or is it to be upon the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, as having approved of the course which has been pursued by the Commissioners? That is what the House ought to know. What is this Committee to do? Into what is it to inquire? There are several questions which may well be inquired into; one of them is, what is the nature of the jurisdiction which the Commissioners have acknowledged in the person of the Pope's Legate, Cardinal Cullen. Whether the Government have excepted the jurisdiction of Cardinal Cullen on the recommendation of the majority of the Commissioners? ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members seem very impatient. I can quite understand Gentlemen who entertain Ultramontane opinions objecting to any question being raised as to the jurisdiction exercised by Cardinal Cullen. It is quite natural that, as Ultramontane Roman Catholics, they should wish the authority of Cardinal Cullen to be undisputed and supreme. The question which is at issue here has just been tried in Germany and decided by the German Parliament. The Commissioners wish a verdict to be pronounced in their favour by the Parliament of England; but that would be a verdict, which I believe the people of England would not approve. Are we to understand that the German newspapers have reason for asserting that their Government and Parliament have the courage to resist the intrusion of this Papal authority in matters of education, and that the Government and Parliament of England have either not the courage or the will to oppose this intrusion? These are large and important questions, and I want to know if the Committee are to enter upon them? Then, there is another question. I hold in my hand the statement of Mr. O'Keeffe, and he appears to be supported in this by Professor O'Hanlon, of Maynooth, a high authority on Canon law. Mr. O'Keeffe says that he is prepared to yield canonical obedience to his ecclesiastical superior; but Cardinal Cullen says that his view of canonical obedience is perfectly erroneous. How far are the Government of this country to accept the decisions of these Papal Canonists? These are important questions to refer to the Committee, and if it is improper to entertain them, as he now appears to think, why did the hon. Member for the county of Cork (Mr. Downing) vote for the appointment of this Committee? Surely, if we are to appoint a Committee, we ought to know what are the subjects to be referred to it; and as it is nominated by the Government, how shall we know what these subjects are, except by asking the Government to inform us? Is this Committee, then, to hear the Rev. Mr. O'Keeffe? If it does, he will present to the Committee exactly the same case that was submitted to the Committee on Mortmain in 1851, by priests of the Hexham district, in the North of England, who feared being excommunicated, and who prayed that they might not be subjected, through the English law, to the penalties of the exaggerated Canon law of Rome, which law Cardinal Cullen is now attempting to enforce. Evidence upon this subject was given before the Select Committee on Mortmain, which reported in the year 1852. Again, I ask, with regard to the questions to be considered by this Committee, is the Committee to hear the Rev. Mr. O'Keeffe? I call upon the Prime Minister to say whether Mr. O'Keeffe is to appear before the Committee? And I hope the right hon.

Gentleman, or some Member of the Government, will answer that question, which I once more repeat—is Mr. O’Keeffe to be heard before the Committee, which it is now proposed that the House should appoint?

MR. JAMES said, there must be a very general feeling that the Committee should be so appointed that the inquiry should be full and impartial. He would therefore suggest that, as it was a matter in which a large number of Roman Catholics in Ireland were interested, one of the names proposed to be added to the Committee by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) should be that of some hon. Member who sat for an Irish constituency. [“Name.”] Well, as he was called upon to name, he might, perhaps, mention his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Matthews) as a person in whom the Irish people would have confidence.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that as the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) did not seem disposed to accede to the suggestion which had just been made, he must take his Motion as it stood. Now, the grounds on which the Committee had been originally proposed were based upon grounds of justice as well as of policy and grace, and it would, he thought be matter of regret that the step which the House had already taken in the matter should be deprived of that character by anything which might be done that evening. The number five had been proposed by the Government because they were of opinion that it would greatly conduce to the despatch of the proceedings of the Committee that its number should be small. But it was not the numbers five or seven, but, what was to be the composition of the Committee, which was really at issue on the present occasion. Upon that point the view of the Government was that it should be a Committee which would command the confidence of the people generally, and especially of those who were directly interested in its proceedings. He did not refer to the Roman Catholic Members of the House; he referred to the people of Ireland, who viewed with suspicion the proceedings of the National Board. The Roman Catholic people of Ireland generally, and the Protestant people of Ireland to a very large extent, were deeply interested in the maintenance and prosperity of the system of national education, which was partly bound up with the National Board of Ireland, and he might be permitted to say that if there was one section of persons in Ireland more distinctly and warmly interested in the National Board and in the system of education in Ireland than another, it was those friends of liberal education and mixed education whose opinions and whose feelings were to be consulted on this occasion. The earnest desire of the Government under these circumstances was not to appoint an ill-balanced Committee, and they had done everything in their power to make it a fair one. Nothing had been said against its composition, indeed, by anyone except his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), who spoke of it as the child of the Secretary of State for War, forgetting that his right hon. Friend was not Secretary for Ireland in 1831. [MR. BOUVÉRIE: The Board has been entirely altered since.] Yes, the numbers were altered from 13 to 20, but its composition, so far as the admixture in it of members of different religious persuasions was concerned, continued to be the same, and its spirit was that which it had received from Lord Derby, with the assent of all parties in that House. That being so, was it desirable that the composition of the Committee should be changed? His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford, indeed, contended that the Government had abdicated their responsibility, and had delegated to a Committee the province of judging how far ecclesiastical authority was to be supreme in Ireland. But if that responsibility ought not to be delegated to a Committee of five, neither ought it to be delegated to a Committee of seven Members. The Government always maintained that they must ultimately be responsible for the proceedings of the National Board. That had been explicitly stated by his noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, as well as by himself, last year; but they added that they did not think the time had come for passing judgment on the conduct of the Commissioners. It was on the same ground that they declined to pass judgment upon it when the Motion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock came under the notice of the House, but their responsibility the Government had never attempted to abdicate, and he again repeated that they were ultimately responsible for reviewing that conduct, and for either disproving or supporting it. As to the names of the Committee, they were those of men who could not be supposed to have any disposition to recognize the supremacy of ecclesiastical authority, and although the popular feeling of Ireland had but a limited space upon it, he thought its composition ought to be satisfactory to all parties. His hon. and learned Friend now proposed to add to it two hon. Members whom he selected from below a line to which he seemed to attach much greater importance than any other line in that House, and he, for one had no wish to say a single word which might be regarded as disagreeable with reference to the hon. Gentlemen named. No one could fail to see that the Motion of the hon. and learned Member was intended to alter the complexion of the Committee. The hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Dr. Lyon Playfair) had been placed by circumstances, possibly against his own will, in a position antagonistic to the feelings of a large majority of the Irish people on the question of education in that country, and the name of the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) was calculated to excite apprehension and alarm in the minds of 4,000,000 of our Roman Catholic fellow subjects. If it was thought right to alter the numbers of the Committee, he trusted the House would not impair its usefulness by making additions to it of an avowedly one-sided character. To the proposition of his hon. and learned Friend he could not consent.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, if the composition of the Committee was not satisfactory to the people of Ireland its proceedings would have no weight in their minds. He approved of the proposition of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), and thought a Committee of seven would not be too large, and should not object to a Committee even of 13, 15, or 17.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Cross be one other Member of the said Committee."—(Mr. Vernon Harcourt.)

The House divided:—Ayes 205; Noes 165: Majority 40.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records."

MR. MCCARTHY DOWNING gave Notice that to-morrow he would move that Mr. Newdegate and Mr. Whalley be added to the Committee.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN, wishing that the matter should be considered by a fuller House, moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir Patrick O'Brien.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, he hoped the debate would not be adjourned. If the hon. Member wished to add other Members to the Committee, he might make a substantive Motion to that effect; but whatever might now be said of the composition of the Committee he thought the investigation should be conducted with all possible despatch.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.

PUBLIC PROSECUTORS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary BRUCE, Bill for the appointment of a Public Prosecutor, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary BRUCE, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, and Mr. WINTERBOTHAM.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 173.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACTS CONTINUANCE BILL.

(The Marquess of Lansdowne.)

SECOND READING. (NO. 123.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time said, that the measure, which came up from the Commons, was a Bill to continue the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act of 1870 and the Protection of Life and Property Act of 1871. The Government regretted the necessity for the renewal for another year of what they admitted to be exceptional legislation; but acting on the best advice they could obtain on the matter, they had come to the conclusion that in the interests of Ireland herself it was their duty to bring forward this Bill. As showing that the Acts had been attended with good results, he might mention that whereas in 1870 the number of agrarian offences in Ireland was 1,329, in the following year the number fell to 373, and in 1872 to 256. By the Bill now before their Lordships it was proposed to modify the Act of 1870 in three particulars. Under the Peace Preservation Act, the fact of a district being proclaimed was held to be evidence that it was in a state of disturbance within the meaning of a code of laws known as the Whiteboy Acts. That provision was not re-enacted in the present Bill, for the future the prosecution would have to prove that the district in question was in a disturbed state. In the next place, it was provided that notice given to any newspaper before the passing of this Bill, in pursuance of the 30th clause of the Act, should not subject the publisher or proprietor to any penalty or proceeding in relation to anything published after the passing of this Bill — but that a fresh notice must be given. The third modification would remove a doubt which had arisen in connection with the existing law, and would enable any person summarily convicted under the Peace Preservation Act of 1870, and sentenced to a term of imprisonment exceeding one month, to appeal against such conviction. With these modifications, the Bill proposed to continue the Peace Preservation Acts to the 1st June, 1875.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Marquess of Lansdowne.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, it was not satisfactory to find that Ireland could only be governed by exceptional legislation. He had no opposition to offer, but the question was one of such vital importance to Ireland that, without the least disrespect to his noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne), he thought the measure should have been introduced to their Lordships by a Member of the Cabinet. It would certainly have been more satisfactory to his side of the House if the Government had shown some indication of interest in what he (the Duke of Richmond) could not but look upon as a very grave state of affairs.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought the remarks of the noble Duke entirely uncalled for. By an arrangement among Ministers his noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne) usually took charge of the Irish business in their Lordships' House. He was free to admit that if the Bill was one proposing an original enactment, their Lordships might expect that it should be introduced by a Member of the Cabinet; but, seeing that it was a continuance Bill, and with the objects of which everyone was perfectly familiar, and which, instead of increasing, diminished the severity of an existing law, he could not think there was any good ground for the objection of the noble Duke. He believed he had the concurrence of his Colleagues when he said that in the manner in which the noble Marquess had stated the provisions of the Bill he had left nothing to be desired, and that the duty could not have been performed with more ability by any Member of the Cabinet.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, it was to be regretted that after the passing of the Church Act and Land Act, not to speak of the Juries' Act—which towards the innocent and the guilty seemed to deal with equal impartiality—a renewal of the Peace Preservation Acts should have been found to be necessary by the Government which had introduced those other measures. As a resident in one of the counties in which these special Acts had been in force, he fully concurred in the necessity of continuing them. He had never heard that the provisions of the expiring Acts had been oppressively applied, or that well disposed citizens had suffered any inconvenience from their operation. On the contrary, he had heard the wish expressed that the Lord Lieutenant would apply with more vigour the power which those enactments placed in his hands, and he had heard these sentiments even from persons who in public took opportunities of denouncing the Acts as unconstitutional and unjust.

LORD DUNSANY thought that if a different and more definite policy had been pursued towards Ireland, such Bills as this would not have been necessary; but we must hope for better times.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he would first ask the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) to explain what was the 8th clause which was not re-enacted under the present Bill? In 1871, when the Westmeath Act passed, he had proposed to include Mayo. Her Majesty's Government had accepted the responsibility for not doing so, but there was no doubt that that Act included Mayo, the murder of a man named Tunbridge would not have taken place. He then showed that the prevalence of crime in Mayo was greater than in Westmeath, and now the noble Secretary for Ireland, in "another place," stated there had been eight undetected murders committed in the year 1872 in the county of Mayo, besides many other serious crimes, a number greater than Westmeath. Why, then, did not Her Majesty's Government propose to afford the same protection to life in Mayo which had stayed crime in Westmeath? But he thought the House and the public should now, when this Parliament was near its close, consider how far the Irish measures and Irish policy of Her Majesty's Government had produced, or were likely in the future to produce, a beneficial or injurious effect, both as regarded the internal peace of Ireland and on the relations of the two countries to each other. He knew their Lordships disliked all long discussions, especially on Ireland, but he thought a very lamentable state of things was evidenced by the necessity of constantly re-enacting coercion Bills, and as no Member of the front benches thought it well to enlarge on this matter, he felt it his duty, as shortly as possible, to endeavour to place the true bearings of the case before the House. What was the effect of disestablishing the Irish Church? Half of the property of the Church was absorbed in buying up the life interests of the clergy. As the Act passed, justice to them demanded this, but by a less precipitous method of disestablishing, this large sum might have been saved to the public; but it should be borne in mind, that, beyond a sum given in lieu of property left to the Church from private benefactors, not one shilling of her property was left to her, while about £600,000 from her funds was unconditionally handed over to Maynooth, which was applied to the support and training of Jesuits, a Body religiously and politically hostile to every institution of this country, and one whose presence had been found so injurious to the common weal that now and in former times there was not a country in Europe from which they had not been expelled. Thus far Protestantism had been disendowed and Popery endowed, and later he would call the attention of the House to proposals already made to hand over the large surplus of Church property to the Roman Catholic Church. He would now say a few words as to the working of the Land Bill. He would not dwell on the jeopardy in which all property was placed by the acceptance of the principle of confiscation without compensation as carried out under that Bill, nor on the declaration he heard, from the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) a few nights ago at the Press dinner, that doubtless this Bill would form a precedent for an English Land Bill, nor would he trouble the House with a long list of farmers' meetings, at all of which entire dissatisfaction was expressed with the provisions and results of the Bill as well as the demands put forward for fixity of tenure and rents fixed by valuation; but he would only give a few examples of what was said at those meetings. At a meeting in the county of Dublin, where farms were large, tenants rich and prosperous, and where no complaints from tenants had been heard before the passing of the Land Act, among other remarks the Chairman said—

"The Land Act of 1870 might have been intended, but certainly never was expected by any one who gave the matter a serious thought, to be of any real positive benefit to the tenant or a final settlement to the land question. The rule of law under the Act is—first, evict and ruin, and then compensate for the injury done. And how compensate? By compelling the tenant to embark in a course of litigation which commences in the County Court and may terminate in the Court for Land Cases Reserved. . . . Now, it is my opinion that the generality of tenants will submit to almost any terms sooner than seek to obtain the benefits seemingly conferred on them by the Land Act."

When this Act was passing, he had frequently told the House that not the least statesmanlike part of it was the endless litigation it must create; and here was a tenant farmer immediately hitting the blot. At another meeting, after one farmer stating that the benefit from the Act was illusory, and that Home Rule was the only way to obtain tenants' rights, a Mr. Farrell, in seconding a Motion—

"Informed the meeting of an effectual mode of treatment which had been adapted in the part of the country from which he came to check the exterminating propensities of some landlords. A person from the north of Ireland purchased 40 acres of land, and attempted to raise the rent from £1 0s. an acre to £2 1s. 6d. The tenants refused to pay, and were evicted, but got compensation, having gone to law under the advice of their parish priest. It was then determined to report every man who took the land as an enemy to his country, and from that time to the present the lands lay waste. This piece of intelligence afforded evident satisfaction to the meeting."

Thus, by advice of the priests, the tenants first obtained compensation for disturbance, &c., and then kept the land waste by terror. This was not strong evidence of the beneficial results prophesied from this message of peace. Again, previous to this Bill, all disputes between tenants—and these among 300,000 small tenants were not a few—were settled by the landlord or agent; now all power of enforcing their decisions was taken out of their hands, and hence, ere long, "domestic calamities" would be added to "agrarian outrages;"

and all power and influence being taken from the landlords, nine-tenths of whom were Protestants and friends of English institutions and English connections, there was no check upon the power of the priests, whose influence at Elections would be paramount and universally exercised against English connection. Then they had the Jury Bill of Lord O'Hagan. It was stated at last assizes and sessions by every Judge and Chairman of sessions in Ireland that this Bill rendered the administration of justice impossible; and Her Majesty's Government by agreeing to appoint a Committee, in "another place," to inquire into its working, had acknowledged how ill-considered and injurious was the character of this pet measure of their Colleague, and he trusted they would not let the Session pass without repealing it, for if they did they would but continue to bring the executive and the administration of justice even into greater contempt than they had already done! He would say a few words on the O'Keefe case. He would not dwell on the merits of the case further than to express his regret at the part that three Roman Catholic Judges had taken in the matter. He referred to Lord O'Hagan, Chief Baron Pigott, and Judge Fitzgerald. A Brother Judge (Judge Lawson) called on them, as the case might come before them as Judges—and it was tried by Judge Fitzgerald—not to prejudge it as members of the Education Board; but they paid no attention to his remonstrance. Well, he in no wise called in question the high character or conscientiousness of these eminent men; but, as Ultramontane Roman Catholics, they felt a conflict between their duty to the Pope and their duty to the Queen, and decided to accept Dr. Manning's advice—to prove themselves Catholics first and Judges afterwards. Nothing could be more disastrous than the effect of such conduct on the minds of the people of Ireland, confirming them in the belief that the Roman Catholic clergy were above and beyond the jurisdiction of the civil power, while the platform of that clergy was now, as always, Catholicity, Nationality, and Socialism—a platform they had so long stood upon that even if willing, they were unable to recede from it. He would touch very shortly on the measure for Irish University Education brought forward by Her Majesty's Government in "another place."

The Premier stated he had not consulted the Roman Catholic hierarchy about it, that it was entirely undenominational, and founded only on the most patriotic principles. He thought the right hon. Gentleman did not require any direct communication with the Irish Roman Catholic hierarchy, when he had Mr. Monsell in his Cabinet, Lord O'Hagan—Cardinal Cullen's mouthpiece—as Irish Chancellor, and his old friend, Archbishop Manning, close by to counsel him. But the Premier said it was "undenominational;" though, strange to say, the Secretary for Ireland, and the ex-Secretary, stated their belief that if well understood, the Bill would be found to satisfy the claims of the Roman Catholic hierarchy; and as they had repeatedly declared they would accept nothing less than the sole direction and teaching of Roman Catholics at the public expense, there was a serious antagonism of opinion between the Members of the Cabinet as to the results of the proposed measure, though none, he believed, in the mind of the public, who were convinced that the Secretaries were correct in their views and the Premier deceived, as to the inevitable results of his own measure. And here he was sorry to be obliged to repeat a remark which some Sessions back gave grave offence to the noble Earl (Earl Granville)—namely, that the fact of these right hon. Gentlemen remaining Members of the Cabinet, showed how well-subordinated were the Members of the Government to their somewhat imperious Chief. He was much surprised to hear a noble Earl (Earl Grey), for whom he had the highest respect, a few nights back, recommend Her Majesty's Government to hand over the surplus funds of the Irish Church without condition to the Roman Catholic clergy, to educate the youth of the country in the principles of the Bull, In Cœna Domini, the Syllabus and the Encyclical, and unpromising hostility to every institution of this country. He was surprised that the noble Earl ignored the fact that Republican Switzerland and Autocratic Russia, Roman Catholic France, Austria, Spain, and Italy, aye, the great Bismarck in the height of his glory, had each and all alike found that for the preservation of the independence of the civil power, education had to be taken out of the hands of the Roman Catholic clergy, and severe restraints placed on their institutions and the exercise of their priestly functions. The noble Lord next read the abstract of the charge of Judge Lawson on the Belfast Riots, as given in The Times, which, after stating the outrages of the rioters and the remissness of the magistracy, contained the following passage:—

"He made great allowances for the local authorities, for magistrates and constables must act or refrain from acting according to the instructions they receive from head-quarters, and he could scarcely wonder if they often hesitated to act with firmness and decision, and recent experience had, unfortunately, shown that they cannot always rely for countenance and protection upon those whose duty it was to defend them when they were assailed for the faithful discharge of their duty. The assembly was unlawful at Common Law, and if it had been dispersed and the ringleaders arrested the disastrous riot would never have occurred."

He could not say to what the learned Judge referred in the paragraph—

"And recent experience had, unfortunately, shown that they—police and magistrates—cannot always rely for countenance and protection upon those whose duty it was to defend them, &c."

—but he was sure that neither the House nor the public could forget that the Parliament had forced upon the Judges the duty of trying Election Petitions—a duty they undertook most reluctantly—that when a Roman Catholic Judge, who had already distinguished himself by the undaunted courage he had shown in the trial of the Fenian prisoners, and since which time Her Majesty's Government were well aware that the closest and most constant surveillance was necessary to protect his life—careless of the odium, unpopularity, and increased danger he would incur, condemned in unmeasured language the conspiracy of the Roman Catholic bishops and clergy to prevent the free exercise of the franchise by the electors of Galway county—instead of receiving that countenance and support from Her Majesty's Government which he so much needed and deserved, their action could only be described in the language of the poet as

"Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike, Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike."

And yet so just was the decision of Judge Keogh that the Law Officers of the Crown were obliged to prosecute the Roman Catholic bishops for their conduct, but in doing so counsel for the Crown never challenged a juror, nor did they even include "conspiracy"—which was the principal crime for which they were deprived of the franchise for seven years—in the indictment. Such treatment of a Judge under such circumstances, such sham prosecution, such cowardly abstinence from protecting life and property, such countenance of lawless meetings had brought the Executive into entire contempt. One word more on a remark of the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) who last Session—repeated lately at Ipswich—said, that Fenianism was now less important, because it had taken a more Constitutional form. This would be the case if the separation of the two countries were an open question, and if it would be accepted when a large majority of Irish Members showed it was the desire of the majority of the people of Ireland; but if, as he believed, the English people never could or would allow Ireland to establish a separate Nationality, then Constitutional discussion could only excite false hopes, bringing rancour and disappointment, and making the Irish people feel themselves justified in endeavouring to enforce their views, which could only lead to all the horrors of civil war and violent repression, unless, indeed, by the new scheme of depôt centres an Irish army were created which would always be ready to support Irish Nationality and assist the enemies of England. He firmly believed that the Irish measures and the Irish policy of Her Majesty's Government was the principal cause rendering legislation, such as the measure now proposed necessary, and the continuance of the same policy, could result only in violence to be repressed by bloodshed and violence.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, that the Bill ought to have been brought in at an earlier period of the Session, when their Lordships might have discussed the use the Government had made of the expiring Acts of which they seemed to him to have availed themselves more for political purposes than for the good government of the country. It was said that the Bill was one for the protection of life and property in Ireland, but he protested against the enactment of this exceptional legislation for that country. The Government could not govern England by such measures. If this sort of legislation was to go forward, what would be the result? Why the people of Ireland would, he believed, return a large number of Members to Parliament pledged to support the principle of Home Rule, and the end might be that all Constitutional Government would be rendered quite impossible.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT bore testimony to the beneficial effects of recent legislation in Ireland, and said the people of that country now felt the Imperial Legislature was willing and anxious to do them justice. Under such circumstances, he did not see how their Lordships could refuse to the Government the continuance of powers which they deemed necessary to the peace and order of the country.

LORD INCHQUIN said, that having had opportunities during the last 12 months of judging of the state of Ireland, he believed that it was absolutely necessary the Peace Preservation Acts should be continued. The renewal of the Act was the more necessary in consequence of the present state of the Irish Juries Act. In the county with which he was himself connected, not a single conviction could be obtained at the last Assizes, and he trusted that an amended Jury Bill would be brought in without delay, in order that there might be no repetition of such a state of things. If a satisfactory Juries Act were passed for Ireland, it might be possible for the Lordships to come forward and suspend the Peace Preservation Act.

VISCOUNT MONCK said, it was unnecessary to reply to the stock objection urged against all Bills of this kind, that they were unconstitutional. It appeared to him that Her Majesty's Government, holding as they did Liberal opinions, deserved some credit for continuing a measure of this description. Notwithstanding the opinion of the noble Earl on the cross benches (the Earl of Leitrin), it did not tend to make the Government popular among the disaffected portion of the population, although they ought to be popular among all classes who valued the peace of the country. Of late years, even in the worst times, agrarian crime had been confined to a small portion of the country, and even there it had been confined to a very small proportion of the people. This Act turned the system of terror against the criminals, and he thought it had had the best possible effect. In conclusion, he expressed satisfaction at the course taken by the Government in renewing the Act, without which it would be impossible for some time to come to restore peace in certain small districts in Ireland.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he did not intend to enter into the wide field of discussion over which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Oranmore) had travelled. The noble Lord reminded him of those Fanti warriors of whom his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies spoke the other night, and who, when they possessed a large quantity of ammunition, fired it off in sheer exuberance of spirits. He understood one complaint made by the noble Lord to be that the county of Mayo was not included in the Act for the Protection of Life and Property. That county was already proclaimed under the Peace Preservation Act, and he could not at present state whether or not it would ultimately become necessary to bring it under the provisions of the other Act. With regard to the remarks of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Inchiquin), he need only point out that the Bill for altering the qualifications under the Juries Act was awaiting a second reading in the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly; Committee negatived: Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 considered (according to Order), and dispensed with: Bill read 3^a, and passed.

LAND TITLES AND TRANSFER

BILL. [a.l.]—(No. 85.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD CAIRNS said, that this Bill was such an important one, and any step in the wrong direction would be so dangerous and so difficult to retrace, that he trusted their Lordships would pardon him if for a short time he called their attention to the present position of the measure, and to some of the features in it that he thought required alteration. He did not rise to oppose the second reading of the Bill; on the contrary, its general scheme and aim had his most hearty support, for he had always entertained the conviction that the only practical mode of simplifying the title of land in this country and facilitating its transfer was by establishing a registry of title in the proper sense of the word. As various speculations had been made respecting the comparative failure of the Act of 1862, he might state his conviction that the cause of that comparative failure was that, although styled an Act for the Registration of Titles, it was, when looked at closely and properly understood, a measure for the registration of assurances, and that was a kind of measure which in this country always had failed, and, in his opinion, always would fail. The present Bill, however, he recognized as a measure for a Registry of Titles, and in that respect it had his warm support. But it contained some novel features which required grave consideration. It was necessary that he should comment both on the present measure and the Real Property Limitation Bill, which was placed after it on the Paper for a second reading. The latter Bill was for shortening the period of prescription; and though that might appear but a small matter, yet it required very careful consideration. He did not mean to say there was in our present periods of limitation anything which should make us superstitious and lead us to say that they could not be reduced. Great changes had been made in the period of prescription. From 60 it had been reduced to 50, and next to 20 years, and now his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) proposed still further to reduce it to 10 years. This was a decided step to take; but he felt still more strongly respecting that part of the Bill which dealt with cases of disability, and to which, as at present advised, he could not agree. The law at present allowed an infant 10 years to assert his title to land, and that period was by this Bill cut down to three years. Considering the complexity of land titles and of boundary lines, which many of their Lordships knew from experience, three years was a very short period to allow for the assertion of his rights to a person who, by hypothesis, knew nothing about them until he attained to full age. This proposition was the more remarkable when they remembered that the present law, which the Bill did not propose to alter, allowed a full-grown man six years within which to assert his claim to arrears of rent. Another provision in this Bill which filled him with apprehension was that with regard to the period of prescription in favour of persons who were beyond the seas. This Bill proposed to alter the law, and, instead of allowing an absent person a period for his return to this country, to say that such a person should be dealt with just as if he were in this country. He could easily imagine the case of a man in Australia, on a sheep farm or at the gold diggings, who might acquire an interest in land, by descent or otherwise, who might not hear of it for some time, and who might, on returning to this country to assert his claim, be debarred from doing so. Reference had been made to what had been done in Australia and in India, and it was desirable to look at what had been done abroad; but the other day it was stated by a correspondent, who wrote with some authority, that in South Australia the reduction of the period from 20 years to 10 years had been found to work so inconveniently and to give such openings to fraud that the Legislature had returned to the old period of prescription. The period of prescription had also been shortened in India, but that country was not analogous to England. There land was held from the Government upon payment of a tribute or impost, and if land became unoccupied there were soon inquiries to find out who ought to be in possession so that the person would probably be soon found out. Now, there was nothing analogous to that in England, so as to make a shorter period of prescription suitable. He believed that the wisest mode of shortening the period of prescription would be by holding out such shortening as a boon in the case of lands that were put upon the Register, instead of making it applicable to all land in the country, because one of the great difficulties in the way of a measure of this kind was to induce persons to register, and it would be well that they should be induced by some boon or temptation to place their land in the first instance on the Register. Coming to the larger measure—the Land Titles and Transfer Bill—he said it was a Bill which ought to be seriously considered by all who were interested in land. The Bill proposed that after the lapse of two years all sales of land in this country should be made in such a way as to bring the land sold upon the register of titles, or, otherwise the sale should not be valid in law; but this compulsion was not applied to land that was not sold. He did not think that their Lordships would do well to impose as a matter of compulsion registration on landowners. If a good system of registration were introduced, and it became so acceptable that a large portion of the land was voluntarily put upon the Register, then they might go a step further, and say that all other land should be registered also; but they must begin tentatively. A good measure would commend itself to the people of the country as suited to their wants; but an unsuitable one would not, and an attempt to enforce it would provoke dissatisfaction, resistance, and failure. Very little would be gained by the contemplated compulsion, because comparatively little land changed hands in a year or in a few years. Dealers with large estates could take care of themselves; but in sales of an acre or two there would be hardship involved in compulsory registration, particularly if resort must be had to a London office. As the Bill stood compulsory registration was not to apply where only an undivided share in land was sold; and even a simple country attorney would know how to evade such an enactment. If he had a client who did not wish to register he would advise him merely to sell first one undivided share of the land and then the other; and in that way he would be entirely out of the scope of the section requiring registration. In the next place, he would refer to a very serious question—the machinery by which the Bill was proposed to be worked. That would be found in the 146th clause. The registration was to be conducted through the medium of a Board, which was called the Board of Registry in London. It was to consist of the Lord Chancellor, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Registrar. The Lord Chancellor, of course, would not have leisure to attend to any of the details of registration. He would be simply available for making rules and giving general directions. He could not understand what the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have to do with the Board; except, so far as representing the Treasury, he would have an interest in the taxation to be levied and the stamps to be used; but when these were once fixed the Chancellor of the Exchequer would cease to have any connection with the Board. The whole of the registration of titles must be done under and by the Registrars to be appointed under the Act. He did not observe that any definition whatever was given in the Bill as to the qualification of the Registrar. They were not told whether he was to be a barrister or not. It was only stated that when appointed he was to be one of the civil servants of the Crown. Now, he owned he had very strong opinions that if they were to have any system of registration which was to work in this country perfectly they would not accomplish the creation of that system with success unless they followed, more or less, the precedent which had worked so successfully in Ireland, in having a Landed Estates Court, which would consist of persons who were to be responsible for the passing of the title of the land which was to be registered, who would be persons of the position, the dignity, and the experience which was possessed by the Judges of the Landed Estates Court in Ireland, and who would bring to bear that amount of authority, and weight, and personal knowledge and skill which had made the Landed Estates Court in Ireland so great a success as it had been. He had endeavoured to discover what was to be the power of the Registrar under the Bill, and he found it was impossible to give to him anything like the powers which the Landed Estates Court had. By the 153rd and 154th sections, every question of law which could possibly arise before the Registrar was to be referred by the Registrar or the parties to the Court of Chancery. If that was the legislation that was to take place on the subject, he had a strong conviction that it would fail. He was convinced that it was perfectly impossible to have a system of registration unless they had some Court or authority which would decide the questions of law as they arose, and which would examine and pass and give an imprimatur to the title. He begged their Lordships to remember that one of the great difficulties would be to raise the points. Who would raise the points? There would be only one side before the Registrar, and that one side would not be anxious to raise the points, but to conceal them. This chance would require to be undergone—that the Registrar would raise the point of the title, and that it be then referred to the Court of Chancery to be decided by the Court of Chancery. Well, he wanted to know with reference to this Registrar—this single man who was to decide nothing, but who was to refer everything to the Court of Chancery—what was to be the extent of his authority locally in regard to England generally. The Board of Registry was to have its offices in London, and it was to have power—1st, to divide England into districts for the purposes of registration of title, and to alter districts so made; 2nd, to declare by notice in The London Gazette when registration of title was to commence in any district and the place at which lands were to be registered; 3rd, to commence registration in any one or more district or districts pursuant to any such notice; and 4th, to declare by what assistant registrar, examiner of title, officers, and servants, the business of registration in such district was from time to time to be conducted. He wanted to know how all this was to work. Was it to be supposed that the assistant registrars were all as competent men as the Registrar? He supposed not. He supposed they were to be subordinate. Was it supposed that the land in the country had not a similar title to the land about London? Surely not. Well, how was it to be arranged that they were to have a Registrar in London and assistant registrars only in the country, which assistant registrars were to have the power of deciding the title in the country? It appeared that the Bill was going to set up all over the country a kind of subordinated officers, who were to examine all the titles, while at the same time they were to have a superior officer, whose business it was to do it in London. He must say he had considerable jealousy about the handing over from the upper or head officer duties which he alone should discharge to assistants and subordinates. He observed from the organs of information they were in the habit of daily consulting that Registrars in Bankruptcy, who never were intended to be Judges, but mere administrative officers, were attended by Queen's Counsel and other members of the Bar, and decided questions involving hundreds of thousands of pounds, and the credit of mercantile men in the City. He said that was a very dangerous system, and one which he did not wish to see extended. He repeated that he was not satisfied with the machinery by which the Bill was to be worked. He found in the Bill a provision—namely, the 32nd—which filled him with considerable apprehension. It was a novel provision, and it ought to be carefully considered by those who were interested in landed property. According to that provision, the Registrar, after examining title deeds, if he should be of opinion that the title thereby shown was valid and good for the purpose of holding the land to which it related, after 20 years was to have the power of certifying the title as absolute. That was a provision which might be re-modelled; but as it stood it entirely overthrew everything which had been the law of the country hitherto, because no Court had ever supposed that what was described as a holding title for 20 years was a good title to land. The Court of Chancery had always required 60 years. That was too much; but 20 years was entirely nominal. An analogy had been suggested to justify this provision, and it was said that there were parties in this country who were willing to buy on the like conditions, and considered that they had a good holding title. But the analogy would not support any enactment of this kind. The person who wished to buy the land saw the conditions of sale, and it was for him to say whether he liked them or not. If he chose to run the risk the risk was his own. If the title turned out good, so much the better for him; if it did not, nobody else was injured. But that was not at all the case when the Registrar was authorized to turn himself into an absolute judge whether a title was good. That threw the risk upon the real owner and not upon the purchaser, for there was no purchaser in the case. Then there were provisions in the Bill with respect to boundaries which seemed very dangerous. There was hardly anything more perplexing in large estates than the question of boundaries. According to the Bill, if a person desired to have his boundaries settled, notice was to be given to the adjacent occupiers, and also to the person in receipt of the rents of the adjacent lands. That was good as far as it went. But what security in many cases would notices of this kind

be? The holder might be a tenant, the receiver of the rents might be a mortgagee, and, notwithstanding the notices, very serious injury might be inflicted upon the owners of the adjacent property. He believed they never would have any satisfactory definition of boundaries upon certified titles until a survey of England existed upon a scale large enough to deal with boundaries, and then it could be done to some advantage. In the 16th clause he found that the registered owner should be taken to have an absolute power of selling the land discharged of all trusts, and persons were to protect themselves by caveats. He quite admitted that that was a proper system to proceed upon. But then he found in the 41st section that, except in case of fraud, the purchaser from such registered proprietor was not to be affected by any notice of any trust or unregistered interest. It was said it was desirable to make land as easy of transfer as ships or stocks. But they had no such enactment with regard to ships or stocks. There was another proposal which seemed to be attended with much danger—namely, that which related to the question of judicial sales. He looked upon that part of the Bill as one which would require very great consideration, and in its present form he doubted the expediency of adopting it. Any person interested might come to the Court of Chancery to prove that by reason of complexity of title, or other specified causes, it would be beneficial to the parties interested that there should be a sale. There were at present many cases in which persons partly interested in land might apply for a sale; but here was an entirely new crop of cases, in which persons interested, no matter to how small an extent, in the land, might come to the Court and say—"This land is in an unfortunate condition, the title is very perplexed, there are many persons interested, and we ask that the land should be turned into money." It might be said that the Court of Chancery would never order the land to be sold unless it was satisfied that the sale would be highly beneficial to the parties concerned. He admitted that; but objected to allowing persons with however small an interest to come to the Court and ask to have the land turned into money. Then there were provisions with respect to the Court of Chancery which seemed to show that his noble and learned Friend had a higher idea of the powers of that Court than he himself had. His noble and learned Friend armed the Court of Chancery with powers to give a certified and indefeasible title upon sales which were authorized by the Bill to be made, and not upon the occasion of these sales only, but on the occasions of all sales which the Court of Chancery made in the course of its ordinary business. He was perfectly sure that the Court of Chancery was quite unfitted to give certified and indefeasible titles to owners of land, and for this reason. The Judges in the Court of Chancery could not sit down and examine abstracts of title, and say—"We are of opinion, upon our responsibility as Judges, that here is a title which is indefeasible, and we certify accordingly." They could only remit the matter to one of the conveyancing counsel of the Court, who would state his opinion upon his judgment as to whether the title could be certified as indefeasible or not. The danger of these cases was not that points would be raised and improperly decided, but that they would not be raised at all; that the difficulties would be passed over; and that the Court of Chancery would incur the extreme responsibility of certifying a title as indefeasible when in reality the Judges of the Court could not decide on the subject themselves, but must take the decision second hand from some counsel advising the Court. If we gave an indefeasible title by Act of Parliament any mistake would be irreparable. It was true there was a provision that a person aggrieved might be re-imbursed out of any purchase money that might remain at the disposal of the Court. But surely their Lordships would not think such a remedy sufficient. He did not clearly understand the power it was proposed to give to the County Courts under the Bill; but protested against their giving certified titles. His noble and learned Friend would have gathered from what he had said that he looked upon the measure in no unfriendly spirit. Speaking generally, a measure of this kind needed very careful examination in detail; it would scarcely be possible—and certainly not satisfactory—to allow it to pass without thorough revision in a Select Committee. The labours of that Committee would not be light; the clauses of the Bill, numbering 173, were not merely clauses of procedure such as those in the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill, but clauses every word of which must be weighed, because a slip might do incalculable evil, perhaps years hence. The Bill would probably not emerge from the Select Committee in time to insure its becoming law this Session, especially as the House of Commons had postponed the second reading of the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill until after the holidays. Would it not then be better to rest content with taking this stage of the Bill this Session? One of his earliest recollections of legislation was the enactment about 40 years ago of the Law for Abolishing Fines and Recoveries. It had a remarkable history. Perhaps no modern Act of Parliament had ever had so few decisions of Judges upon it, although it had been in daily operation since its enactment. The reason of this was to be found in the fact that the Bill was handed over to Mr. Peter Brodie, one of the most eminent conveyancers of that day, and was revised by him so carefully that it left his hands the most finished and masterly piece of work connected with real property ever produced. Would it not be well to adopt a similar course with this Bill? If it were handed to one or, better still, to two eminent conveyancers for revision in detail, though, of course, adhering to the main principles of the measure, the result might be equally satisfactory. It was utterly impossible for any ordinary draftsman to avoid slips in such a measure as this, and it was equally impossible for his noble and learned Friend, considering the numerous demands upon his time to do the work himself.

THE EARL OF POWIS suggested Amendments with regard to dealings in mines and tithes. In the case of enclosures also, there would be an important class of title, for which he did not see any provision in the Bill; and he suggested that the tenant for life should be put upon the Register as well as the trustees, so as to provide an additional safeguard against any fraudulent dealing with estates.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would endeavour to show that he could be concise in his reply to the points which had been raised, though he would willingly have devoted more time to their elucidation. First, with regard to the period of limitation, his special object in shortening that period was one in which he understood his noble and learned Friend to concur—namely, to afford an assistance and an inducement to the clearance of titles placed upon the Register. He did not now propose to enter upon the particular period which should be fixed. His noble and learned Friend was less accurate than usual in stating that the period of limitation after disability ceased was now ten years. It was really five years, and the Bill would limit it to three. As to the case of people beyond the seas, he hoped, when this case came to be considered, due regard would be paid to the great increase in the facility of communications between all parts of the world. Formerly there were strong reasons for including absence beyond seas as a cause of disability; but these reasons had of late years been much weakened, and their Lordships would, he thought, come to the conclusion that they might safely be disregarded altogether. No doubt that principle had been adopted in the colonies; but in this country an Act introduced by Lord Campbell had already abolished this saving with respect to actions for debt and other personal actions. As to the letter in the newspaper, he was himself ignorant of the Australian Act for shortening the period of limitations, nor could he throw any light upon the question whether the letter was accurate or not. If, however, the period of limitation had been altered in Australia to 10 years, and then back again to 20, he should have expected that the fact would have come to his observation in some way or other. The principle on which this Bill proceeded was that possession, bona fide acquired and long enjoyed, was entitled to more respect than claims of which persons were ignorant, or which had been knowingly and deliberately delayed. The great object was that there should be a clearance of titles, and security to those who availed themselves of the system of registration. He regretted that his noble and learned Friend should object to the 32nd clause, for enabling the Registrar to accept as absolutely good what were there called “good holding titles;” for it was, he believed, the opinion of most persons who had considered the subject of Registration that, at all events, something less than the strictness of the present legal requirement was absolutely necessary. The instances where “good holding titles” were disturbed were very rare; and it appeared to him that there would be nothing unsafe or unjust if their Lordships determined that, for the purpose of facilitating Registration, and for clearing titles, they would adopt the principle of the 32nd clause, whether or not they adhered to the precise language. As to the question of Boundaries, he would not touch upon it further than to say that these provisions of the Bill were entirely open to consideration and might, if necessary, be amended. So with respect to the machinery of the Bill. He quite agreed that the Registrar should be a person able to discharge functions substantially of a judicial character; and it was open to consideration whether his name should be altered, and some of the powers of the Court of Chancery intrusted to him, following in this respect the lines of some former Bills. With regard to judicial sales in the case of complicated titles, the clauses in the Bill were substantially the same as clauses which his noble and learned Friend himself formerly considered proper; and as to County Courts, he agreed that their assistance should not be resorted to, except mainly for ministerial purposes. He trusted, however, that their Lordships would not dissent from the principle that good holding titles might be certified. With regard to the suggestion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Powis), there might be some advantage in re-considering the provisions to which he had referred. He must acknowledge that the suggestion of the noble and learned Lord to refer the present Bills to another Select Committee did not hold out much prospect of their becoming law this Session. If this should be impossible, it might deserve consideration whether some such reference to competent persons as that stated by his noble and learned Friend to have been made in the case of the Fines and Recoveries Bill might not be followed with advantage. He did not understand his noble and learned Friend to ask him to give any pledge on the subject; but he would undertake, between the present time and the next meeting of Parliament, to consider his recommendations.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly.

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Four o'clock.

CORONATION OF THE KING OF SWEDEN.—QUESTION.

MR. RAIKES asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the fact that Her Majesty was alone among European Sovereigns unrepresented by a special Ambassador or Envoy at the recent Coronation of the King of Sweden and Norway; and, whether he can state the reasons which have induced Her Majesty's Government to advise on this occasion a course different from that followed at the accession of the present Emperor of Russia and other Sovereigns?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, in matters of international etiquette and of Court ceremonials, it is usual to follow precedents, and this year the same usage was adopted on the occasion of the coronation of the King of Sweden, as was followed in 1844 and 1860, when on the coronation of two Kings of Sweden letters of congratulation were addressed by Her Majesty to those Sovereigns. On this occasion other Powers besides Great Britain were not represented, and I trust the House will not think that in following these precedents there could have been anything to impair the friendship and good understanding which so happily exists between Great Britain and Sweden. I speak with reserve, but I believe it is likely that one of the sons of Her Majesty will be present at the coronation of the King in Norway in July next.

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS BILL.
QUESTION.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

VOL. CCXVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

ment, Whether, as it was impossible to move the Second Reading of the Habitual Drunkards Bill, owing to the adjournment of the House after the vote on the University Education (Ireland) Bill, he will afford him an opportunity of bringing it on?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he should be very glad to assist his hon. Friend if the Government had in its possession a superabundance of time. He was sorry to say, however, that he could hardly foresee sufficient time for the Bills with which he was himself charged, and he was not therefore in a position to ask the Government to set apart a day for his hon. Friend. Besides, considering the time of year at which they had arrived, his hon. Friend could hardly expect to pass the Bill during the present Session.

—OFFICERS OF THE SCIENTIFIC CORPS.—QUESTION.

MAJOR TRENCH asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will explain to the House why it is that officers in the Scientific Corps employed in the Public Works Department or holding staff appointments in India are, on promotion from the rank of captain to that of major, kept, as regards Indian pay and allowances, on the rate of pay belonging to the former rank, while officers of the Cavalry, Infantry, or Staff Corps, on promotion to the rank of major, receive the full benefit of the increased rate of Indian pay, and allowances belonging to that rank?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, as my hon. Friend did not find my answer of yesterday quite clear, and as his Question relates to a very complicated subject, the best course will be, perhaps, to read an official Memorandum which enters fully into it, and which will, I trust, be quite satisfactory to him—

“With regard to the Public Works Department, Engineer Officers are the only Officers of the Scientific Branch of the Army who are appointed thereto under the present regulations, and they have the option of receiving consolidated salary according to a new scale, or Staff salary under a former scale with regimental pay and allowances. Officers of the other branches of the Service joining the Public Works Department since 1870 have no such option, and receive consolidated salary. In such case the Engineer Officer has the privilege of receiving the net military pay of his rank, in addition to such consolidated salary, a privilege which the Officer of Cavalry, Infantry, or Staff Corps does not possess. The aggregate pay of the Engineer Officer is, independent of his rank, always superior in that case to the pay of the Officers of other branches of the Service holding similar appointments. As to the case of Staff appointments, when the Staff salary is granted in addition to full regimental pay and allowances, it is believed that none such are held by Engineer officers, unless at their own option, in the Public Works Department. In such cases, however, an Officer of either of the Scientific Corps would receive less in the aggregate on promotion from captain to major than an Officer of Cavalry, Infantry, or Staff Corps similarly promoted, because the regimental pay of the former is in India, as it is in England, less than that of the latter. The explanation of this is, that when, in 1871, the War Office, for purposes connected with Imperial Army organization, converted all the captains of Artillery and Engineers into majors, it was thought unnecessary to give them the full regimental pay of majors of the other branches of the Service, as they enjoyed, especially in India, money privileges associated with their proper and ordinary duties which made their aggregate salaries paid out of the public purse amply sufficient. In adopting this course, the precedent established by the military authorities, both at home and in India, in 1858, was followed. On that occasion all the then majors of Artillery and Engineers were converted into lieutenant-colonels, but continued to receive majors' pay and majors' pension on retirement."

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH STATIONS IN GALWAY.—QUESTION.

MR. HERON asked the Postmaster General, Whether there is any probability of a telegraph station being established at Recess, county Galway, in consequence of the number of English and Scotch gentlemen residing in the neighbourhood for the salmon fishing during the angling season, to whom the want of a telegraph station is the very greatest inconvenience, and as no great expense will be incurred, because the telegraph wire between Galway and Clifden is on the road beside the Post Office at Recess?

MR. MONSELL, in reply, said, that the extension of telegraphic communication in Galway would cost very much more than by his Question his hon. and learned Friend seemed to suppose. But were the cost little or much, he was sorry to say that the Post Office had no funds at its disposal granted by Parliament for such purpose. He could not, therefore, hold out any hope to his hon. and learned Friend on the subject of the extension he referred to.

THE "ALABAMA"—COMPENSATION TO BRITISH SHIPOWNERS.

QUESTIONS.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government have received any applications from British subjects for compensation in respect of losses occasioned by the destruction of their property in vessels destroyed or captured by the "Alabama," and what course Her Majesty's Government have taken or propose to take in reference thereto?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have received certain applications from British subjects for compensation in respect of losses occasioned by the destruction of vessels by the Alabama; those applications have been taken into consideration and the opinion of the Law Officers has been taken. In accordance with their opinion, the Board of Trade and the various applicants have been informed that Her Majesty's Government is not liable to British subjects for the acts of the Alabama and other similar vessels.

Afterwards—

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Foreign Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to refer the claims of British subjects as against the Alabama to arbitration? He also desired to know, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any notice of a claim in respect to the widow of Mr. Grey, chief officer of the "Saxon," who was murdered at an early period of the American War?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, the hon. Gentleman, not having given me either public or private Notice of his Question, must excuse me making any reply to it.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE: I will give Notice of my Question on the Paper of the House.

IRELAND—PRISON DISCIPLINE.

QUESTION.

MR. PIM, on behalf of Mr. M'CLURE, asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the statement is correct that the Rev. Mr. Cahill has, on several occasions, been refused permission to see Mr. M'Aliese, confined in the county Antrim Gaol, and whether any special reason exists for Mr. Cahill's exclusion, as other clergymen have been admitted?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had been informed that the Rev. Mr. Cahill, and also one other person whose conduct they considered to have been of an unsatisfactory character, had been refused permission by the Board of Superintendence to see Mr. McAleese. They had been informed they would not be admitted except on a direct order from the Irish Executive.

POST OFFICE—CAPE AND ZANZIBAR
MAILS.—QUESTION.

MR. HOLMS asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a Question of which he had given him private Notice—namely, Upon what authority, a payment has been made on account of the Contract for the conveyance of Mails between the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar, such Contract not having been ratified by the House of Commons? He also wished to know, Whether that Contract will be taken at such an hour of the evening as will afford an opportunity for a full discussion upon it?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, It is most desirable that a Question conveying an imputation on the conduct of a Member of the Government should be preceded by the usual Notice on the Paper of the House, and that it should not be put immediately after a private Notice of it given to the party immediately concerned. So far as that private Notice goes, I will take care that the subject of the Contract referred to shall be brought forward at a time when the hon. Gentleman and his Friends shall have full opportunity of considering it. As to the remainder of the Question, I think it will be better—involving as it does argumentative matter—that it should be discussed when the Contract itself is brought under the attention of the House.

RATING OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY
—CONSOLIDATED RATE BILL.
QUESTION.

MR. W. MORRISON asked the Secretary of the Local Government Board, If it would be in accordance with propriety, that the Government should introduce a Special Clause into the Rating Bill, removing the exemption of Government property from the General Rate?

MR. HIBBERT in reply, said, it had not been deemed necessary to insert clauses in the Rating Bill to provide for Government property being liable to other rates than poor rates. These, generally speaking, were either paid out of the poor rate, or collected on the basis of it. A provision in the Consolidated Rate Bill made the matter perfectly clear, but his right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) would no doubt consider any proposal to insert a clause in the other Bill, should it be thought necessary.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY REGULATION BILL—MILITARY CENTRES—OXFORD.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT, in rising to move, That a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report upon the Reasons urged by Members of the University of Oxford against the selection of Oxford as a Military Centre, and also to consider and report upon the whole question of the advisability of selecting Oxford as a Military Centre, said, he would first ask his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, whether he had reason to believe there was some great military or strategic necessity for the choice he had made in this respect? Could such necessity be shown, he should not expect the House to give a favourable hearing to objectors, though a few hon. Members might even in that case protest against the evils attending the choice. In the original scheme, however, Oxford was mentioned only as an alternative or secondary depôt, the military advisers of his right hon. Friend apparently preferring High Wycombe. The matter, however, assumed a different aspect when a powerful deputation of his constituents waited on the right hon. Gentleman, introduced and assisted by the potent eloquence of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Harcourt). They adduced reasons so convincing that the right hon. Gentleman then and there, if the report in The Times was correct, committed himself to the adoption of Oxford as a depôt. [MR. HARCOURT: No.] If his hon. and learned Friend said this was not the case, he of course accepted the correction. The deputation represented the geographical importance of Oxford, that there was no centre equal to it in facilities for the assembling of troops; that it had a weekly cattle and daily provision market; that the 32nd Regiment had precedence over the 85th—a very odd reason; that it had two rifle ranges; that there were excellent sites, high and healthy, accessible to a good country and large stretches of pasture; that the water supply was plentiful, and that there was excellent public bathing. What was his right hon. Friend's reported answer? It might be an incorrect report, but the statement in The Times was, that his right hon. Friend, having carefully read the memorial, found its reasons pertinent and conclusive. Now he (Mr. Herbert) held in his hand the Report of a distinguished officer who had been sent to Oxford to examine into its qualifications for this dépôt, and it was therein stated that both the water supply and the drainage of Oxford were most unsatisfactory, and that, as regarded the former, as confirmed by Professor Phillips, the eminent geologist, no water supply sufficient to meet the demands of a barrack could be depended on by means of wells. Indeed, the whole tendency of the Report issued a few days ago was adverse to the selection of Oxford. Moreover, his right hon. Friend had assured him—and he believed members of the University likewise—that no battalion of Regular troops could be placed there; so that, while the object now was to attach regiments to localities, the centre of this locality was never to see the battalion belonging to it. Militia and Volunteers were to be trained at Oxford, but the battalion raised there was never to be stationed at the dépôt town. If Oxford was to be a real centre of military activity, then there were strong reasons urged against it on the part of the University. The remonstrance addressed to the Government showed that men in every position in the University were remarkably unanimous on that subject. If Oxford was made a military centre, he understood it was intended to drill close to Oxford the recruits of the Militia and the Regular battalions which belonged to the district, and that the majority of the rank and file at the dépôts would be recruits. It was reckoned they would require in the course of the year 444 recruits to keep up the two battalions to their proper strength; the dépôts were to be drilled for six months, and it was calculated there would never be more than 200 recruits at the same time, with 50 old soldiers, making a total of 250. The drilling of the recruits was necessarily a work of a very rough and stubborn character; and in the dépôts they would have a constant succession of men who would require, in homely phrase, to be licked into shape. The Inspector General of Prisons, in his Report for 1871 said, that in enlisting a large number of men, it was impossible to avoid taking many who would turn out afterwards to be worthless characters, and that many young soldiers did not adapt themselves to the requirements of discipline until they had undergone stern punishment. Therefore, at those dépôts, the best side of military life would not be seen, and the proposed experiment would possibly turn out very unsatisfactory. Now, they had lately added to Oxford a large class of unattached students, essentially a poor class, belonging to no College, who took care of themselves, and who lived in the cheapest parts of the town. If the influences to which he was referring had a bad effect on the town, that class of students would suffer in consequence. Then there was the effect upon the maid-servant element to be considered in relation to such a matter. With regard to the City of Oxford, as distinguished from the University, its interest was, that there should be nothing to repel those parents who were beginning to settle there for the sake of educating their sons. It was said the officers who would be stationed at Oxford would be picked. That might be so as regarded the lieutenant-colonel, but he did not understand how they could pick any of the other officers. Moreover, the policy of taking away the best men from the regiments for the dépôts was a very doubtful one, and had never answered. Again, the great difficulty of the University had been that a class of men went there for mere social purposes, to make friends and enjoy themselves; although in that respect there had been a great change for the better within the last few years. Now, he did not at all wish to interfere with the amusements of the military; but there were at Oxford already plenty of the elements of folly, and there were distractions from study which he did not wish to see encouraged at the University, and the reason why a great many men of wealth and position did not send their sons to the University was because of the fear they had that they might be led into expensive habits and amusements. Then, as to those Acts which the House had been engaged in discussing a day or two before, was it, he should like to know, intended that they should be carried out at Oxford? If so, would it not be placing the University there in unfair competition with its rival, Cambridge, where a fair, as matters now stood, turned the scale as to which of them a man would send his sons? He thanked his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War for the courtesy which he had displayed in listening to the arguments against his scheme which had been advanced in the case of Nottingham, and he trusted his right hon. Friend would meet the appeal which he now made on the part of Oxford; for if there were good reasons against establishing a military centre at Nottingham, the reasons were still stronger in the case of Oxford. With regard to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford, he was not all afraid of him; for his hon. and learned Friend had joined him in too many attacks on the British Army, that he should fear him on the present occasion. It was only the other day that his hon. and learned Friend was trying to persuade them that a certain learned society should be abolished, or as he euphemistically termed it, placed in the secondary line. He was sorry his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had left his place, for as there was a time when he did not prefer Chloe to Lydia, he should like to touch another chord in his breast, and induce him to lend even the smallest fraction of his influence in support of the proposal which he was now making. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for a Select Committee to consider and report upon the subject.

Mr. MOWBRAY, in seconding the Motion, said, he took the earliest opportunity of rising in support of his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Herbert), and to thank him on behalf of the University of Oxford for having brought the question forward. He did not regard the Motion as an attack on the British Army, but to defend the University from the introduction into the City of Oxford of alien and unacademic elements likely to interfere with the working of that University. There was not that unanimity of feeling upon the subject in the City of Oxford that was supposed to exist, because now many of the right hon. Gentleman's active and influential supporters within the City had changed their opinions, since it had become known that only 200 recruits and 50 old soldiers would form the depôt, and that the expenditure of £70,000 per annum on which the tradesman had been calculating was no longer to be relied on. But whatever might be the opinion of the City of Oxford upon the matter, the opinion of the University with regard to it was unmistakable, for a Memorial had been laid upon the Table of the House, signed by 112 members of the University, and representing every shade of academical, theological, and political opinion—embracing High Church, Low Church, Broad Church, University Conservatives, and University Reformers—and everyone engaged in the active teaching of the University, against Oxford being made a depôt centre. Beyond that, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had received a deputation, consisting of all the authorities of the University, who had stated their strong objection to Oxford being made a military centre, on the ground that if the military element were introduced into the City it would be impossible to preserve proper discipline among the undergraduates. It must be remembered that what was permitted to the young officers was not permitted by the laws of the University to the young students, and that the example of the former would prove most injurious to the discipline of the latter. The number of undergraduates now on the books of the Colleges at Oxford was 2,400. The Colleges were overflowing, and a large number of undergraduates now lived in lodgings in the town. Besides which, there was the new class of unattached students, already amounting to 145, whose numbers were daily increasing and all of them lodged in the town. He denied that any national object was to be gained by making Oxford a military centre, and the University contended that they were as much a national institution as the British Army. It was necessary that students should be trained to habits of order and regularity, and Universities and Colleges were places where "true religion and useful learning" were expected to flourish. With increasing numbers connected with the University, an increasing population of the City, the luxuries of the age, and the temptations with which they were surrounded, and the easy access to London, it was difficult for the authorities to maintain discipline; and those difficulties would be increased by the introduction of this non-academic element into the town. High Wycombe, Aylesbury, or Woodstock would be far preferable stations for such a purpose. Indeed, High Wycombe was the place selected by the military authorities, and not Oxford, and recommended to the War Office. Aylesbury was anxious to welcome the establishment of a dépôt centre; and the Report of the commandant of the district, the Prince of Saxe Weimar, was in favour of Woodstock. This information had been in possession of the War Office, and ought to have been given to the House at a much earlier date. The Report was dated 23rd January, 1873, but it was not until Tuesday last that it was laid on the Table of the House, and distributed to hon. Members on Wednesday. That Report, which during the interval had not been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, stated that the selection of Oxford as a military centre was a mistake, because of the difficulty which would be experienced in obtaining water and on account of the bad drainage, and suggested that a site should be fixed upon near Woodstock. If it were a matter of paramount national necessity that Oxford should be made a military centre, he would not object to its being made a military centre, even although the University might suffer some damage. But, as the only object in proposing to make Oxford a military centre was to train 250 recruits, there was no necessity for thus interfering with the University. In a postscript dated the 19th of May, three days after the Notice of this Motion, it appeared that negotiations had been entered into for the purchase of another site, about two miles from Oxford, the local authorities having agreed to provisional arrangements as to the supply of gas and water. He maintained, therefore, that he was entitled to complain of his right hon. Friend for having put forward a document on which he professed to rely, but which really took away the ground of the conclusion on which he relied. His right hon. Friend should rise superior to the small consideration on which he appeared to decide this question, and decide it on grounds of a more national and paramount character. He was sorry to think that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had left the House while the subject was under consideration; and he had no doubt that the Secretary of State for War had now as much respect for the University of Oxford as he had many years ago, and that he would not do anything injurious to the interest of Oxford; but he could not help saying that there was ample ground for the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, and that he heartily concurred in it.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report upon the reasons urged by Members of the University of Oxford against the selection of Oxford as a military centre, and also to consider and report upon the whole question of the advisability of selecting Oxford as a military centre."—(Mr. Aubrey Herbert),—instead thereof.

Mr. CARDWELL said, his right hon. Friend opposite the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Mowbray) was right in supposing that he (Mr. Cardwell) should be the very last man to do anything in the slightest degree injurious to the University of Oxford, and he had not the smallest intention of attempting anything of the kind. With regard to the Paper mentioned by his right hon. Friend, it was simply impossible to lay it upon the Table on the 23rd of January, when it was moved for on the 29th of April, and afterwards printed. The only value he attached to it was, that the objections made to the Bullington site were removed, because they simply turned upon arrangements as to gas, water, and sewage. One of the great arguments urged against him by his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Herbert) was, that he

(Mr. Cardwell) had been compelled by his constituents to come to the conclusion that Oxford should be made a military centre, and that he did not come to that conclusion upon proper grounds or by military advice. But what said his right hon. Friend opposite? That many of the most influential of his (Mr. Cardwell's) constituents were altogether opposed to the scheme. How did those two propositions hang together? The hon. Member for Nottingham also spoke of the great improvement which had taken place in the University of Oxford. That might be the case, but how did it agree with the statement of his right hon. Friend that the difficulty of enforcing discipline was every day increasing? He would appeal to a very distinguished Nobleman who spoke last year in the House of Lords on the subject, and who knew a great deal about the Army and the Universities. That Nobleman said he thought it was quite as likely that officers would be deteriorated by University students as that University students would be deteriorated by officers. What were the real facts of the case? In the first place, he congratulated himself that the present Motion was not made by the Members for the University, who had had their attention alive to the subject from the 17th February down to that time, and yet had not thought it their duty to bring the matter under the consideration of the House, but had left it to the free lance of the hon. Member for Nottingham, who, having been in the Army himself, was probably considered the best person to depreciate the Army in that House. Then the Motion itself was irregular, because he was quite taken by surprise when his hon. Friend stated his intention of moving for a Committee—[Mr. AUBERON HERBERT: The words were accidentally omitted from my Notice.] But they should have been put in. His hon. Friend had alluded to certain Acts of Parliament, and implied that they were to be extended to Oxford; but he could assure him that there was no intention whatever of making any such extension of the Acts to Oxford. What had really been done was this—a deputation of his constituents came to him, but, if his memory served him correctly, it was in reply to a deputation from the University. The House had been told that there was a great and unmistakable objection on the part of the University to the scheme; and, undoubtedly, a large number of eminent members of the University had objected. Their opposition, however, like that which they formerly showed against the introduction of railways, proceeded more from an exaggerated view of what might happen, than from an accurate knowledge of what would be really done. What was the amount of the objection? A Memorial was laid on the Table of the House on the Motion of his right hon. Friend opposite, showing that of 25 Heads of Houses five Heads signed it, while 20 did not; that 24 Professors signed it, and 16 did not; and that out of members of Convocation 112 signed the Memorial, and 169 did not. What did the War Department propose to do? They were going to obtain 20 acres of ground at a distance of about two miles from Oxford. They would not interfere with the maid-servants; they would not interfere in the slightest degree with the unattached students of the University, wherever they resided; and the whole provision was to be—a lieutenant-colonel, a major, six captains, four subalterns, a paymaster, a quartermaster, a surgeon, 45 non-commissioned officers, and 50 old soldiers, many of them married. The remainder would be recruits under strict discipline, and undergoing drill. The hon. Member for Nottingham said that recruits were very troublesome, and that it was very unreasonable they should be brought to Oxford. But the reason why Oxford was selected was because it had a larger population among which enlistments for the Army could be made than any other town which could be selected; and when it was urged that even the opportunity for such an enlistment was an evil in itself, he (Mr. Cardwell) could not help expressing his belief that those who enlisted were improved by the discipline to which they were subjected, and were thereby made better members of society. He was told they should go to Woodstock; but was it likely they would consent to go there when they could have a recruiting market at Oxford? The population of the Parliamentary borough of Oxford was returned at 31,404, while that of Woodstock was only 7,477; so that, whatever exception might be taken to the phrase, Woodstock was a desolate place when compared with Oxford in respect to recruiting population. Again, there were these important considerations. If they went to Woodstock they would be entirely out of the way of the recruiting population; but if anybody would look at the map, they would see that of all places Oxford, although on the outskirts of the country, was, nevertheless, as central as any other place they could pitch upon, and was more accessible by railway. Besides, Oxford was connected with the 52nd Regiment, and was the head-quarters of the Oxford Militia, which corps, he believed, desired to be placed there, and the citizens certainly desired to have the dépôt there. The proposed site for the dépôt had the approval of the military authorities whom he had consulted on the subject, and General M'Donnell had reported in its favour. The engineering officer who had visited the spot also reported that the site possessed many advantages—it had a light sandy soil, suitable for building and camping purposes; it was in a sheltered situation; its distance from the town of Oxford was sufficient to prevent annoyance to the inhabitants; and the only disadvantage, the difficulty of obtaining an abundant supply of water, had been met by the undertaking of the corporation in that respect. With regard to the harm which it was supposed would result from the presence in the town of the military, as connected with the establishment of a dépôt centre, Lord Shaftesbury's opinion contrasted with that of the hon. Member for Nottingham. It was that these institutions were likely to be the best training schools in the country. Besides that, he had in his hand a letter from a gentleman who had long been a tutor and a distinguished ornament of Trinity College, Dublin, and in that letter the writer said that, though he had never heard of any ill-effects to the students arising from the proximity of the garrison to the University, he had known many instances in which the officers of regiments had derived advantage from being quartered in the neighbourhood of the University. There were garrisons not only at Eton and Winchester, but at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen; and Oxford was surely no such sickly plant that it could not bear what other places endured without injury, and that it could not tolerate the presence of 15 chosen officers, 45 non-commissioned officers, 50 old soldiers, and a few recruits.

Mr. Cardwell

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in supporting the Motion, said, that the University of Oxford would be quite willing to allow a military centre to be fixed in or near that city when the military necessities of the nation placed it in the position now occupied by Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Dublin; but the right hon. Gentleman had sat down without giving the House any information whatever as to the military necessities of the case, so far as Oxford was concerned. Indeed, as a proof that the fears of the University authorities were not without foundation, it was well known that at the time when the Militia was out for training the discipline of the University was much more difficult to maintain than at other times. [Mr. CARDWELL: That is just one of those things which, by this plan, we propose to put an end to for ever.] The right hon. Gentleman complained that the Members for the University had taken no active steps in reference to this subject. For his part, he moved in the matter early in the Session. On the 17th of February, he had questioned the right hon. Gentleman as to the site, and had been told that it was not absolutely settled; but when it was decided upon, the right hon. Gentleman said that he would have no objection to produce the Report of Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar. In the meantime, the present Motion was placed on the Paper; and in consequence, he obtained permission of the right hon. Gentleman to see Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar's Report in writing, which had since been printed, and laid on the Table. In short, he had simply been waiting for information on the whole subject, and did not see what more he could have done. Had he found that there were cogent military reasons for placing the dépôt centre at Oxford, he would not have moved further in the matter but the contrary appeared to be the case. The proposed site was about two miles from Oxford, but the need for it was so little imperative that the question of £50 an acre more or less might make all the difference. It was a question of cost; indeed, upon this very point of its advantages for recruiting purposes there was evidently a diversity of opinion, for the general officer sent down by the right hon. Gentleman to survey the district had himself recommended a place near Woodstock in preference to Oxford; and if they were to look at the military dépôts generally, they would find that their selection did not depend upon the considerations which the right hon. Gentleman insisted upon in the case of Oxford. The question was not the training of 250 recruits at Ballingdon, but those recruits would resort to the town as a matter of course when off duty; for there must necessarily be at times large numbers of recruits, and in the train of the soldiers that peculiar element of population which, say what they might, was always to be found in the neighbourhood of garrisons. It seemed to him idle to say that the fact of the station being two miles from town made a great difference. The moment the men were off duty they would direct their steps towards the large town of Oxford, and towards those parts of it to which Militia found their way. The right hon. Gentleman told them what a noble Lord said about the Military Manœuvres, and the way in which the soldiers behaved when they were in strict discipline; but that was entirely irrelevant to the conduct of the recruits who were to be brought into this dépôt. One of the military reasons given for the selection of Oxford was, that it was the only city with a large population in the brigade sub-district, and offered, for that reason, the best recruiting district. He did not deny that it offered these facilities; but the military authorities did not think that of such paramount importance as to prevent them from mentioning High Wycombe and Woodstock as appropriate places for a military centre. It was said that Oxford was the headquarters of the Oxford Militia. That was one of the very things of which the deputation to the Secretary of State for War complained. It interfered most materially with the discipline of the University, and therefore they complained of the attempt to make Oxford a military centre. Another reason for this selection was, that Oxford was historically connected with the 52nd Regiment. There was not a more gallant regiment in the service than the 52nd; but he had looked over the history of that regiment, written by one of the old chaplains, and he was not able to find a single particular in which it was connected with Oxford. The 52nd Regiment, whose distinctions were emblazoned on its banners, had obtained all its honours without ever being brought into connection with Oxford. He was not saying that it was not desirable for a regiment to have an historical connection with a particular city, but they were in this case also bringing a Buckinghamshire regiment into Oxford, and Buckinghamshire had as much right to have its local interests and connection considered as any other place. No doubt Oxford had considerable advantages in the matter of railway communication. There were many other places, however, which had the same advantages, and his experience in going to Oxford led him to say that it was not one of the best places in the kingdom so far as railway accommodation was concerned. Didcot Junction was an unpleasant association in travelling to Oxford, and High Wycombe would have been practically almost as convenient. Was it unreasonable that the University, having found the evils connected with the Militia, should apprehend similar difficulties from this dépôt being in the immediate neighbourhood of Oxford? The right hon. Gentleman had told them that the question was still open, and that a site had not yet been purchased—a few pounds might make the difference. He did not know how many pounds it would require to make the Chancellor of the Exchequer put his veto on this purchase, but the memorial which had been addressed to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War demanded the greatest attention. It represented practically the whole of the teaching power of the University. Many who were not able to sign it from being absent had expressed their readiness to do so, and it contained the names of 24 University Professors, and 112 tutors and lecturers in the Colleges and halls. The right hon. Gentleman said that some of the heads of houses had not signed it; but it did not profess to come from them, but only from the Professors, tutors, and lecturers engaged in the practical work of education. It was signed, among others by Dr. Pusey, Mr. Jowett, the Master of Balliol, and Dr. Heurtley, the Margaret Professor of Divinity; and what object could they have but the moral benefit of the University? With respect to the town, there were, he would not say sordid, but money considerations to be taken into account. He thought that they had been falsely taken into

against the establishment of a Military Centre at Oxford.

Mr. HENLEY said, he had no doubt that it would be an uncommonly good thing for the City of Oxford, if the proposals of the Government were carried out, because it would cause a good deal of money to be spent there; it would also be a very good thing for his part of the country, because it would afford an excellent market for their fresh milk, butter and other produce; and besides that it would no doubt give to those living in the neighbourhood many very pleasant acquaintances. Again, the number of roads and railways which converged at Oxford, pointed it out as a situation having many advantages. On the other hand, there was a very peculiar body there—a vast number of persons under pupilage and education; and he had never known any subject on which there had been such a general assent among those who were concerned for the discipline of the University—nor anything like such a universal feeling of apprehension as existed on this matter. It was not easy for persons who were not responsible for the discipline of such a body as that, to judge whether those apprehensions were well or ill founded; he did not pretend to give an opinion on that point; but it would be a great national misfortune if the discipline of the University were interfered with. The proposal therefore was a matter of speculation; and the Government were taking the responsibility on themselves if evil consequences should result.

The House divided:—Ayes 134; Noes 90; Majority 44.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," again proposed.

CHINESE COOLIE TRADE.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD, in rising to call the attention of the House to the Chinese Coolie Trade, remarked that, although the forms of the House prevented his moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice, he should proceed with his Motion, because the discussion would do good. The mortality on board the coolie vessels was dreadful—the average being 7 per cent, while in some it ranged from 20 to 30 per cent, most of the deaths being caused by suffocation. The following were instances of the fearful mortality which he had stated:—In the Fille de Grenada, 83 died out of 253; in the America, 114 out of 690; in the Antares, 82 out of 263; in the Louis Cornetore, 192 out of 739; in the Rosalie, 61 out of 456; and in the Onrust, 45 out of 453. Those statistics were partly furnished by our Consul at Callao, and partly taken from a Peruvian newspaper. The coolies, who were kidnapped and inveigled to the port of embarkation, at Macao, were there placed in barracoons under a strong guard. Thence they were taken in boats, still closely guarded, to the ships in waiting to receive them. On their arrival on board, they were battened down under the hatches in such numbers that they were almost suffocated from the want of air and the horrible stench that ensued. They were only allowed on deck once a-day in squads of 30, while loaded cannon were kept constantly pointed at the place of their confinement. On several occasions, maddened by their sufferings, they rose and murdered the captains or officers placed over them. In one instance, a ship, the Dolores Ugarte, with 600 coolies on board had run short of water, and they could only procure it by buying it at the rate of a dollar a cup from the sailors. The result was, that out of the 600, 207 died, 18 jumped overboard, while 50 were landed at Honolulu in almost a dying state. The same vessel, having changed her name to the San Juan, again set out for Macao, under the Peruvian flag, and took fire; but the coolies were left battened down below the hatches, and out of 600, all but 50 were burnt. Having referred to the Correspondence in the Library, he found no less than four cases in which coolies had risen and murdered the crews of the vessels, and those were all British ships, because 15 years ago four-fifths of the tonnage employed in this traffic was British, but now not one British ship was concerned in it. Of the cases which occurred on board Peruvian and other ships he had no statistics. Last year a Peruvian vessel had been forced by stress of weather into Yokohama, and a coolie jumped ashore, and claimed the protection of the Japanese authorities; but he was sent back. The matter had, how-remarkable that the Heads of Houses, who were especially responsible for the discipline of the University, did not sign the memorial to the right hon. Gentleman. Was the House, he asked, about to say that there should not be a military centre in any town? Well, if they were, they ought to go back upon the policy they had adopted up to the present time, and undo all they had done in that direction. Similar apprehensions were entertained by the University with regard to the original construction of the railroad to Oxford, and afterwards to the establishment of the Great Western Railway works, but such fears were unfounded; and he hoped the House would not, by agreeing to the Motion, place in antagonism the University and the town, between which agreeable relations now existed.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, it was clear that Oxford was the first place for education in the world. No man had a higher attachment to the Army than himself; but he believed that the presence of a large military body brought with it some accompaniments that were not desirable, and he confessed that it might be injurious to the moral character of the University to have a military centre near the city. Men of high position had told him they refused to send their sons to Cambridge on account of the vicinity of Newmarket, and he feared that were Oxford injured in a moral point of view the same objection would apply to it. He believed that there was no military reason why Oxford should be selected; on the contrary, there were reasons against the selection of this special locality.

MR. BARNETT said, he should not vote for the Motion. With regard to Woodstock, he was not aware till a few days ago that any idea existed of establishing a military dépôt in that neighbourhood; but he thought it would suit admirably. He was not authorized by the Duke of Marlborough to express his opinion on the subject; but he had heard his Grace express an opinion like his own, that the apprehensions of the University were much exaggerated. Bulington was some distance from the town, and the officers would be men of some standing.

SIR HENRY STORKS denied that there was any intention of introducing a body of troops into Oxford; on the contrary, the town would actually be relieved of the periodical assembling of the Militia, who, instead of being trained and billeted in Oxford, would be removed to the dépôt two miles distant. The railway accommodation of Oxford was superior to that of Wycombe, and so far from the question being still open, it was only a matter of site, to be governed by price and sanitary and other considerations. He could not think that this dépôt would be dangerous to the undergraduates of the University. The hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Herbert) had served in a very distinguished regiment, not long indeed, but long enough to know the character of the officers and men, and he was surprised that the hon. Gentleman should repeatedly prefer grave charges against the Army. Indeed, he thought the hon. Member would not dare to repeat in his own mess-room what he had just stated in the House of Commons.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT thought he had always guarded himself against such an imputation. He had spoken with severity of the system, and the system alone, not of the Army, for which he entertained respect and affection.

SIR HENRY STORKS regarded this as a distinction without a difference. He maintained that the system was good, and that the officers and privates were highly honourable men, who would bear comparison with any other class; and he repudiated entirely the charges which the hon. Member had made against the Army.

MR. T. HUGHES said, he had yet to learn when the placing of a military centre in the City of Oxford was sanctioned by the House. He wished to offer one or two observations. It was necessary that some of the dust which had been cast into the eyes of hon. Members should be blown away. ["Divide."] He had one or two remarks to make, and he would not detain the House long. The noise arose from hon. Gentlemen about the doorway, who probably knew little about, and were not members of, the University. As to the suggested comparison of University discipline to that of the Army, though both good in their place, their nature was quite distinct as no one knew better than the hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford. He maintained that the heads of houses at the University were to Macao the evil was diminishing. The statistics furnished by our Consuls in Peru and Cuba showed that 25,000 Chinese were annually sold into slavery in those countries, and the number would increase, for Cuba, in anticipation of the abolition of slavery had imported largely, and a proposal had just been submitted to the Peruvian Parliament that a grant of public money should be made for the increased importation of coolie labour. His hostility to the emigration of Chinese was confined to this emigration, under contract from Macao, and was not directed against the emigration, as it was carried on from China to Singapore, Australia, and the United States—that was when the Chinese go without solicitation, and pay their own passage. There was a large and constant flow of emigration from China to the United States, but the difference between the nature of this emigration and that of which he complained was shown by the fact that in the vessels employed for this service there had never been a single rising of Chinese, and the mortality was no greater than it was on land. It sometimes happened that a few Chinese returned to their own country, and the accounts they gave of the horrors of slavery were a main cause of the hostility which existed to foreigners, and the dislike to their settling in the interior of China for the purposes of trade. He, however, urged the adoption of his proposal on higher grounds than those of self-interest—namely in the interests of humanity. He asserted that the traffic in question was slavery in every stage of its progress—in the kidnapping—in the voyage—in the life of slavery to which they were doomed. It was simply a traffic in human flesh, maintained to enrich the corrupt officials and demoralized population of a petty settlement—Macao. He trusted the Government would not look with indifference upon the fact that 25,000 individuals—a number which would soon reach 50,000—were being annually sold into slavery in defiance of the protest of their own Government, whom one word of encouragement from us would embolden to put a stop to such an outrage. Slavery once stirred the heart of the people of this country, and if they seemed indifferent to it now it was only because they were under the impression that, owing to the exertions of their ancestors, the hateful institution had been extinguished. When they realized the fact that slavery existed in all its most hideous features, he had no doubt the people would be moved by the same generous impulses as their ancestors had been, and would appear in their old characters as the most uncompromising foes of slavery. It would be no answer to his proposal to say it could not be effectual if adopted. If Her Majesty's Government knew of any more effectual method that would attain the end he had in view let them propose it. He only asked them to try and put a stop to horrors, to which it would be difficult to find a parallel in the most barbarous ages. Really when he thought of this coolie traffic, he was reminded of the words Lord Brougham used to stigmatize a great political crime. Referring to the partition of Poland, Lord Brougham said—"It vexes the faith of pious men to witness scenes like these, and not see the flames of Heaven descend to smite the impious and guilty actors." He thought this language equally applicable to the crimes he had described.

Mr. STEPHEN CAVE said, he was glad that that the hon. Member for Gravesend (Sir Charles Wingfield) had not fallen into the error committed by some persons, of confounding the Slave Trade from Macao to Cuba with emigration from Hong Kong to the British West Indies. It had often been erroneously assumed that Chinese emigration to the British West Indies had been attended by the same abuses as those by which the emigration from the Portuguese port of Macao to Cuba and Peru had been disgraced. An assumption more unjust to the Colonies was never made. What were the facts? In 1859, the Allied Commissioners of whom Sir Harry Parkes represented this country, arranged with the Chinese Government the terms under which coolies might be engaged for the British Colonies, and a Government agent was sent to China to commence operations. At that time a strong feeling existed in China against the Macao emigration, and it was thought probable that a properly conducted British agency would be the means of stopping, at least to some extent, the unlawful practices at Macao. The British agent opened a dépôt at Hong Kong, under such regulations as to place the character of his proceedings beyond dispute. The success of his measures was complete. While the authorities were proceeding with the utmost severity against kidnappers, the English depôt was crowded with voluntary applications for emigration. The contract entered into with the Chinese provided for a free passage to the West Indies in British emigrant vessels under the provisions of the Passengers Act; the protection of the immigrant by the Colonial laws, as confirmed by the Secretary of State, and carried out under the supervision of Government officials; all disputes between employer and labourer being settled before the stipendiary magistrate, who was appointed by the Crown; a service of five years' agricultural labour, payment of money wages at the rate prevailing in the colony; and, in addition, house, garden-ground, and medical attendance during the term of service. In order that the emigrant might be induced to take his family with him, the females entered into no obligation except to reside on the estate; and they were to be supplied, free of cost, with suitable lodging, medicine, and hospital accommodation when necessary. At the close of their five years' service, the emigrants were free to choose their mode of life. Some entered into new indentures, receiving a large bounty; others preferred to make their own terms with employers for independent service on the estates; others engaged in retail trade, or cultivated provision grounds, or pursued any handicraft they might have been accustomed to in China; all enjoying as much real freedom and protection as they could have in England. Under this system emigration was carried on up to 1866, with the concurrence of all classes, and notably of a German missionary, who, after a voyage to Demerara and Trinidad, returned to China fully convinced of the advantage the Chinese would gain by emigrating to those Colonies. About this time, however, Sir Rutherford Alcock entered into a Convention with China, containing new and onerous conditions, the practical effect of which was to put a stop to the emigration to British Colonies. On the other hand, it had thrown no obstacle in the way of emigration from Macao, for since the closing of the British agency there had been an increased activity at that port, and emigrants were still engaged in different parts of China, carried to Macao, and practically sold into slavery. With reference to the subject of the back passage, and as a distinguishing mark between the two different races, it must always be remembered, that wherever the Chinese went, he went as a colonist, married and settled in his new home, while the practice of the Indian coolie, as a rule, was to return to his native land. The British West India Colonies urgently needed labour, and offered advantages to the Chinese at least equal to any other countries—advantages secured to the emigrant on the good faith of the British Government, and for that reason, he trusted there was a prospect of the Convention being modified so as to allow the emigration to be resumed. The British Colonists, moreover, had long felt it a great hardship and injustice, that, while disposed to enter into and fulfil proper engagements, they had been debarred from obtaining labourers from this source, at the same time that other countries were procuring thousands every year, either by evading the terms of the Convention, or entering into engagements which they did not intend to carry out. This was one point upon which he hoped they should have an expression of opinion from the noble Lord. What the other was he would proceed briefly to state. The slave trade Blue Books recently issued contained a despatch from Lord Granville to Mr. Layard, the British Ambassador at Madrid, dated the 10th of April, 1871, referring to suggestions for the introduction of coolies into Cuba from British India. It stated that the Government—

“Can only consider a scheme for the introduction of British immigrants, when slavery is absolutely abolished in that island, and then only under the protection of a Treaty.”

This pointed to the possibility of a Convention with Spain similar to those made, unfortunately, as he (Mr. Stephen Cave) thought, with the French and Dutch. The official Correspondence of 1872 had not yet been distributed, and he should like to know whether any negotiations to that end had been commenced, or whether the question had advanced at all since Lord Granville's despatch written two years ago. Now, the main objection to such a plan was that when once landed the immigrants were beyond the protection of this country. In our West India Colonies, the Government had thought the most stringent regulations necessary for the protection of the people, and a direct supervision over every detail of the system. But none such were possible in Cuba. The immigrants to British Colonies were conveyed in emigrant ships under the provisions of the Passenger Acts; they lived under colonial laws securing their rights and liberty, laws approved by the Secretary of State and carried out by Government officials. Questions between them and their employers were determined by magistrates appointed by the Crown and sent out from England. Contracts and renewals of contracts were verified by the Immigration Agent General, who had power to prosecute employers and to act in every way for the protection of the immigrant. Their houses were to be of a specified character, the hospitals were under Government medical Inspectors, and the estate doctors were henceforward to be Government officers too. There might be, of course, from time to time cases of fraud and oppression, but he would venture to say not more frequently than in this country. Such regulations would be still more necessary in Cuba, where the planters had been accustomed to deal with slaves; but, evidently, the British Government could not enforce such a system there. The case of Réunion showed that the British Consul would be unable to act as an efficient check, and no security would exist for the proper treatment of the immigrants, or for the fulfilment of the contracts. The sufferings of the Chinese in Cuba, nominally free immigrants, but practically slaves, afforded a strong argument against placing British subjects in a similar position. He did not wish to say anything harsh of Spain, especially in her present difficulties; but her extreme negligence, to say the least, in carrying out her various Treaty engagements respecting the slave trade, showed that she was not yet to be trusted in these matters, and he should be glad to hear that the idea of sanctioning emigration from British India to the Spanish colonies, if ever seriously entertained, had been finally abandoned.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. MAGNIAC said, he thought the circumstances of the coolie trade were such that anyone who had any knowledge on the subject ought to address the House. He concurred in the utility of a Convention with the Spanish Government, and he trusted a strong opinion would be expressed by the House against the emigration from British India of any of our fellow subjects there, as there were in India thousands of square miles of territory which required labour. He entirely endorsed all that the right hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen Cave) had said on this subject. The noble Lord the late Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had only withdrawn his prohibition against the coolie traffic at Hong Kong on the conclusion of a Convention by which Chinese labourers had been carefully provided for under a system of rules and regulations which had been strictly and uniformly adhered to, and from information he had received, he could say that no complaint had ever been made with regard to any of the vessels on which they had been carried. The coolies had returned with considerable sums of money, having received ample wages for their labour. The hon. Member for Gravesend (Sir Charles Wingfield) had referred to the Convention proposed to ourselves and other foreign nations by China, but it was obviously never intended by China to be carried out. The edict was in force only on paper, and hence the state of things in Macao which he had so graphically described, and which there was no doubt was conducted as cruelly and horribly as it possibly could be. The hon. Member had said that our conduct in the past with regard to China was not calculated to inspire confidence on the general subject of the prohibition of slavery. [SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD must protest against the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Magniac) putting words in his mouth which he had never uttered.] He (Mr. Magniac) could only say that he had taken down the hon. Member's words and was prepared to maintain that our conduct in regard to China had been particularly forbearing and worthy of being followed by other nations. The position of Hong Kong itself was a proof of this. At the present moment, no charge in regard to the improper shipment or emigration of coolies could be brought against anyone connected with Hong Kong. On the other hand, he was happy to say that a strong community of feeling was growing up between those who resided at Hong Kong and the natives of China. The hon. Member very much overrated the goodwill of the Chinese Government in this matter. That Government was content to sit by, and see what occurred under their noses without any interference, and a reason for that was to be found in the fact that the Government at Peking looked to the governors of the various provinces only for a certain amount of tribute, and if that was forthcoming, the provincial governors were allowed to govern as they pleased. The Chinese officials were the worst paid in the world and, as a consequence, they made their gains as they could, and in that might be found the simple explanation of what occurred at Macao. The Chinese Government might put a stop to these proceedings to-morrow if they chose to carry out their own laws. Nothing was more beautiful than Chinese law on paper, but in practice nothing could be less effective. It was not carried out. The hon. Member recommended that we should pursue a vigorous course; but a vigorous course was too often a dangerous course, and in this case it might result in creating greater evils than those which we now sought to redress. The only way to deal properly with this horrible trade was to treat China as an independent nation, to give her good example, to support her where we could do so justly, and to remonstrate with her when her conduct might call for remonstrance.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, that his hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Magniac) who had just sat down seemed to intimate that though these proceedings were very horrible, there was nobody to blame for them. His hon. Friend was, no doubt, a great authority; but an authority second to none in this country had shown in a letter to The Times, under the signature of "Veritas," that he was of a very different opinion, when he asked—

"Why had all these horrors of kidnapping and slavery been allowed to continue year after year without any effort being made by civilized States to put an end to them? What was done by the Spanish buccaners 200 years ago had been revived in China without interference. The United States alone, of all civilized countries, had interfered in the cause of humanity by passing an Act for the suppression of this new slavery."

The writer showed that much might be done by this country if they would earnestly take the work in hand. Last year he himself called attention to this subject, and one of the statements which he then made was that gambling houses were permitted to exist in the British Colony of Hong Kong, that the Chinese, having lost in those houses everything that belonged to them, finally staked their persons, and that was one of the ways by which this horrible traffic was prolonged. He was sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) was not now in his place, as he was happy to acknowledge that within the last 12 months Lord Kimberley had taken steps to put down that evil, and his principal object in rising was to thank the noble Lord and his right hon. Friend for what had been done. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen Cave) seemed to object to our paying the passage home of these coolies; but he had answered the objection himself, and shewn its fallacy, in the statement he afterwards made, that the Chinese were invariably colonizers, and in that event would be disposed to continue where they were. He certainly thought it was only justice that the return passage should be paid.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he had listened to the hon. Member for Gravesend (Sir Charles Wingfield) with some surprise and perplexity, because throughout the whole of his speech there ran a vein of accusation, not only against the present Government, but against all Governments, for having been careless and indifferent as to the horrors of slavery. The hon. Member drew a distinction between this country and the United States very much to our disadvantage; but he must have forgotten that this very year we were incurring great pecuniary, and possibly moral, sacrifices in carrying out the mission to Zanzibar, which had for its object the suppression of the slave trade on the East Coast of Africa. If he interpreted the hon. Member's speech aright, the conclusion which he would have Parliament and the country come to was nothing less than a declaration of war against Portugal. The hon. Member had brought various accusations against former Governments in respect of the Chinese Coolie traffic.

But what were the facts? The question of the coolie traffic had attracted the attention of British Governments since 1853, and ever since they had endeavoured with various success to mitigate its horrors. But before going into the point he would join issue with the hon. Member and say that emigration and immigration of coolies, properly conducted, was not slave trade. He would recall to the House what had been done since 1853. The British Government had acted consistently both alone and in concert with other Powers for the defence of humanity in this particular question. Briefly mentioned, the results of its labours were as follows:—First, the Chinese Passenger Act of 1855; then the emigration system established in 1860; thirdly, the obtaining the assent of the Chinese Government to proper regulations in the Treaty of Tien Tsin; and fourthly, prohibiting Hong Kong from being a dépôt for emigration to any but British Colonies, and in any but British ships. The statements made with regard to the horrors perpetrated on board the two ships mentioned by the hon. Member were quite correct. But when the case of one of these ships, the Don Juan, formerly called Dolores Ugarte, was brought to the notice of Her Majesty's Government, Lord Granville wrote a despatch to Mr. Doria, in Portugal, in such emphatic terms, as conclusively proved that there was no indifference on his part to the horrors perpetrated on board that ship. He (Viscount Enfield) regretted to say that the Portuguese Government thought it their duty not only to defend themselves, but inferentially to attack the Hong Kong Government and our emigration regulations. But we had a complete refutation of these accusations in a despatch of Sir Richard MacDonnell, dated January 8, 1872. The only drawback to the system was, that the immigrants suffered from violence on the part of loafers, who regarded the importation of such industrious competitors with jealousy. Sir Charles Murdoch also confirmed the report that the system had much improved under the Governor of Macao, Admiral da Souza. Changes had been made between 1859 and 1866 with regard to the regulations affecting Hong Kong, and the remarks of the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Magnia) speaking as he did from personal acquaintance, must have been listened to with satisfaction. Great care was now taken to prevent abuses, no native recruiting was allowed, the dépôts were under strict surveillance, the emigrant ships were examined as regards seaworthiness, the emigrants were questioned as to their willingness to emigrate, their destination and conditions of service, and many of them returned home, having saved money. The House should know the character of these men. The writer of a private letter from Hong Kong said:—

"The greater part of the men obtained are either men of indifferent character, more or less at variance with the local authorities, who have been in prison or quarrelled with their parents, or are given to drink, and of extreme stupidity. The majority are boatmen, about a third being agriculturists, or men employed on shore. These men are either deceived by delusive promises, by threats of being split on for some real or fancied offence against the authorities, or are induced by a continued round of dissipation and drink to promise anything. Many sell themselves to pay their gambling debts. The agents, who are natives, run great risks, for if found out by the authorities they get but a short shrift and a long rope."

The hon. Member for Gravesend seemed to think we had refused to assist the Chinese Government. On the contrary, Sir Brooke Robertson, our Consul General at Canton, had acted with energy. He had observed large bodies of coolies leaving Canton every morning by steamers under British flag for Macao. He arranged with the Viceroy to appoint officers to examine all coolie passengers, and invited all who did not wish to go to Macao to step out and say so. On the first morning, 30 availed themselves of the privilege, next day nine, and others landed on subsequent occasions. That happened last year. Sir Brooke Robertson had again acted vigorously this year. About the beginning of March several junks with Europeans on board were reported on the coast opposite the Island of Hainan, and the Viceroy of Canton, at the recommendation of Her Majesty's Consul, sent a gunboat with orders to bring them to Canton. Three were captured; the Chinese crews were delivered up to the local authorities, but the European captured claimed to be a Portuguese, and a resident proprietor at Macao. The Viceroy accordingly proposed communicating with the Portuguese Government respecting him. In the end of March the Viceroy was going to despatch two more gunboats to sweep the coast for Macao kidnappers, of whom it was stated there were above 20 vessels fitted out for that purpose. The hon. Member for Gravesend had also referred to the case of the Maria Luz. That was a Peruvian ship, with 200 coolies, and it was driven by stress of weather into Yokohama in July last. One coolie, who had jumped overboard, was taken on board Her Majesty's ship Iron Duke and handed over to the Japanese authorities; but he was sent back to the Maria Luz, beaten, and had his pigtail cut off. Mr. Watson, the British Secretary of Legation, on hearing of this, paid a visit to the vessel, and, ascertaining that he and other coolies were detained against their will, brought the matter under the notice of the Japanese authorities. After inquiry, the coolies were liberated and sent back to China, and the Chinese Government had thanked Mr. Wade for the friendly intervention of the British authorities on behalf of the coolies. The questions arising between the Portuguese and Chinese had created some difficulty, but the good offices of Sir Brooke Robertson had prevented any serious collision between the two countries. The fact was, that the Portuguese claimed jurisdiction over Macao by right of conquest; but the Chinese denied it. Some Portuguese adventurers obtained a footing there in 1516, and in 1557 permission was granted to the Portuguese to erect storehouses. In 1582 a ground rent was stipulated for of about £166, so it seemed clear that Macao was not ceded to the Portuguese. A private letter received from Canton stated that—

"Mutual concessions might lead to Portugal being admitted as a Treaty Power, and with a Minister of that nation at Peking, much might be done to ameliorate the condition of the coolies and rectify abuses."

The United States had lately suggested united action on the part of America and Great Britain, and a reply had been made in the sense that we advocated coolie emigration when properly conducted as beneficial to the coolies themselves and to the countries in which they were employed; that all emigration under contract to places not within Her Majesty's dominions was strictly forbidden from Hong Kong; that we were fully alive to the evils of emigration as practised at Macao, and were willing to co-operate with the Governments of other countries with a view to put a stop to those abuses. The House would probably wish to know what assurance he could give as to the future action of Her Majesty's Government in that matter. It would be improper for him to indulge in any language savouring of menace towards Portugal; but anyone who carefully and dispassionately considered all that different Governments of this country had done in reference to that subject, and how they had urged the matter upon the attention of the Chinese, the Portuguese, and other Governments, would recognize the anxiety they had shown for the suppression of that coolie emigration, conducted in so lamentable a manner as it was from Macao to Cuba. They would continue to urge their representations, for they could not be insensible to the horrors of that traffic which had been brought under their notice. He hoped the House would believe that Lord Granville, faithful to the traditions he had inherited from Lord Palmerston, was as keenly alive as the hon. Member for Gravesend himself to those evils, and would do all in his power by friendly communication with other Governments which had a voice in the matter to put a stop to them. In conclusion he (Viscount Enfield) thought that we might look with honest pride upon the exertions which had been made by the present and by past English Governments in the interests of humanity and justice.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he believed that the statements of the hon. Member for Gravesend (Sir Charles Wingfield) in respect to the Chinese coolie traffic were not at all exaggerated—a traffic more cruel than any carried on in slaves from the Coast of Africa. These Chinese coolies were a civilized and intelligent race. They were much more sensitive than the poor negroes deported from Africa, and there was no doubt they were deceived and entrapped into those contracts. He therefore thought we had a right to complain on this occasion of the conduct of the Portuguese Government, and he hoped that some representations of a much more stringent character than any that had hitherto been employed would be made by Lord Granville upon the matter.

MR. EASTWICK said, he regretted that the question of the the emigration of coolies from Hong Kong had been introduced into the debate. The Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Gravesend referred to the emigration from Macao, and it was a pity that the discussion had deviated from that point and thus had given occasion to some rather severe remarks by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Magniac), and the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs on his hon. Friend the Mover of the Resolution. It was true that we might have confidence that coolie emigration from our ports and under the supervision of British officers would be fairly and justly managed. At the same time the Report of the Commissioners sent to British Guiana, stating that the planters, having made a dear bargain with regard to Chinese immigrants, had tried to extricate themselves in not the most creditable manner, showed that even in our own colonies, with all the care displayed by the Government, questionable proceedings occurred, and that unremitting vigilance was necessary. He thought, too, that the Chinese Government had shown that they were not indifferent in regard to the matter of Chinese emigration by having expressed to Mr. Wade their thanks for the course taken by Mr. Watson, our Chargé d'Affaires in Japan, with reference to the coolie traffic. If that gentleman was able to do so much to put down this abominable traffic, as far as the Japanese Government were concerned, he should like to know why we did not exert ourselves with equal success to interfere with it at the Cape of Good Hope. As to Spain and Portugal, the latter an old ally, and with whom any hostile feeling was undesirable, he was bound to say their conduct was reprehensible in the highest degree. The noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs very properly used the diplomatic expressions of courtesy which must be used by those employed in a responsible position towards Foreign Powers; but he (Mr. Eastwick), as an independent Member, could imagine nothing worse than their conduct. Ever since the debate of February 16th last year he had been on the watch for some indication that this revival of the slave trade—this hateful Chinese coolie traffic from Macao for the benefit of the Spanish and South American Governments—was on the wane. But he confessed that so far from discovering any reason to hope that that would be the case, he had, on the contrary, seen much to confirm him in the belief that unless some such course as that now recommended was taken, the traffic would increase. Some persons might, perhaps, derive comfort from the fact that negro slavery had just been extinguished in one of the Spanish Antilles, Porto Rico, and bore the appearance of giving way in Cuba, which had for so many years been its stronghold. Porto Rico, indeed, was a remarkable exception to the other Spanish Colonies, for there slavery had been abolished, not only with the assent of the Deputies, but even on their petition; but the circumstances of that island were so exceptional that no argument could be derived from what had been done there. Porto Rico had a population of 700,000 people on an area of 4,000 square miles, and but a seventh of that number had been slaves, and Consul Bidwell said that—

"Slavery would not there, as in other countries, be succeeded by any sort of forced labour, the existing population being ample for the work it has to do, and there being a unanimous feeling of opposition to any immigration of labourers—whether Chinese coolies, or negroes."

Large quantities of sugar and tobacco were produced, and there was a surplus revenue, which, he was sorry to say, was taken by Spain to carry on the war in Cuba. In the latter Island the Governor and planters, according to the Report of a Committee reprinted in the Diario a Havana paper of October 20, 1871, stated that since the 3rd of June, 1847, 109,092 Chinese coolies had been introduced into Cuba, not one of whom had returned. The cost of their introduction was $340 each, or something like $37,000,000 in the aggregate. The Governor of Cuba argued that the intelligent proprietors and merchants of Cuba would not have laid out a sum so vast inconsiderately, and that, therefore, Asiatic colonization must be a wise measure. In his eyes the wisdom of the system was further demonstrated by the arrival during the last and present year at Havana of 2,715 Chinese, who were sold for $400 each, "notwithstanding the unhappy state of the island." Lastly, he brought, as a conclusive argument as to the fitness of this state of things, the fact that an association of rich planters had been formed with a capital of $1,000,000, "for the sole object of importing Chinese labourers exclusively for their own estates." The Report then went on to say—

"The insurrection is expiring. The Government should therefore prepare itself by profound and thoughtful study and meditation on the past and present, for the duty of setting the country in the way of material and moral progress. The scarcity of labour will be greater than ever, because of the great number of men who have perished, and the natural distrust of employing those—that is the slaves—who have been employed in the insurrection. It is necessary then to have recourse to measures already well known and accepted, and the resolution, therefore, is come to that Asiatic immigration—that is, the Coolie trade—is useful and of absolute necessity, and must be continued and increased.

And this more especially, because—

"Whilst free labour can find in manufacturing and mercantile pursuits, a comfortable recompense, it is not likely that it would engage in the rude and toilsome tasks of agriculture for the benefit of a third party."

Now, he asked, what hope could be entertained of the mitigation of the coolie traffic by the Spaniards, when its necessity was logically reasoned out, and its existence shown to be in the eyes of the Governor and the ruling class in Cuba essential not only to material but moral progress. In the same way the Portuguese Government of Macao, in spite of the notorious atrocities committed on board the Dolores Ugarte, and other slavers, coolly invited Mr. Baily, the United States Consul, to come over and see with his own eyes the perfection of the emigration system of that place. He did this in reply to such remonstrances as the following on the part of the Consul:—

"May I be so bold as to ask that your Excellency will permit me to officially inform my Government that you will interpose your authority to prevent that infamous ship having an opportunity to repeat the horrors of her last passage to Callao, and again flout her crimes in the face of the world, to the scandal of Christian civilization."

The reply was—

"Come and verify with your own eyes how the acts of emigration take place. You would certainly be convinced that in no part of China is this proceeded with with more exemplary regularity in objects of such high common interest."

The vessel was allowed to go forth, and 600 human beings were trampled to death, burnt, or drowned. After that, he asked what was the use of appealing to the Spanish or the Portuguese. The diplomatic correspondence with such a people, on such a subject, was a solemn farce. What further proof was required of the futility of such appeals? But if such proof were asked, they had only to turn to Consul Hutchinson's Report on Peru for 1871-2. He said that such advertisements as the following were common in the journals of Callao:—

"To be sold for what he cost, a young Chinese, healthy, strong, and intelligent in his profession of carpenter. Whoever wants such may apply at the Calle de Lima, No. 69, bringing with him 450 dollars."

The Consul added—

"It occasionally happens that Chinese mutiny on the passage, although this is said to be a voluntary emigration. Whilst their engagements are accredited to be from five to eight years, I cannot ascertain that a shipment of any back to their own country has ever been made."

Well, it was the fact that in 1862, for example, 713 died on the passage out of 1,716, that is, more than 40 per cent. When to this we added the brandings of the unfortunate coolies with hot irons like cattle, and the burning of them alive by the populace of Peru, when they were goaded by their oppressors into some crime, he must say he was astonished at the forbearance of the Foreign Office in dealing with such a state of things. He was astonished that Lord Granville did not reply with an indignant rebuke to that large Cuban proprietor, Senor Racy, who proposed to import from British India three coolies, to make up for each one of the emancipated negroes, whom since the insurrection the Cubans could no longer trust in their barracoons. He was inclined to exclaim, "Oh! for one day of the more vigorous policy of Lord Palmerston," and to wish that we had no more of diplomatic correspondence with these slave-dealing Governments. There was a better alternative, and that was the course proposed by his hon. Friend, which, he hoped, would be generally supported, and that the Chinese Government would be enabled, with our assistance to establish an emigration office of its own, and put an end for ever to the deceptions and mock tribunals at Macao. He agreed with the right hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen Cave) that Lord Granville's despatch to Mr. Layard appeared to encourage the idea of importing coolies from British India; but in another despatch Lord Granville referred to the scheme as impracticable. Possibly one despatch was meant to be shown to the Spanish Government, and the other not. It was difficult to know what to do with Governments with which we wished to remain on good terms, and which yet were determined to carry on this traffic. We might, as indicated by the noble Lord, act in concert with the United States, which had shown a willingness to do anything they could to put down these nefarious practices. Influence might also be brought to bear on the Chinese Government at Pekin. The warmth shown by the hon. Member for Gravesend (Sir Charles Wingfield) in such a matter was only natural, and he thought the hon. Member's Motion had not deserved to be treated with quite the severity with which the noble Lord had treated it. It was only reasonable that philanthropic men should speak strongly upon such a question as this.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he was satisfied with the reply given by the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Viscount Enfield), and begged the Government not to slacken their efforts for putting an end to the hideous evils resulting from the kidnapping of Chinese, and from their transport to Spanish and South American possessions. Having considerable acquaintance with Macao, and with the great facilities for bringing thousands of Chinese coolies to that place by the numerous channels leading thereto from various parts of the mainland, and knowing the openings for corrupt commerce which existed at Macao, from the double system of government in that place between Chinese and Portuguese officers, he was afraid he could not hold out any hopes that the Government would be able entirely to prevent the kidnapping which was mainly carried on at that port. He trusted, however, that, in attempting to suppress it, they would not put an end to the free emigration of Chinese. He had had considerable experience in the Straits of Malacca of the great value of Chinese labour, which not only benefited the Chinese who there emigrated yearly in thousands, but rescued fine and extensive tracts of country from the jungle which covered the Malay Peninsula. He suggested that the most effectual mode of putting a stop to the existing evils would be to encourage the free emigration of coolies to our Colonies, under a well-regulated system of transport, whereby both parties would be benefited; and to cheapen as far as possible, the cost of their conveyance, whereby the inducements for kidnappers to supply coolies under the present detestable system would be lessened, if not entirely removed. When once the coolies were landed in large numbers in our Colonies, they were so intelligent, and so ready to band themselves together in brotherhoods or trade unions, as to be quite able to take care of, and to provide for, themselves.

METROPOLIS—NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GREGORY, in rising to call attention to the delay in the construction of the New Courts of Justice, and to move, "That such delay is prejudicial to the administration of the Law and to improvement in procedure," said, the question was of the first importance in the administration of the law, and was one that had excited the attention of that House, from time to time, from 1822 to the present time. That attention, gradually increasing, led to the appointment of a Committee upon the subject, upon the motion of Sir Thomas Wild. Nothing more was done until 1859, when a Royal Commission sat upon the subject, and reported upon it, recommending the purchase of a site, and suggesting that the sum of £12,000,000 stock lying in the Court of Chancery arising from accumulations of interest upon investments made by the Court, of suitors' money which would otherwise have remained idle, should be appropriated to the construction of the New Courts. In accordance with the Reports of this Commission, Bills were introduced into Parliament for the purpose of carrying out these recommendations, but from various causes they did not become law until 1865, when Lord Clarendon passed one, providing the funds for the construction of the Courts as recommended by the Commissioners. The other providing for the construction of the Courts by means of a Royal Commission, and accordingly in 1865 another Commission was appointed to consider the requirements of the offices, what the nature of the buildings should be, and to decide upon the designs, and generally upon the construction. The Commission lost no time in setting to work. They certified that £1,500,000 would be sufficient, and proceeded to invite competition by different architects for the New Courts. They also proceeded to purchase the required land. When the designs came to be reduced to estimates, the sum which the Commission had stated to be the cost was very considerably exceeded, and the Government declined to carry out the designs proposed by the Commission. Thus matters remained from 1867 to 1869, when the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. W. H. Gregory), who was now no longer in the House, raised the question of the advisability of selecting a different site—namely, on the Thames Embankment. On that occasion, great surprise was excited by the Chancellor of the Exchequer suddenly proposing another site which had never been in any one's contemplation—the Howard Street site. A Bill was brought in by Mr. Layard to carry out that scheme; it was referred to a Select Committee, who, after hearing evidence on the question, reported in favour of the Carey Street site. In 1870, his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works produced a block-plan for the construction of the Courts, which was acceptable to the profession and to every gentleman who had taken an interest in the question; and it was hoped by all parties that the building would be proceeded with. At the beginning of the Session, he put a Question to his right hon. Friend on the subject, and from his answer he understood that, although considerable delay had occurred in the preparation of the plans and estimates connected with the block-plan, they had been completed, and it was expected that the building would be started in March last. What had been done since he was at a loss to know; but he understood that no contract had been accepted, nor was there any prospect of the work being proceeded with. What was the consequence of that state of things? In 1865, steps had been taken for the purchase of the necessary land, and the sum raised from the Suitors' Fund in the Court of Chancery, which might be stated at £800,000, had been expended between 1865 and 1867. So far as he knew, that money had been lying practically unproductive ever since, with the exception of a short period a year ago, when the concrete foundations of the Courts were being laid. Thus, during the last five years the interest had been lost, and taking it at a sum of £30,000 a-year, the loss on that head was not less than £150,000. But that was not all. By the provisions of the Act of 1865, the Government were bound to pay all the rates and taxes to which the houses which had been removed from the site were subject, and as those rates and taxes amounted to £9,000 a-year or more, making for the five years £45,000, a sum of about £200,000 had been substantially wasted. Any one at all acquainted with the subject could appreciate the inconveniences connected with the administration of justice, in consequence of there being one set of Courts at Westminster and another at Lincoln's Inn. He ventured to say, that the Bill now before Parliament relating to the administration of justice in the Superior Courts would be wholly useless until the New Courts were constructed, for there could be no fusion of law and equity so long as the Common Law Judges and the Equity Judges had no opportunity, by reason of the distance of the Common Law Courts from the Equity Courts, of communicating with each other. The price of labour and the cost of building, moreover, had increased and were likely to increase so that nothing could be gained by delay. He gave credit to the right hon. Gentleman for a sincere desire to carry out this great work, and he would certainly have the support of the House in withstanding any adverse pressure to which he might be subjected from other quarters. In conclusion, the hon. Member asked for a frank and full explanation of what had been done since 1870 towards completing the erection of the Courts; and moved the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, the land on this site had been bought seven years ago, at a cost of £800,000, and the loss of interest on that sum, together with the rates paid every year, amounted since then to little short of £250,000. Four years ago a Select Committee had reported in favour of the present site, and there was no reason why the building should not have been begun very soon afterwards. But these seven acres were left in a most neglected state. The grass was growing there a foot high, and you might suppose that, instead of being in the most valuable part of the Strand, the land was in Timbuctoo. He was also informed that owing to the rise in the price of labour the building would cost 15 per cent more than if it had been taken in hand at once. But a point of greater importance than the pecuniary loss was, that we should never get a proper fusion of law and equity until our Courts were brought under the same roof. Possibly, the babe unborn might practise in the New Courts, though he himself despaired of doing so; whereas, if due diligence had been used, they might now have been completed.

Mr. GOLDNEY remarked upon the loss to the suitors arising from delays which might, to a great extent, be avoided if the Courts were concentrated. It was estimated that the total amount of property in litigation was not far short of £200,000,000, and if each suit could be accelerated by one month, the gain to the suitors would be enormous.

Mr. HINDE PALMER hoped the discussion would urge on the work, but he could not entirely blame the Government for the delay, because the first scheme of the Commissioners was of the most extravagant description and would have cost at least £3,000,000. It could not be denied, however, that in all public works undertaken in this country there had not been a single building in which the delay had been so great. To look at the site one would almost say that the property had "got into Chancery."

Mr. AYRTON said, he was fully alive to the fact, that there had been very considerable delay in concentrating on some one spot, all the Courts and offices necessary for the administration of justice in the metropolis. That, however, was a grievance to which the public and the administrators of the law had been subject for centuries, and, as in other matters, the idea of re-construction had proceeded with extreme slowness. It was as difficult to deal with the material fabric of the Courts as with any alteration in the administration of justice in those Courts; and it was a singular fact, that Parliament was that year engaged in making arrangements not only for the building in which the Courts were to administer justice, but in re-constructing the entire basis on which justice was to be administered; for it appeared that the legal profession had been going on for several centuries with a system of jurisprudence that was now announced to be erroneous. The hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) proposed a Resolution, to the effect that since the Government would not create by enchantment New Courts of Justice, the administration of the law was likely to be thereby impeded. No doubt, these were matters of the deepest concern, but it was impossible to hold the First Commissioner of Works, or the present Government, or even the present Parliament, responsible for all the delays that had taken place since the moment when it had been determined to concentrate all the Courts in one building. The inconvenience was recognized when the first Royal Commission reported that a reform was necessary, and when an Act was passed to carry that Report into effect. The responsibility was, however, divided between a second Royal Commission, appointed in 1865, and the Treasury, which found it impossible to transact business properly with a body so dignified and numerous as the Commission. While the Treasury seemed to leave the business in the hands of the Commission, the Commission on the other hand, cast the onus of responsibility upon the Treasury; but what were the real facts of the case? The Act of 1865 prescribed that the Commissioners were to satisfy themselves, and to certify publicly and solemnly that the site and the building together would not cost more than £1,500,000. The Commissioners signed a certificate accordingly, that the land could be acquired for £750,000; and that the building could be constructed for a similar sum, the site between Carey Street and the Strand being regarded as the most appropriate. Upon that certificate, the Treasury directed the site to be obtained, and it was acquired. While the public and the Legislature, however, were under the impression that the duty prescribed by the Act was being performed, the Commissioners, by a gradual process which he need not further describe, found that it was expedient to carry out the provisions of the law by embarking in an expenditure of £1,453,000 for the site, and £1,650,000 for the building, with £147,000 for further miscellaneous expenses, making a total of £3,250,000.

Mr. Osborne Morgan

The House knew what "rough estimates" were, and there were some who talked about the site and buildings as being likely to cost £4,000,000 before the edifice was finished. These proceedings had been carried on without any sense of responsibility, and was it surprising that when the present Government came into office in 1868, and had to face these proposals, that they should pause in sanctioning such an expenditure, when the Commissioners had solemnly certified that the building and site would only cost £1,500,000, and when Parliament had required that the work should be accomplished for that sum? It was a solemn undertaking also, that all the expense of the new building should be borne by suitors, and that none should be charged on the Consolidated Fund; therefore, any further expenditure beyond that originally sanctioned by Parliament would have been a great injustice to the public, as well as to those who resorted to the Courts for redress, and it was the duty of the Government to take care of the interests both of suitors and the public. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, for that reason, proposed a new scheme of a less expensive character. It was examined and, for various reasons, Parliament thought it better to adhere to the old site. The discussion, however, had the effect of opening the eyes of the public to the fact that so large a scheme was unnecessary. At the beginning of the year 1870 the matter came into his hands as First Commissioner, and he might therefore take that date as his starting point, although it had been necessary to make some remarks respecting the antecedent transactions. He also satisfied himself that what was necessary for the due administration of justice might be accomplished as regards the building for £750,000. As to the question of land, he put it aside now, because an Act had been passed to charge the additional expenditure for land on the unfortunate suitors in time to come; but £750,000 having been set apart by the certificate of the Commissioners and the Act of Parliament for the construction of the building, he gave Mr. Street directions to prepare plans so as to keep the building within the specified sum, while covering all the expenses incidental to making it fit for occupation. After some time Mr. Street put him in a position to deal with this question as it ought to have been dealt with from the first; on the responsibility of the Government alone, or on that of the Board of Works, if the Government chose to leave the responsibility to that Department. The plans he submitted to the Commissioners, who, without pledging themselves to a minute and specific approval of any detail, considered they properly fulfilled their functions by signing a Report which approved generally of the plans. That Report was made on the 27th of July, 1870, and it was not until then that the requirements of the statute had been fulfilled; for, according to the law, the Government possessed no power to proceed with the construction of the building before the Commissioners signed that Report. Although the end of July was not a convenient period for embarking on an important undertaking, that was for him (Mr. Ayrton) no obstacle. As soon as he was placed in possession of the Report, with a request from Her Majesty's Government to give effect to it, he proceeded to make the necessary arrangements, and on the 23rd of September he arrived at the conditions on which Mr. Street was to be employed to execute the plans. As soon as that gentleman had signed his contract, instructions were given to him to prepare sketch-plans to be delivered on the 1st January, 1871, the further condition being that he was to deliver the contract-plans and drawings within six months after the preliminary sketch-plans had been approved by the Office of Works. When Mr. Street sent in the sketch-plan in January, 1871, many questions arose of a practical character as to the nature of the accommodation to be afforded and the mode of constructing the building. Discussions arose between Mr. Street, the Office of Works, and the Treasury. Several modifications were made in the plans, and on the 5th of August the Treasury stated that they were prepared to approve the contract-plans, provided they were so made that the work could be executed within the limit of the amount prescribed by the law. From the 5th of August, 1871, Mr. Street had six months to prepare his contract plans, but the details were of such a kind, that it was not until the 27th of February, 1873, that the Office of Works was put in a position to invite tenders for the construction of the building. The tenders were sent in by the 25th of March, 1873, and in the judgment of the Office of Works, the lowest of them greatly exceeded the prescribed sum. Mr. Street was called upon, and was bound by the obligations into which he had entered, thoroughly to revise his designs and plans. He (Mr. Ayrton) put it to the House whether, from the 25th of March up to the present time, there had been any loss of time which could properly be said to justify the use of the term "delay" which had been made use of in the Resolution? The time, he maintained, was insignificant compared with the magnitude of the building. The Treasury having requested himself to undertake the task of revision, he had without delay, proceeded with the consideration of the question; and he had given an assurance that he would as soon as possible state the result to the House. What advantage, then, was there in discussion now? He had certainly much more reason than the hon. Member opposite for being anxious to bring the matter to a close, and to hand the building over to Mr. Street. The hon. Member wished to know what had been the tenders, and what were the points in dispute. It would be injurious to the public interests, while tenders were under consideration, to give information about them to the House; and he considered that it would be highly injurious to the public interests if he were to state all the views and opinions which he entertained as to the best mode of carrying out the contract. All that the Government could do was to state their own determination of what was to be done, and to submit their conclusions to the consideration of the House. What he wished to impress upon the House was, that that was not a mere question of money, for something more than money was involved in the question. He could not conceive a greater blunder than that the Government, for the sake of saving a day, a week, or a month, should precipitate themselves into the construction of a building, which might render it necessary for them to retrace their steps. These buildings were designed before the new system of administration of justice had been adopted, and it was necessary to consider some points as the mode in which justice was to be administered. Now, who was to be responsible? Was Mr. Street to be responsible, or was the responsibility to rest on the Government? He contended that it was the duty of the Government to see that the buildings were suitable for the purposes for which they were to be constructed, and that the public money was not wasted in their construction. The Office of Works employed Mr. Street on behalf of the Crown, and he considered that Mr. Street was the servant of the Office of Works, and was bound to obey the orders of that Office. It would be incompatible with the conduct of the public service if it were to be assumed that Mr. Street was the employer of the Office of Works, and that it had nothing to do but to carry out its desires. In that there was nothing derogatory to the position of any architect. It might be instructive to the House to know what had occurred with respect to the construction of other public buildings carried on under Votes in Supply, and it was remarkable that all these buildings had undergone the fate of the proposed building from similar causes. Everyone knew what had occurred with respect to the buildings of the Houses of Parliament; why that very House was an example of what happened, until one of his predecessors was made responsible, and completed the building. So were the Home and Colonial Offices, on which it was proposed to spend £460,000. He (Mr. Ayrton) called upon the architect to reconsider his proceedings; and that architect, Mr. Gilbert Scott, at the head of his profession, had no difficulty in responding. Mr. Scott never made the least difficulty about doing what he told him. As he had said, he was told the Treasury had determined to make a "radical change," and it was a good thing to deal with these matters radically. The result was the expenditure was reduced to £264,000, and the building was in many respects better. When it was proposed to erect the new building for the University of London in a particular manner, it went on rapidly, but when it had risen five or six feet the House learnt about it, and immediately passed a Resolution condemning it, and it had to be pulled down at a cost of £5,000 and re-erected conformably to the views of the House. Was that an example to be followed in the present case? The same thing had occurred in the case of the Museum at Kensington, and yet nobody would say that building, though much less expensive, was inferior to that which had been originally projected. The question was, whether it would not be better to spend one or two months in arriving at the solution of questions affecting the building rather than precipitate themselves into proceedings which would require future correction. It was absolutely necessary if they saw errors in the design or construction of a building that they should check those errors, and that they should not, either from a feeling of consistency or from a desire to shirk responsibility, allow the building to go on, and leave it to others to discover errors which it would require both time and money to correct. He did not anticipate that they would need to delay the construction of this building beyond a few weeks, in order to settle the questions which were now under consideration; but the House could not take a more unwise step than to cut into the middle of the negotiations which were now going on. It was impossible to explain all the details; it would be the work of hours and days—the work of a Department; but however that might be, when he had arrived at a result, he would be prepared to state that result in a perfectly intelligible manner; and when an estimate was brought forward any hon. Member would have it in his power to take the opinion of the House respecting it before any action was taken upon it or any expenditure incurred. That was the best footing on which he could at present leave the matter.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that they must all admire very much the tender and conscientious susceptibilities revealed in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works; but he had not met the point which had been raised by the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory). He appealed to them almost passionately not to cut into the middle of negotiations, and declined to tell them the source of the delay which had arisen, but his hon. Friend had not asked for any Cabinet secrets; he had merely pleaded that some progress should be made in view of that great expenditure of time and money which all deplored. The right hon. Gentleman had not explained the present state of the negotiations. He simply told them what they all knew—that the plans had been hung up, and that Mr. Street was on his trial, forgetting that it was four years since the Committee sat and 15 since that Commission had been appointed in the Session of 1858 on his (Mr. Beresford Hope's) Motion, which decided upon concentrating the Law Courts in one building. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken with considerable amplification of the magnificent scheme propounded by the Commission at that time much under the influence of that active man of large views, the late Mr. Field, whom all so much lamented; but that scheme had been entirely set aside, and no one thought of reviving it. The present scheme had been hung up not by the architect, but by that architect's many masters—the lawyers—who naturally wished to breathe fresh air, and to have easy staircases instead of breakneck ladders, and every one of whom wanted the largest and best accommodation for his own particular department, totally regardless of all the other Courts and officers, and of the stint of money which unfortunately stood in all their ways. Our Law Courts in London should not be made the embodiment of Napoleon's sneer against England as the nation of shopkeepers. During the last year builders' prices had risen at least 15 per cent, and much more than that, taking a longer period back. Should, then, the price of the building be restricted to the original estimate of £750,000, with the consequent deficiency, and want, and discomfort, which must be the result of such parsimony, and that at a time when the revenue was more elastic than ever it had been before, and when we could afford to pitch our millions across the Atlantic? The right hon. Gentleman spoke of £750,000 as if it was something in itself sacred and immutable, and not the mere symbol of the particular building which the law needed and which naturally came out at that cost calculated upon former prices. This building, but none other, they were now morally bound to carry out upon as reasonable terms as the actual labour market made possible, but in not less dignity than was intended three years ago, or the national honour would suffer.

MR. GOLDSMID thought the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had strained at a gnat and swallowed a camel. He said he would not go beyond the original £750,000 fixed by the Commission; but while he was waiting, he was spending £40,000 a year, the annual interest upon the sum paid for the land. That could hardly be called economy. Mr. Street in 1870 submitted a plan for building the Palace of Justice according to the then prices, and he ought not to be blamed if, three years later, prices had augmented 25 per cent. He (Mr. Goldsmid) did not understand the statement of the Government with regard to the tenders, as he found from The Architect newspaper that the highest tender was £950,000; the lowest, £732,000, the latter price being within the Government limit. It was the fault of the Government which had caused the delay, and he thought that the work should be commenced immediately, before any further rise in prices occurred. If Mr. Street were called upon to cut out the central hall in order to reduce the cost of the building, much further time would be lost—probably another year—and, besides, the public would be injured by the diminished accommodation. The loss of that year would involve a loss of £40,000 in interest, and of £9,500 a-year paid in rates; and it was very possible a further sum for the building, owing to a further rise in prices; so that this cutting down of the plans was the worst possible economy. It was not fair to the architect, nor to the public, nor to the suitors, that further delay should be allowed. He hoped the Government, after this strong expression of opinion from all sides of the House, would not hesitate to proceed with the building at once, and would not grudge the £50,000 or so, which they were in vain trying to save in this matter.

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, there was a rumour that the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works meant to curtail very seriously the accommodation which was to have been afforded to the public and the profession in the New Law Courts. That would be a very serious mistake, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman should state what his intentions were in this respect, before the contract was signed, instead of afterwards. Competent authorities thought the rise in prices in the building trade would continue, delay would therefore result in an increase of costs.

Mr. F. S. POWELL deprecated the system of paltry economy which seemed to actuate the First Commissioner of Works, in respect to the subject under discussion.

Mr. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he would admit you must cut your coat according to your cloth, but apprehended it was necessary in all cases to have a coat that would fit. It was, therefore, out of the question to suppose the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works would persist in his intention to economize, by providing insufficient accommodation.

Mr. T. E. SMITH commended the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works for not having proceeded with the work in the present unsettled state of the building trade.

THE TICHBORNE CASE—

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO.—QUESTION.

Mr. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will lay on the Table of the House a Copy of the Application to the Treasury for such aid to the Defendant in the Tichborne Prosecution as he would have been legally entitled to receive if he had been committed for trial after examination before a magistrate, together with the Reply declining to afford such aid; and to call attention to the subject? He said, the course which had been pursued in this case was utterly unprecedented; and he wished to call attention to the subject now, because hon. Gentlemen were just about to separate for the Whitsuntide holidays, and during those holidays there might be a complete and irretrievable collapse in the case, so far as the Claimant's power of defending himself was concerned. That unfortunate gentleman would certainly be unable to continue his defence, and bring up the necessary witnesses, unless he received some assistance. The prosecution of the Claimant was ordered by the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas simply and solely upon the evidence as to the tattoo marks. Already the Claimant had been compelled by the Government to spend something like £3,000, which the instincts and feelings of the people of this country had led them to contribute, and the unfortunate man had been made the victim of extraordinary efforts on the part of the prosecution to keep him in prison. It was upon the tattoo marks alone that he was prosecuted; but where were these marks?

Mr. Goldsmid

MR. SPEAKER said, he must remind the hon. Gentleman that he was out of Order in going into the merits of the case. If the hon. Gentleman would confine himself to the expenses incurred in consequence of the prosecution of this person he would be quite in Order.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had further Questions to put to the right hon. Gentleman. One was, Whether the Government would afford such aid to the defendant as he would have been legally entitled to receive if he had been committed for trial before a magistrate? Another was, Whether, in the event of any Member of the House making a further appeal to the people to renew their subscriptions in favour of the person under trial, he would prosecute such Member for contempt of Court? and the last Question was, Whether the right hon. Gentleman had taken any steps to discover the authorship of certain letters which the Lord Chief Justice had pointed out to be forged and fabricated, and which had been brought forward at the last trial?

MR. BRUCE said, the hon. Gentleman had asked him four Questions. The first was—Who was responsible for that prosecution? His answer was, that he, as Home Secretary, was responsible for it. A person who was a party to a suit in a Court of Justice having been considered by the Judge to have committed perjury, the Judge in the exercise of his authority committed him to prison in order that he might be tried on that charge. The case was an important one. There was no person except the Crown to undertake the prosecution, and the Crown, in accordance with precedent, undertook it. Such prosecutions occurred frequently. The hon. Member wished the Crown also to undertake the cost of the defence; but such a proceeding was altogether unprecedented. The hon. Gentleman's second Question was, whether the Government would afford such aid to the defendant as he would be legally entitled to receive if he had been committed for trial after examination before a magistrate? Under the Act of the hon. and learned Recorder, passed in a previous Session, witnesses for the defence who appeared before a magistrate, and who were deemed by the magistrate to be material witnesses, might be bound over by him to appear on the trial; and at the conclusion of the trial the Judge who tried the case might, if he thought proper, order the expenses of those witnesses to be paid. The defendant, in this instance, having been committed, not by a magistrate but by a Judge, there was no provision made by statute for the costs of any of his witnesses. But the answer he had given on the application made in this instance was, that at the conclusion of the trial he would, in conjunction with the Treasury, consider what was fair and proper to be done in a case of that sort. The hon. Member's third Question was, whether if an hon. Member made an appeal to the public for subscriptions for the defence of that person, he would desire the Attorney General to prosecute him? His answer to that—in accordance with what he believed had fallen from the Lord Chief Justice—was, that if such an appeal was made to the public in decent and proper language, it would not be a fit subject for a prosecution. The fourth Question put by the hon. Gentleman was, what steps did he propose to take with regard to certain letters in connection with that case which were alleged to have been forged? He knew nothing about those forged letters; but he believed the Lord Chief Justice had stated them to be wholly immaterial upon the point at issue, and he therefore could not see what advantage was to be gained by entering on any such investigation as to their authorship as had been alluded to. With respect to the correspondence referred to in the hon. Member's Notice, it could be produced if the hon. Gentleman moved for it.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ALABAMA CLAIMS.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,200,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874, for the amounts awarded to the Government of the United States of America under the Treaty of Washington 1871, in satisfaction of the Alabama Claims.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he objected to proceeding with so important a Vote at that late hour of the night, and would move that the Chairman report Progress.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped the hon. Gentleman would not persevere in the Motion, as it was most desirable that the Vote should be taken that evening in the interests of the public service. He would arrange that on Monday Supply should cease at half-past 10, in order to take the discussion on the Report.

MR. F. S. POWELL asked the Government to take the discussion on Monday before Supply.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE also objected to proceeding with the Vote that evening.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was for the national interest, in the highest sense, that when the Vote was first proposed there should be no appearance of hesitation on the part of the House of Commons in assenting to it. He should take care that hon. Members should have ample opportunity for discussing it when it came on again on Monday; and, if necessary, he would take care to arrange so that the discussion should be taken before half-past 10.

COLONEL BARTELOT regretted that the front Opposition benches were empty, and that it was left so often to the occupants of the back Opposition benches to look after the interests of the country. While agreeing with the right hon. Gentleman that it was not desirable to resist the Vote on the present occasion, he disclaimed on the part of the House of Commons any responsibility for the payment of the money.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON thought the whole transaction must be looked upon as matter of national humiliation, and contended that when the Americans refused to withdraw the Indirect Claims the honour and interest of this country demanded that we should have washed our hands of the Treaty. The Times, which was generally supposed to be the Government organ, wound up a long leading article by stating that there were good grounds for supposing that the Indirect Claims had in effect been paid, although they were nominally excluded.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER pointed out that, as he had said on a previous occasion, this country was bound by the Rules contained in the Treaty, but not by the observations made by the Arbitrators.

MR. G. BENTINCK expressed his willingness to withdraw the Motion for reporting Progress if the Government would give an early opportunity for discussing the question on the Report of the Vote.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Report should be taken at 9 o'clock on Monday.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next;

Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl of Bessborough) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address of Monday last, as follows:—

MY LORDS,

I HAVE received your Address praying that I will withhold My assent from the scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, relating to the Free Grammar School of King Edward VI. in Birmingham.

I WILL withhold My assent from the scheme in conformity with your desire.

ROCK OF CASHEL BILL—(No. 90.)

(The Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to allow the people of Ireland to restore the ruins on the Rock of Cashel by private subscriptions. This could not be done without an Act of Parliament; because the Rock, after the Act for Disestablishing the Irish Church, passed into the hands of the Church Temporalities Commissioners, who had transferred its custody to the Board of Works, and had set aside a sum of £7,000, the interest of which was to maintain a few custodians of the Rock and its antiquities. In doing this the President of the Church Temporalities Commissioners exercised a sound discretion, since it was necessary to take immediate measures to prevent the damage caused to the sculptures and antiquities of the Rock by tourists and others, and he believed that the damage recently inflicted had been very great. Of course, if this Bill passed, the £7,000 temporarily set aside for the maintenance of the antiquities would revert to the fund of the Disestablished Church. This Bill had, therefore, the effect of amending, and might be intitled a Bill to amend, the first sub-section of Clause 25 of the Irish Church Act of 1869. He must now go into the history of the Rock of Cashel. Its church was founded in the year 903; other buildings were added, and many tombs of Irish Kings and chieftains were situated upon the Rock. He had better leave to others to inform their Lordships more fully respecting the antiquarian interest which attached to the Rock of Cashel. After the Reformation the cathedral on the Rock became the property of the Protestant Irish Church; but in 1745 Archbishop Price, the then Diocesan, removed his cathedral church from the Rock to the low ground, for the Archbishop was a stout man and averse from walking up a steep hill, and he stripped the roof of the cathedral and used its timbers for building a modern church and his own house. In 1749, Archbishop Agar, having proved that the old cathedral was incapable of restoration, the ruins and the new cathedral in Cashel were consolidated by an Order in Council. The Disestablished Church might, therefore, be fairly said to have given up and renounced a church which it had turned into a ruin, and which had remained a ruin up to the present time. He did not wish to blame Archbishop Price for an act done in an age when taste and art and the knowledge of architecture were at a very low ebb; and he might state that an Irish newspaper—which might, for aught he knew, be an organ of Home Rulers—was very temperate in its language with respect to this matter, and excused Archbishop Price on the ground of the ignorance of the times in which this vandalism was perpetrated. But the effects of this demolition survived, and were felt more strongly in this age when the Irishman saw the shrines so unnecessarily ruined, and the shattered tombs of his national heroes, and it was but natural that the maxim which held good in Pagan Rome should hold good in Christian Ireland—

*"Delicta majorum immeritus lues, Romane, donec templa refeceris
Ædesque labentes Deorum, Et fœda nigro simulacra fumo."*

But the Protestants of Ireland did not only renounce the possession of this cathedral when they made a ruin of it; they did so a second time by the force of circumstances after the Act of Disestablishment, when they did not claim it from the Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners. They did not do so because they had no need of it, and had no funds for rebuilding it, and had no worshippers to occupy it if rebuilt; for the Protestant population of Cashel was only 300 among 3,700 Catholics, and in the county there were only 13,000 Protestants to 200,000 Catholics. For the Protestants, therefore, to refuse to consent to the ruins of the Cashel Cathedral being restored to life and usefulness, and to insist upon their being kept as ruins, would be for them to act the part of the false mother before Solomon, who preferred to have the useless half of a dead child sooner than that her rival should have the living child. They were not told why these mothers should have been rivals, and there was no reason why Protestants and Catholics should carry rivalry to this extent, as there was room for both. There was an argument against the restoration of the Rock of Cashel, but which would hardly be put before their Lordships, because this was not a dinner of the Royal Academy; that was the painter's argument—that ruins are picturesque and ornamental. Now, it might be admitted that the fragment of a tower entirely covered with ivy was a picturesque object; but their Lordships would probably agree with him that the broken arches and windowless mullions of a cathedral were painful objects, as much so as the ribs of horses and camels near the top of a mountain pass which they had failed to surmount, or the spectacle which he had seen at the Sulinah mouth of the Danube, of the naked ribs of more than 20 wrecks strewn the beach on either side of the bar. But if these sights were unpleasant, how much more were they so when one considered, as their Lordships were bound to do, the inner meaning of these ruins? The ruins of a church denoted either decay of population, decay of faith, or the ravages of invasion or the worse havoc of civil war. The ruins of Cashel denoted the penal laws and their effects; and, as their Lordships had laboured during several Sessions to remove the remains of the penal laws, it might be hoped that they would equally desire to remove the outward sign of those laws, and to give the Irish peasant a visible sign of their good intentions on his behalf. Englishmen had been used to deride and ridicule the strife and contention which broke out so constantly between the Greeks and the Latins for the sake of some picture or piece of tapestry even within the Church of the Nativity at Bethlehem. They could not enter into the feelings which caused the dispute about a key which led to the Crimean War. Would they suffer that Ireland should be no better in respect of charity and mutual toleration than Syrian Christians? Mr. Kinglake said of the Bethlehem dispute—

"Diplomacy answered that the key was really a key—a key for opening a door; and its evil quality was, not that it kept the Greeks out, but that it let the Latins come in."

This Bill, in the same way, would not keep a single Protestant from access to a national monument, because it admitted the Latins to restore their ruined shrines. But this question was not only one of a shrine; it involved also national sentiment. The Rock of Cashel was the Acropolis of Ireland; to restore it would be a harmless outlet for the national sentiment, which was at present pent up and dangerous. From an Imperial point of view nothing better could be desired than that the money required for the rebuilding of Cashel, which could not be less than £100,000, and which would come from Canada and Australia, should be diverted from the pockets of Fenian head-centres, and that so large a sum as would be required should be spent in a poor part of Ireland by the Irish themselves without any thought of a petition to the National Exchequer. He was rather ashamed of this argument, but was obliged to use the bad as well as the good, like the lawyer referred to recently by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Their Lordships would understand what the feeling of the Irish was with regard to Cashel, when he stated that quite recently a Catholic church was built in Wisconsin, in the United States, and that some hundredweights of stone were sent out from the Rock of Cashel to form the foundations of the new church. The recent Acts which their Lordships had passed had removed—or were intended to remove—grievances; but they had done nothing to reconstruct. There was the great disadvantage attending the cutting down of "upas trees," that immediately parties started up to protest that these upas trees were ornamental trees, and should not be cut down. This measure, on the contrary, would be a planting of olive trees, for it took nothing from anyone, and its object was restoration and reconstruction. He regretted that the noble Lord (Viscount Midleton), who was to move the rejection of this Bill, did not leave that task to some other noble Lord. He was told that the noble Lord came forward as the lineal descendant of a Prelate who was the spiritual successor of the Prelate who reduced Cashel Cathedral to a ruin. The noble Lord professed to belong to the Conservative party. Was it as one of that party that he advocated the perpetuation of ruin and decay? There were some ancestral duties and obligations which conferred honour upon the person upon whom they devolved. Such was the case with the noble Lord (Lord Buckhurst) who came forward to defend Emanuel Hospital. By so doing he became a second founder of that institution, and even those who disagreed with him might envy him his feelings of satisfaction. But far different was the case with the noble Lord who was now coming forward to renew the acts of his predecessor. He had taken up what was a damnosa hereditas. He had already said that the Prelate who ruined Cashel Cathedral might be excused on the ground of the age in which he lived; but the noble Lord had no such excuse. He was acting in opposition to the enlightenment and the spirit of the present times and of our recent legislation. He would not suffer the people of Ireland to restore their shrines and protect the tombs of their kings from the hoofs of the cattle, or to be happy unless they crossed the wide Atlantic. He was going to address their Lordships in the attitude and language of vindictive Juno, and to say—

"Qualibet exules
In parte regnante beati,
Dum Priami Paradisque busto
Insultet armentum."

The rest of the quotation would not apply, since, unlike Juno, he would not suffer Ireland's Capitoline Rock to be made refulgent, even though this should be done at the cost of Irishmen only. It was a pious belief in some countries that testamentary executors or heirs might add merit or take away blame from a testator, according as they carried out or modified his testamentary instructions. But the noble Lord seemed to be indifferent to lightening the burden on the memory of the act, which, instead of repudiating, he sought to renew and perpetuate, and which he would, perhaps, attempt to justify, and must justify, in order to justify the Motion which he was about to make. Other noble Lords had told him that they would do their best to throw out the Bill, and he believed they would tell their Lordships that the Rock of Cashel was provided for, and was already in the possession of the people of Ireland. Whether that Bill passed, or whether the Rock was condemned to continue a ruin under the guardianship of the Board of Works, it would be equally in the possession of the people of Ireland—that was to say, equally free and open to all who might choose to visit it. But the question was whether those tombs of Celtic chiefs in the South of Ireland were to be restored and beautified under the guardianship of those who were historically and traditionally related to them, or whether those tombs were to be kept in a state of desecration and decay under the guardianship of men of Scotch and English descent, who could not possess the same traditional affection for those remains. He had received a letter from the Treasurer of the Royal Irish Academy recommending that the Bill should provide for access of persons interested in archaeology or art, and though such a provision would not, he thought, be necessary, it would be very easy to add it in Committee should the Bill reach that stage. In Spain all the monuments and libraries which were under the care of ecclesiastics were well preserved, whilst those under the care of the State had been, in many cases, shamefully plundered. It had been suggested to him by a noble Lord opposite that it would have been advisable to substitute for the names of trustees which stood in the Bill those of official trustees such as the Chief Justices, or such persons as the Lord Lieutenant might please to name. Some other names might very well be added, but the Irish names in the Bill could not be withdrawn without causing great disappointment to persons who intended to subscribe for the restoration of the ruins, and names were required to procure other subscriptions. He believed that the name of Dr. Leahy, the Catholic Archbishop of Cashel, was most favourably known to their Lordships; but he might be allowed to remind them that he had, by moral influence alone, succeeded in closing the whisky shops within his diocese during Sundays. At the risk of appearing very exacting, he confessed he should not be entirely satisfied if the Bill were passed by their Lordships, unless it had the support, or at least the tacit acquiescence, of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns); for while, if this Bill should pass by English votes, it would be a boon to Ireland and a crowning of the edifice of the Irish Church Act, yet it would be much more than that if it passed with the consent of the noble and learned Lord who in himself alone represented Ulster. If the Bill should receive his consent it would be a peace offering from the North to the South and West of Ireland—a burying of old animosities; and he believed it was no exaggeration to say that for a long time it would put an end to the annual fights at Belfast. The noble and learned Lord had so often shown that personal and even party considerations did not in his mind outweigh broad and statesmanlike views, that he trusted the noble and learned Lord would pardon him for being so sanguine as to hope that he would deal with this question with his usual magnanimity. There was another portion of their Lordships' House whose votes, he thought, he was entitled to claim on behalf of the Bill, on the ground that such a vote would be in accordance with a former and a memorable vote in the course of the Irish Church debate. It would be in their Lordships' recollection that first the noble Duke (the Duke of Cleveland), and afterwards the noble Earl opposite (Earl Stanhope), moved that residences should be provided for the houseless Irish clergy out of the surplus of the property of the Disestablished Church. That Motion was carried by a majority; but circumstances prevented its being carried into effect. There was no reason to suppose that any of their Lordships who then voted for the noble Earl's Motion had had reason to regret that vote, and the speech of the noble Earl on the cross-benches (Earl Grey) last week must have convinced those who heard or read it that both England and Ireland had reason to regret that that vote was not at the time carried into effect.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

VISCOUNT MIDLETON, in moving that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, said, that the Rock of Cashel, the very name of which was probably unknown to most of their Lordships, was a stupendous mass of limestone rising with craggy and precipitous sides to the height of 300 feet from the fertile plain below. The Irish legend connected with it was that at some early period it had been transported by supernatural agency from a mountain many miles away from Cashel and dropped in the spot where it now stood. On the limited space which formed its summit there were collected within a few acres five of the most interesting monuments which any country could possess. They were—the ruins of the Archbishop's residence, the ruins of the Palace of the Kings of Munster, the ruins of the Cathedral, the ruins of King Cormac's Chapel, and the ruins of a Round Tower. Around it lay 750 houses, which comprised the modern town of Cashel. In times long gone by the Cathedral was a place not only of ecclesiastical worship, but was also a fortress. It was in that character that it was stormed in 1647, at the close of those troubles which had decimated Ireland, by an English army, at the head of which was Lord Inchiquin; and from that moment it had been handed over to the then Established Church of Ireland, and remained in its possession to its disestablishment. Forty years later the Dean and Chapter of Cashel attempted to restore a portion of the Cathedral; but it was a long and expensive work, and it was not till 1707 that there was any record of religious teaching being carried on within its walls. For 60 years longer the service of the Church of England was carried on regularly within it, until in 1769 the exposure of the site, the difficulty of access, and the smallness of the congregation made it desirable to provide at the foot of the Rock a more commodious place of worship. An Act of Parliament was obtained for the purpose, and the new

Cathedral was established at the end of the 18th century. Such was the state of matters when the Act for the Disestablishment of the Irish Church was passed in 1869. Their Lordships would recollect that the 25th section of that Act had reference to what was to be done with ruins of ecclesiastical buildings which at the time of the passing of the Act were used for public worship. The section provided that such buildings should be preserved as national monuments and not used as places of worship. The words to this effect were clear, distinct, and definite, and having had the honour to be a Member of the House of Commons at the time the Irish Church Bill was under discussion in that House he could assert that the Rock of Cashel was one of the principal monuments, if not the principal one, to the preservation of which that clause was directed. The Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral of Cashel had contemplated sending in a claim to the monuments on the Rock; but, through considerations which he approved, they resolved not to do so, and those monuments passed over to the Church Temporalities Commissioners, who transferred them to the Board of Works in Ireland, with a sum of £7,100 for their maintenance. This was in accordance with the 25th section of the Irish Church Act, and but for the severity of last winter certain works of maintenance directed by the Board would have been executed before now. He might remind their Lordships that at the time of the passing of the Act it was open to those who now wanted the Rock to put forward their claim if they thought they had a good one. But they had not taken that course. At the beginning of the present Session a Bill on the same subject was introduced in the House of Commons, but it mysteriously disappeared before the stage of second reading. Then its promoters pounced on his noble Friend (Lord Stanley of Alderley), who was totally unacquainted with the wants and wishes of the Irish people, and got him to propose a Bill seeking to do what the Disestablishment Act said should not be done—namely, to turn this place into a place of public worship. A measure of this kind, repealing an important section in the Irish Church Act, should be brought forward, if brought forward at all, by the Executive Government. Again, of the 86 trustees named in the Bill, no fewer than 30 belonged to one creed. Among the remaining six trustees were the noble Marquess on the cross-benches (the Marquess of Clanricarde), who he hoped liked the company in which he found himself, for of the others one was an English physician who represented an Irish county, while another was Sir John Gray, proprietor of The Freeman's Journal. He denied that either of those gentlemen could be regarded as fairly representing the Protestants of Ireland. If there were spiritual destitution in the neighbourhood some good reason might be put forward for the proposition; but he was sorry to say that the population of the parish of Cashel was a decreasing one, and that it only numbered 3,900 persons, of whom 300 were Protestants. The Roman Catholics had a large church there; but their cathedral was now and had long been at Thurles, which was so convenient a position for the whole of the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical body that synods and other ecclesiastical assemblies of the Roman Catholic Church had been held there. A more unfavourable spot than the summit of the Rock of Cashel could scarcely be selected for a place of worship. He hoped, therefore, their Lordships would agree to his Amendment.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this day six months.")—(Viscount Midleton.)

THE EARL OF LIMERICK, in supporting the second reading of the Bill, contended that the buildings would be better in the hands of trustees than under the care of the Board of Works; and that to hand them over for the religious use of the majority of the people could not be objectionable. It would be far better that religious services should again be held in the building than that the building should be left in the hands of the Board of Works to be made a show of.

VISCOUNT MONCK concurred with the noble Viscount who had moved the Amendment (Viscount Midleton) in holding that the 25th section of the Irish Church Act had direct reference to those most interesting ruins on the Rock of Cashel. He was opposed to this Bill, because it was an interference with the settlement of a great question, which was supposed to be a final one. He objected to it for other reasons, one of which was that those ruins were interesting in an archaeological point of view, and that they could not be restored as a place of worship without destroying the features which made them interesting. The Church Temporalities Commissioners had made ample provision for the maintenance of the ruins, and their preservation might well be left in the hands of the Board of Works. But his opposition was based more strongly on a question of feeling. He thought the Roman Catholics of Ireland behaved in a manner that was highly creditable to them on the passing of the Irish Church Act. That Act must have been most agreeable to them, yet they indulged in no manifestations of triumph when it became law; but he thought that, so far from planting the olive, this Bill would exasperate religious animosities in Ireland, and even create bad feeling where it did not now exist. For those reasons he must oppose the Bill.

LORD DUNSANY opposed the Bill, because he believed that it would, if passed into law, create a great deal of bitter feeling, and might probably give rise to other demands on the part of the Roman Catholics.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he thought the Bill would do what would be agreeable to a large number of people without doing a wrong to anybody.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was anxious to state the reason of the vote he was about to give. In framing the Irish Church Bill this very question received the anxious attention of the Cabinet, and, knowing the state of public feeling on the subject, it was determined to leave the matter in its present condition. He believed that as yet it was far too early to disturb the settlement which was then arrived at.

THE EARL OF KINTORE said, he would vote against the Bill if it came to a division, because he believed it would excite much animosity and dispute in Ireland.

THE EARL OF GRANARD, as one of the trustees mentioned in the Bill, regretted the vehement opposition offered to a measure calculated, as he believed, to effect much good, and which was framed in no offensive spirit to anybody.

Viscount Midleton

On Question; that ("now") stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents, 23; Not-Contents, 112: Majority, 89.

Resolved, in the negative; and Bill to be read a second time this day six months.

VAGRANTS LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(No. 98.) (The Earl of Feversham.)

COMMITTEE.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND objected to the phraseology of the Bill. Clause 3 said that persons playing at certain games of chance should be "liable to be convicted as" rogues and vagabonds. He moved as an Amendment to leave out these words, and insert shall be "deemed a rogue and vagabond within the true intent and meaning of the recited Act."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR expressed his regret that the noble Lord in charge of the Bill had not proposed Amendments to remove certain objections which he had stated on the second reading. He objected to calling children rogues and vagabonds when they were not, and he objected to dealing with children by a Bill of this sort when they had better receive moderate corporal chastisement. Not expecting the Bill to come on so soon, he had not directed his attention to the Amendments which would be necessary to give effect to the objections he entertained; but he hoped such Amendments would be made at a later stage of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Monday, the 16th of June next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 130.)

NAVY—H.M.S. "DEVASTATION."

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE, who had given Notice of his intention to ask "what ship was to accompany the Devastation on her trial in a sea-way," observed that the subject to which his Question related was one of deep interest to all naval men and also to naval architects. He was not going to refer again to the Rock of Cashel, but to another Rock, called Bishop's Rock, off Scilly. It was not dedicated to religious purposes, but served a very useful purpose as a lighthouse. The lighthouse was 147 feet high, and there was a bell on it 120 feet from the water's edge. Some years ago that bell was broken by the sea. He mentioned this to show what had been the force of the sea with a south-west wind. It broke this bell, portions of which were shown and regarded with great interest at the Exhibition. All the trials of the Devastation in smooth water had been satisfactory; but the question was, what would she do in a sea way? He saw by the papers she had been sent to Cape Clear to look for a breeze, but not for a gale. She was of a totally new construction, and never before had such a ship been sent to sea; he was rather surprised, therefore, that she should have been sent out without any vessel to accompany her. If she got into a gale there might be some danger, and it appeared to him and to most naval men that she ought not to have been sent out unaccompanied. The Valorous had been with her in her former trial. The principal object in sending another vessel with her was to see how she would behave, and that could not be properly ascertained unless a vessel of nearly the same displacement, weight, length, and power were tried with her. If the companion vessel got into a sea and pitched heavily, while the Devastation did not pitch at all, that would show that the Devastation was a great improvement in that respect. But if, on the other hand, the companion vessel went through the sea while it was not thought prudent that the Devastation should go further, that would decide the question the other way. It was not fair to the captain of the Devastation and the naval men of the country to let this trial go on without another vessel being with her of equal size and weight.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that he stated on a former occasion that the Devastation when she should go on her trial would be accompanied by a consort. As the noble Earl had mentioned, the Valorous was with her up to Devonport; but as the Valorous had to go elsewhere, the largest tug at the port, the Carron, a vessel of 400 tons, was sent with the Devastation, which had crossed to Queenstown. The Valorous, however, had now returned and was ordered to join the Devastation. In her trials during the summer months one vessel from the Channel Squadron would be detached to join her.

THE POLYNESIANS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF BELMORE asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, When the Papers relating to outrages on Polynesians, laid before the House and ordered to be printed on the 1st April, will be delivered out to Members of this House?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the Papers were very voluminous, and he was sorry it had taken so long a time to produce them. They were now in print, and would be in the hands of their Lordships in a few days.

House adjourned at half-past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 26th May, 1873.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee —NAVY ESTIMATES—Committee—R.F.

Resolution [May 23] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution reported—Ordered—
First Reading—Blackwater Bridge [Composition of Debt]* [177]; Blackwater Bridge* [176].

Second Reading—Juries (Ireland)* [166]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 3)* [169]; Indian Railways Registration* [168]; Grand Jury Presentments (Ireland)* [170].

Committee—Report—Thames Embankment (Land) (re-comm.)* [65]; Metropolitan Tramways Provisional Orders (re-comm.)* [172]; Shrewsbury and Harrow School Property (re-comm.)* [164]; Registration (Ireland)* [165].

Third Reading—Register for Parliamentary and Municipal Electors* [168], and passed.

CRIMINAL LAW—CHIPPING NORTON MAGISTRATES.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that sixteen women, wives of agricultural labourers, have been sentenced to imprisonment, with hard labour, by the Rev. Thomas Harris and the Rev. W. E. D. Carter, sitting as magistrates at Chipping Norton under the provisions of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, and, if so, whether there is anything in the circumstances of the case which in his opinion would justify his interference in favour of the prisoners?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, I have received no communication or memorial on the subject; but I directed a letter to be written to the magistrates to-day, and I shall, of course, in due time receive an answer.

POST OFFICE AND TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENTS—FINANCIAL IRREGULARITIES.—QUESTIONS.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the inquiry into the financial transactions of the Post Office and Telegraph Departments undertaken by the Treasury on the recommendation of the Public Accounts Committee has been completed, and how soon he will be prepared to communicate the result of the inquiry to the Committee or to the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am told, Sir, the Report is almost complete. As I have not seen it yet, I cannot say when we can lay it before the House; but no time shall be lost.

MR. SYNAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the scheme for the commutation of the pensions of the officers of the late Telegraph Companies has been approved of by the Treasury; and, if so, when is payment of the commutation to be made?

MR. BAXTER: The scheme referred to by my hon. Friend cannot be acted upon, until Parliament has provided a further sum for the purposes of the Telegraph Acts.

BANK OF ENGLAND RETURNS. QUESTION.

MR. J. B. SMITH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Returns ordered of the weekly condition of the Bank of England from 1857 to the present time, will be printed and delivered to Members previously to the Right honourable Gentleman bringing forward his promised Bill on the subject of the Bank Act?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the Return had been made and presented; but he had no control over the printing and delivery of it.

IRELAND — STIPENDIARY MAGIS- TRATES.—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is a fact that the stipendiary magistrates of Ireland have received no increase of pay or emolument for the last forty years; and, if the Treasury intend carrying out the recommendation of the Commissioners lately appointed to inquire into the matter?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he believed it was a fact that the pay and allowances of the stipendiary magistrates of Ireland had not been substantially improved for 40 years. Some alterations had been made, but he did not think the pay had been materially raised. He could not say what the intentions of the Treasury upon the subject were; but they had not yet had an opportunity of carrying out the recommendations of the Commissioners lately appointed to inquire into the matter. The subject was a complicated one, and up to the present time it had been under the consideration of the Irish Government. He believed they were in a position almost immediately to make a proposal to the Treasury on the subject; but the pay of the stipendiary magistrates could not be increased without an Act of Parliament.

WEST COAST SETTLEMENTS — THE ASHANTEE INVASION.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether any Hospital Ships or Transports have been despatched to Cape Coast Castle for the treatment and removal of those seamen and marines who may suffer from wounds or climate during the operations against Ashantee?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that no special hospital ship had been sent to Cape Coast Castle, but the attention of the senior naval officer there had been specially called to the subject of the possibility of sickness among the seamen and marines, and he had been directed to have a ship ready to convey them, if necessary, to Ascension. He had two paddle steamers at his disposal for the purpose, and he would also be able to avail himself of the services of the mail steamers. Strict orders had been issued with regard to the landing of seamen and marines, which would not take place except in cases of emergency.

AGRICULTURAL MACHINE ACCIDENTS. QUESTION.

MR. WELBY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has caused inquiry to be made as to the preventibility of accidents occasioned by thrashing and other agricultural machines; and, whether he is prepared to introduce any measure upon the subject?

MR. BRUCE in reply, said, that, on inquiry, he was sorry to find that accidents occasioned by thrashing and other agricultural machines were very numerous and often fatal, and that they could be prevented in a manner which would not interfere with their use by farmers. Therefore, some time ago, he directed a Bill to be prepared on the subject; he was informed it would be ready tomorrow, and he hoped it would be introduced soon after Whitsuntide.

POST OFFICE—"POST OFFICE TEA." QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE asked the Postmaster General, If his attention has been called to an advertisement of "The Post Office Tea," which purports to be "supplied by Postmasters only in Great Britain and Ireland," and which is sold by Postmasters at the Post Office in various country towns; and, whether he has received any complaints from grocers and others injuriously affected by such competition?

MR. MONSELL: My attention, Sir, has been called to an advertisement of the "Post Office Tea," which purports to be supplied only to postmasters in Great Britain and Ireland. Complaints on the subject have been received from grocers; but these, with one exception, have been directed against the use of a medallion on the circulars in imitation of a postage stamp. Such a trade mark was calculated to give rise to the impression that the circulars were being issued by authority, or, as one of the memorialists expressed himself, that "Her Majesty's Postmaster General had gone into the tea trade." It has since been discontinued at the instigation of the Department. As to the title adopted for the tea, the Department, though thinking it objectionable, has not the power to interfere. Neither was there any regulation prohibiting postmasters from selling tea on commission.

THE MAURITIUS—APPOINTMENT OF BISHOP.—QUESTION.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If any application has been received from the Acting Governor of Mauritius for permission to present to the Legislative Council of that Colony,

"a Copy of the Correspondence and Documents relating to the appointment of a Bishop for the Church of England in that Colony, from the time when a Bishop was first prayed for by the Church there, down to the present time;"

if so, what answer has been or will be returned; and, whether he objects to laying a Copy of the same Documents upon the Table of this House, including the Despatches of the Governor of Mauritius, dated January and February 1872, and the Despatch of the Secretary of State for the Colonies dated 9th May 1872, and any representations made by the Church bodies in the Colony with reference to those Despatches?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, in reply, said, application had been received from the Acting Governor for permission to present to the Legislative Council Correspondence relating to the appointment of a Bishop. The required permission had been granted, and the Correspondence would be laid before Parliament.

INCLOSURE OF COMMONS—LEGISLA- TION.—QUESTION.

MR. SPENCER STANHOPE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether the Government intend, during the present Session, to bring in any general measure relating to the Inclosure of Commons, or any Bill authorizing the proceeding with Inclosures in rural districts, for which Provisional Orders have been issued by the Inclosure Commissioners?

Mr. Goschen

MR. BRUCE: Sir, in 1871 a Bill on the subject was brought in by the Government and referred to a Select Committee, which reported it with considerable amendments. Pressure of time prevented it being further proceeded with during that Session. It was introduced substantially in the same form in the House of Lords in 1872, was passed through Committee without any material Amendments, and thrown out on the third reading. The principal objection to the Bill was the compulsory appropriation in all cases for allotments and recreation grounds of a specified proportion of the lands to be inclosed. In the course of the discussion in both Houses, there had been much difference of opinion as to the amount and distribution of the uninclosed lands in England and Wales. With a view to obtain as accurate information as is practicable on this point for the guidance of Parliament, an inquiry is now being made by the Inclosure Commissioners—1. Into the area of the common lands; 2. Into the area of the commonable or common field lands; 3. The character of the common lands as regards fitness for agriculture. It is to be hoped that the result of these inquiries may facilitate future legislation. But the Government are of opinion that without it no measure could at present be introduced with a reasonable prospect of passing into law.

THE "ALABAMA"—COMPENSATION FOR BRITISH PROPERTY.—QUESTIONS.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to submit the claims of Her Majesty's subjects for losses sustained by the capture of vessels containing British property by the "Alabama" to arbitration?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have no such intention, and I may say I think the Question of the hon. Baronet, judging from its form, has been put under an entire misapprehension. It appears to be implied that the Government submitted the claims of certain persons, not subjects of Her Majesty, to arbitration. That is altogether a mistake. No claims of individuals have been submitted to arbitration in relation to the "Alabama."

What was submitted to arbitration was a question of injury between the two Governments, and had reference entirely to international law.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table the case as submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown, on which they gave the opinion that, notwithstanding the British Government having been found liable for the damage done by the "Alabama" to the subjects of other countries, she was not liable to her own subjects for similar damage similarly inflicted?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: It is not usual, Sir, to present to Parliament the communications which pass between the Foreign Office and the Law Officers of the Crown on cases submitted to them, such communications being considered to be of a confidential character, and I could not undertake to make an exception to the custom in the instance just alluded to by the hon. Member.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—SCOTCH BILLS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he saw several Scotch Bills on the Paper for consideration that night, the first of which was the Law Agents Bill. He desired to know, whether it was intended to proceed with the Bill, and if so, after what hour it would not be taken?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he should certainly bring the Bill on, provided he had an opportunity of doing so; but as Notice had been given of opposition to the Bill, he could not, according to the forms of the House, proceed with it after half-past 12 o'clock.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE: When will the Conveyancing Bill be taken?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: That will stand on the Paper for to-morrow.

MR. CAMERON: Will the Entail Bill be also taken to-morrow?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: No; not until after the Whitsuntide holidays.

MR. CAMERON: Can you mention the day it will be taken after Whitsuntide?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: No; I have not yet been able to fix that.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Council,

Whether the Scotch Education Code has been considered and passed by the Scotch Department, and if so, when it will be in the hands of Members?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The Code has been passed by the Department, and laid upon the Table a few days ago. I have ordered certain copies to be printed for the use of hon. Members, and I hope these will be ready for them some time in the course of to-morrow.

PARLIAMENT—MORNING SITTINGS.

MR. GLADSTONE moved, "That, whenever the House shall meet at Two o'clock, the sitting of the House shall be held subject to the Resolutions of the House of the 30th day of April, 1869."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would take advantage of the occasion to complain of the inconvenience which sometimes resulted from the House meeting at an unwonted hour without due Notice. He thought that Notice of any change of the kind ought to be given on the previous Friday.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that when morning sittings came to be held regularly, he did not think a separate Notice was necessary for each occasion. The practice of the House heretofore had not, he believed, been found to work inconveniently.

MR. BOUVERIE pointed out that, under the existing system, a Minister might at a late hour of the night fix a Bill which happened to be low down in the Orders for Two o'clock on the following day, and that much inconvenience might in that way be caused to hon. Members who took an interest in the measure. He should suggest that Notice should be given on the previous day at Five o'clock of the Business with which it was proposed to proceed at Two o'clock on the next.

MR. GLADSTONE concurred with his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), in thinking it would be convenient that should be done when possible, but it could not be done uniformly.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he had also to complain of the inconvenience which resulted from having Bills fixed late at night for Two o'clock the following day.

Motion agreed to.

Dr. Lyon Playfair

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £1,072,380, Naval Stores, &c.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he wished to recall the attention of the Committee to the observation of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty the other night, when the subject of stores was under discussion, that statements were repeatedly made by Members of the Opposition, and as repeatedly denied, with reference to the scarcity of the stock of stores in the dockyards. The right hon. Gentleman was perfectly correct; those statements had been frequently made, and repeatedly denied. They would be made again, and in all probability denied again. In order to shew that he was not entirely wrong in the statement he had made on this question, he would point out that, according to an account which had been placed in the hands of hon. Members that Session, it appeared a large amount had been transferred from the Shipbuilding to the Store Vote. The Admiralty had sold a very large quantity of stores, and had expended the proceeds in the purchase of other stores; but the money so obtained not sufficing for the purpose, a letter signed by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty had been sent to the Treasury, making an application for the sum of £121,000, for the purchase of further stores. It was thus clear that a most incautious and imprudent reduction of stores had been made, and that the Admiralty had since been increasing, sub rosa, the amount of the stores, which were even now in a very bare state, in consequence of the sales to which he had referred having been made. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the storehouses were overflowing with stores. He could not see where those stores were; and he had been informed on reliable authority, that there were not in all Her Majesty's Dockyards stores sufficient to fit out four or five sail of the line. It was only when the Appropriation Amounts were brought forward that hon. Members who found fault with the Admiralty administration had the means of verifying their statements, which right hon. Gentlemen opposite usually met with a flat denial. On the subject of anchors and cables, he had been informed that several of Her Majesty's ships had been endangered by their cables and anchors being inadequate to the work they had to perform, and he could not help expressing his opinion that Mr. Trotman's anchors, which were used on board the Great Eastern and the Royal yacht, were the best in existence, and he saw no reason why they should not be supplied to the Fleet.

Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH said, he rose for the purpose of pointing out that the observations of the hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), to the effect that the sale of Admiralty stores had been excessive ought to receive some notice from Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that he had only delayed rising in order to see whether any hon. Member would wish to address the House on the subject, and that the only answer he could offer to the allegation of the hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), that the storehouses of the Admiralty had been emptied of their contents was, that it was not supported by the real facts of the case. The evidence which had lately been given on the subject before the Committee sitting upstairs should have convinced the hon. Baronet that there was no real ground for his complaints on this question. The sum which had been expended in 1871 in the purchase of stores was only slightly in excess of the sum that had been voted by Parliament for that purpose, and the reason why the expenditure was in excess of the Vote was, that it was thought desirable to keep a six months' supply of a particular class of stores in the dockyards. He believed the decision on the subject had been arrived at by the Secretary to the Treasury before he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) came into office, and by the consent of the Treasury the money was transferred from another Vote. That operation had been largely resorted to by all preceding Governments.

Sir JOHN HAY said, the evidence of the Committee which the hon. Gentleman opposite had just alluded to was satisfactory as regarded the quality of stores; but as to the other matters in question, nothing very definite could be determined until the evidence was completed. Vote 10 was by far the largest sum which had been voted by Parliament under that head for many years, or, perhaps, ever. Probably the whole amount was wanted. The last Vote of the late Government, £892,000, was reduced to £779,000, and considerable sales of stores were made when the present Government came into power. As his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) had frequently observed, a lamentable deficiency in stores was the result of that reduction. He thought it was wrong on the part of the Admiralty to appropriate to the purchase of stores, part of the money that had been voted for the building of ships, as thereby the Admiralty led the country to believe that certain things would happen, which were never realized. For instance, the Admiralty, before the Vote for the building of ships was granted, held out the hope that 20,000 tons of shipping would be built—namely, 12,000 tons of armour-clad and 8,000 tons of wooden shipping. No such amount had been built, and money voted for ship-building had been applied to the purchase of a mere supply of six months' stores in excess of the Vote for Stores.

Mr. HERMON complained that no notice had been taken by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty of the remarks made by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) on the subject of Trotman's anchor. He was alarmed at that statement and hoped the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty would be prepared to give some satisfactory assurance to the Committee upon the subject.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, he took exception to the statement of the hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay), that the Vote for Stores that year was larger than it had ever been. [Sir JOHN HAY qualified his assertion by saying "since 1867-8."] The expenditure for stores in the year in which the Abyssinian Expedition was made, the last year of office of the late Government was £1,085,000, or more than £200,000 in excess of their proposal to Parliament, and larger than the Vote of the present year, when the cost of all kinds of stores had largely increased. He protested against any comparison between the expenditures of different years, unless that element of increased cost was taken into consideration. The Committee had already been informed that the increase of the Vote in the present year was owing entirely to the increase in the cost of coal and metal—a matter over which the Admiralty had no control. In fact, the increase of prices caused an addition of £150,000. With regard to anchors and cables, he could only repeat that it was entirely a professional matter. Officers of the Navy were not in favour of Trotman's anchor, and it was his duty to be guided by their opinion on the subject. Though Trotman's anchor might be admirably suited to merchant ships, it did not necessarily follow that it was suited to the ships of the Navy. He was informed by his professional advisers that though Trotman's anchor held well, it did not bite well. He was willing, however, to undertake that there should be a further investigation of the matter if necessary. The Admiralty was fully alive to the subject of anchors and cables. The question of cables was undergoing an examination by the present Controller and other Naval Lords in conjunction with manufactures of cables.

Mr. G. BENTINCK said, he was glad to hear that the subject of Trotman's anchor was under consideration, in consequence of the numerous casualties which had occurred; but why had it not been considered before? He had heard with great surprise that the naval authorities to whom the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty referred were not satisfied with the biting powers of Trotman's anchors. If such were the fact, it only showed that the highest authorities might differ, because a Commission, consisting of four or five distinguished Admirals and other persons, appointed to investigate practically the relative merits of the different descriptions of anchors, after applying ample tests, reported unanimously in condemnation of the Admiralty anchor as the worst, save one, of all the competing anchors, and as wanting in every essential quality which should distinguish an anchor. They also reported that Trotman's anchor was the best of all, and fully equal to others of much greater weight—a point of much importance in maritime work. Before the Committee of 1861, Admiral Denman said that since 1854, in his experience on board the Royal yacht, he had always found Trotman's anchor hold perfectly, and that it never failed under the most trying circumstances. He added—

"It is vastly superior to the Admiralty anchor in every respect; and I cannot understand why the Admiralty have not more readily supplied these light and more efficient anchors."

Other evidence was to the same effect. He should like to know who were the officers who now objected to Trotman's anchor, in direct contradiction to the results of a test supplied by the Admiralty themselves? It was due not only to Mr. Trotman, but to the Service, that the case should be fully gone into. Mr. Trotman had now no personal interest in the matter, for his patent had expired. He was influenced solely by a desire to benefit the Service, and the safety of Her Majesty's ships required that the matter should not be allowed to remain in abeyance. Hereafter he would move for a Return of the recent Report made respecting these anchors, and presumed that the right hon. Gentleman would not refuse to produce it.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Admiralty had stated that the dockyards were not now denuded of stores; but the complaint made by his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) was, that when the dockyards were so denuded the House was constantly assured that they were full of stores. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) came into office, he abandoned wooden shipbuilding, and sold timber in large quantities. In 1871 a change of policy became necessary; and his hon. Friend's case was that, if the dockyards had not before been denuded of stores, the House would not have been called upon to increase the stock of timber at the enhanced prices of to-day. He could not help thinking that during the last four years there had been, in dealing with this subject, a want of that candour on which the right hon. Gentleman had laid so much stress. It would have been more candid on the part of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty if he had stated that although the dockyards were not now they had been denuded of timber.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he thought it satisfactory that the charge made against the present Board of Admiralty had been abandoned, and that another charge which was equally without foundation had been substituted—namely, that the late Board of Admiralty three years ago had denuded the dock-yards of stores; now, what was the fact? In the year 1867 the stock of timber amounted to £1,500,000, and as the average consumption was only one-tenth of that amount, it followed that the Admiralty had 10 years' stock of timber in hand. That amount was perfectly unjustifiable and caused the greatest possible waste; indeed, the loss arising from the deterioration of timber amounted to several thousands a-year. The noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox) had spoken of the palmy days of Lord Palmerston, and pointed to the accumulations which in those days were made. But what was the result? Why, that they had now on hand no less than 13,000 loads of Italian oak which was unsaleable and unfit for shipbuilding. That was a species of economy which he for one could not advise or approve. The wise policy was to lay in such an amount as was or might reasonably be expected to be required. They had now timber to the amount of £500,000, and the annual consumption averaged £150,000 during the last few years. Of course, the necessary consequence of such an operation was, that they should from time to time make purchases as they had done last year. From the accounts they had received from the dock-yards, he believed they had no reason to apprehend any deficiency of stock. The statement of the noble Lord had, in fact, no greater foundation than many of the statements made by him at a recent meeting at Reading, at which his (Mr. Shaw Lefevre's) rival for the representation of the borough, Mr. Attenborough, attended. He had waited to see whether the noble Lord would repeat those statements in the House; but as he had not done so, it would not be necessary to do more than to give them a general denial. For his part, he thought that during the sitting of Parliament it was the duty of a Member who had complaint to make of the administration of the Government, to make it in the House, and not to go down to particular constituencies, and retail at second-hand those misstatements. He understood the noble Lord the other evening to admit that he had somewhat drawn the long-bow, and, therefore, he would only remind the noble Lord that the House resented any attempt to make political capital out of the Navy. It was far too important a branch of the Service of the country to be allowed to become the shuttlecock of party. Why did the noble Lord make attacks on the Admiralty out of the House, which he did not repeat within its walls? Why was the noble Lord continuous in his attacks upon his (Mr. Shaw Lefevre's) right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) during his illness and consequent absence—attacks which he never ventured to repeat in his presence? Because the noble Lord knew very well that there was no ground for the charges; because he lived in a glass case himself; and, next, because he knew the House would not allow political capital to be made out of the Navy. He hoped the noble Lord would excuse him (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) if he advised him to give up his connection with that troop of itinerants that were now paying visits to the suburban towns, or in future to confine himself in the provinces to the wise course he pursued in that House, where his conduct had been usually cautious and courteous.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: I can only say, Sir, that anything more irregular has never proceeded from any hon. Member of this House, than have been the remarks which have just fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty. Irregular remarks proceeding from any hon. Member of this House are to be deprecated; but when they come from the Treasury bench; from a Gentleman who is supposed to be selected for the position he occupies, because of his superior accomplishments and extra knowledge of the forms of the House, they are doubly to be deprecated. A right hon. Friend of mine, and other hon. Members near me, wished more than once to interfere and put a stop to the unseemly exhibition of alarm which the hon. Gentleman has just displayed as to the safety of his seat for Reading; but I will not enter further into the matter than to say, that I was amused to hear from the hon. Gentleman that I had refrained from making attacks in this House upon the naval conduct of the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers). I thought that, on the contrary, I had taken up too much of the time of the House in doing so, and I frequently curtailed my remarks for fear of interfering with the progress of Public Business. I believe that no other hon. or right hon. Gentleman opposite will charge me with having abstained from challenging the naval administration of the present Government. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty says that I live in a glass house. Well, I can only say that if I do, and that there is no stronger arm in the House than that of the hon. Gentleman to throw a stone at it, I shall remain very comfortably in my glass case to the end of my Parliamentary career.

Mr. WYKEHAM MARTIN suggested that if the 30,000 tons of timber, to which the Secretary to the Admiralty had alluded as unsalable, were unfit for shipbuilding, they should be sold for firewood.

Mr. GOSCHEN denied that there was any indisposition on the part of the Admiralty to introduce new anchors. They had recently introduced two, and were making trial of Trotman's. He thought the hon. Baronet opposite the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) would admit that naval men were not generally in favour of Trotman's anchor.

Sir JOHN HAY observed that with respect to holding power, Trotman's anchor was considered the best; but there was an objection to it in the Navy, in consequence of the difficulty of stowing it.

Mr. HERMON was surprised to hear that there was a large quantity of timber in the shipbuilding yards utterly useless. He could not conceive that any timber, even with the most careless management, could be so deteriorated as to make it necessary that it should be destroyed, like so much tobacco.

Mr. SAMUDA objected to the sale of excessive stores at a sacrifice, if there was a chance of using them; and asked for an explanation of the statement by the Secretary to the Admiralty that there was a large quantity of useless timber in the yards. He thought that, with regard to all these matters of detail in relation to cables and anchors, there were so many circumstances to be taken into consideration, that they ought to be laid before Parliament, and a censure on the conduct of the Admiralty. The anchors used in the Devastation were essentially of the character of Trotman's anchors.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR urged upon the Committee the great importance of abstaining from making expenditure on stores for Army and Navy a party question. Having had the honour to serve under the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) he could speak of the anxiety felt by him to provide the Army with stores, in such quantities as would combine efficiency with economy; and doubtless the present Secretary of State for War had evinced the same desire. As respected the Admiralty, he was favourably impressed from information obtained in "another place," with the efforts made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) in regard to stores. It must be remembered that the change made in the fleet of the country by the recent Admiralty administrations necessitated a change in the character as well as the quantity of stores used. The change had, no doubt, been going on for years, but practically it was only since 1868 that the old establishment of the wooden Navy of four fleets, each of 30 line-of-battle ships, with the due proportion of frigates, and mounting in all 18,000 smooth-bore guns, had been effectually changed into an iron-clad fleet mounting only about 2,200 guns. The experience derived from the previous numerous vessels of the wooden navy, as to the quality, cost, and description of stores required for use, could not be made applicable to the stores of the present iron navy. Indeed, the old and long-established proportions of stores to be kept in reserve for war, could not be adhered to in the present day. These changes in the fleet had therefore raised difficulties in deciding on the outlay to be incurred on stores. It was one of the most difficult operations in Army or Naval administrations to determine the proportions of stores to be maintained in excess of the annual expenditure. It was comparatively easy to settle the amount required to provide all that was to be consumed within the year; but it was entirely different when stores had to be laid in as a reserve for unforeseen emergencies. It was in the loss of stores which became obsolete, that waste was to be expected, and the economy of good administration could best be shown by minimizing the inevitable loss on stores that must deteriorate from long keeping. Now, as regarded the present and past expenditure on stores, he urged on the attention of the Committee that the House could not judge of its propriety; seeing that the money provided was only for laying in stores, and no information was before the House as to their future employment. Until therefore the state of the stores for Army and Navy, as to the remains in stock at the beginning and end of the year, and the receipts and expenditure within the year, were known, these criticisms on money expenditure were of no use.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the timber in question had been purchased for a special purpose, in the construction of ships' frames, but iron was now used for that purpose. A large portion of the timber had been put up for sale, but no purchasers were found for it. Seven hundred loads had, however, been utilized during the last three years, and efforts would be made to turn it to account as speedily as possible.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he deemed it improvident, considering that the teak forests of India were rapidly being exhausted, to sell timber which could not be replaced at the price. As to Italian oak, it was thought important to obtain it in 1862 for heavy screw line-of-battle ships, and when the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty said it could not be used, he ought to be superseded, for with very little ingenuity it might be made serviceable. Unless stronger evidence were adduced, he could not credit the alleged extent of its deterioration, the only deterioration which he knew of arising from the penurious practice of not protecting it from the weather in some of the dockyards. The time of the Committee might be much better occupied than in electioneering matters. Members often visited each other's boroughs, sometimes in peace and sometimes in war, and it should be remembered that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord himself went down to Bristol. [MR. GOSCHEN: By invitation of the Members.] The present Board were struggling against the adverse circumstances bequeathed them by the late First Lord (Mr. Childers) but they had not the fairness to acknowledge that his administration was a failure, and that they were doing their best to repair his errors.

MR. RYLANDS complained of the repetition of charges against his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) which had frequently been refuted. He took little interest in the reeriminations of the two front benches as to which had been the more extravagant, but he maintained that the present expenditure was excessive. Of course, we must keep up our Navy; but that was no justification for buying a large quantity of stores which might become useless, and lead to absolute waste. In a short time, we should probably find the price of coals and the price of iron falling in the market. He, therefore, regarded it as an improvident policy to put on additional men and buy large quantities of materials in order to find them work. He was anxious for the production of the Return, promised by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord, of ships which had vanished from the Navy, and hoped it would comprise the last 15 years, believing it would show that money had been wasted in ships of types which, while they were actually on the stocks, had become obsolete.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that the stock of timber formerly kept in store was about 60,000 loads, it being assumed that 20,000 loads would be necessary for one year's consumption. About 80,000 loads was, he thought, the quantity in store when the late Government left office. What quantity of timber was now in store he did not know, but it was very desirable that the Committee should be informed what was the condition of the wooden ships of the Navy. Unlike his predecessor, the right hon. Gentleman the present First Lord of the Admiralty had recognized the necessity of wooden ships. We had nine frigates now in commission, two building, and 20 in reserve. He should like to know how many of the 20 in reserve were fit for commission. He was led to believe the number was only four. He should also like some information as to how many corvettes, sloops, &c., were fit for commission, as to the cost at which they could be repaired, and whether they were worth repairing? With regard to iron-clads, we now appeared to be reduced to 22 or 23, exclusive of the Devastation and two ships now building.

Mr. MELLOR referred to a Return before him, by which it appeared that the Admiralty had actually re-purchased some of the material of vessels which they had disposed of by private contract.

Mr. LAIRD inquired as to the quantities and value of the stores sold?

Mr. GOSCHEN explained that when stores were sold the proceeds did not go to the Admiralty, but passed to the Exchequer. The increase in the sum for stores this year was due not to any increase in the quantity bought, but to the extraordinary rise in prices. He also denied generally that there had been any undue reduction of stores made by his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), or any undue increase made by himself. The country required a certain number of ships, and if the number was diminished by ships vanishing from the Navy, it was necessary to replace them. He had no Papers then before him by means of which to gratify the natural curiosity of the hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay). As to frigates, the hon. Baronet's statement seemed to be substantially correct. There might be differences of opinion as to whether a frigate was worth repairing or not. No country in the world was, so far as he was aware, at present building frigates, and few were repairing them. Large corvettes, heavily armed, were taking their place. As to sloops, every effort was being made to build them.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £609,366, Steam Machinery and Ships Building by Contract.

LORD HENRY LENNOX complained of the difficulty which he found in making out from the Estimates, in their present state, the sums which were expended on unarmoured vessels built by contract during the year, and the ships on which the money had been laid out. In the year 1872-3 the Admiralty asked for a sum of £106,340 for those ships, and there was a Supplemental Estimate of £18,000, making altogether £124,340. Now, according to a Return which he held in his hand, and which had been moved for by his hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Laird), he found that in that year the Admiralty had ordered 17 new ships, and the total estimate for the first cost was, he found, £182,000, whereas the sum authorized by Parliament was only £124,340. It appeared, however, by the Return before the Committee, that only £152,000 was actually expended. Now, there was no reference made in the Estimates as to any balance, and he understood from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty that we had under Section B a liability this year of £211,411 to complete unarmoured ships already begun, or upwards of £100,000 more than Parliament had authorized. He hoped next year an Appendix would be given to the Vote, something like that attached to Vote 6, and showing what was the work which had really been done in the dockyards, as well as the work done under contract. The Return, too, was drawn up in a somewhat careless manner, because under the head "now building," some 11 vessels were set down which, according to the Return itself, had been completed in 1871.

Mr. GOSCHEN explained that there was some foundation for the remarks of the noble Lord, the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), and that the sum of £211,411 for ships already ordered was a mistake caused by a misprint. He might add that full particulars had never been given with regard to Vote 10, as to ships building by contract, inasmuch as it was not considered by the Admiralty desirable to show contractors at what price the ships had been estimated by the Admiralty. With regard to the past, he was willing to investigate the former Admiralty accounts, in order to see if it could be more accurately shown what had been done during the past two or three years. The increase in the Estimate for the present year, under the head of contracts for building ships, was due to the fact that several contracts had not been entered into last year in consequence of the high prices demanded, and the delay had resulted in a gain of £40,000 to the country. It was, however, necessary that the vessels authorized to be built should be ordered to be commenced by the contractors during the present year, and it was owing to these arrears in the shipbuilding that were included in the Estimates for the present year that the latter showed an increase over those of last year. The increase was also partly owing to the fact that it had been determined to build the corvette Rover by contract, instead of in the Government Dockyards. He complained of the noble Lord opposite, because, in the long list of ships which he alleged had not been completed, he did not give the Admiralty credit for several vessels which had been completed.

Mr. SAMUDA complained of the proportionately small amount of ships which were being built by contract this year as compared with those which were being built in the Royal Dockyards. He did so, because he was convinced that contract ships were built for fully 20 per cent less than the same vessels would cost in the Government Dockyards. This evil, from an economical point of view, was growing worse and worse, as at present, it was only intended to spend £91,000, as against £2,200,000, proposed to be expended in the dockyards.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, the true test of the proportion mentioned by the hon. Member who had just sat down was the amount of tonnage proposed to be built. The hon. Member simply took the amount of new ships, and left out those ordered last year and completed this. The real proportion was this—the Admiralty proposed to build 14,000 tons in the Dockyards, and 6,000 tons by contract, the latter being paid for.

Sir JOHN HAY pointed out that there appeared to be a sum of £100,000 asked for in excess of the amount required for building vessels by contract, and, perhaps, it would turn out next February that this sum had been appropriated to increasing the stores.

Mr. GOSCHEN explained that the whole of the money taken last year had not been spent in shipbuilding. He would place an explanatory Paper on the Table.

Mr. MAGNIAC drew attention to the enormous cost of maintaining compound engines, which would go a long way towards swallowing up the sum saved by those engines by their smaller consumption of coal. He suggested that a Return should be presented to the House showing the cost of maintaining these engines, and how much coal they saved annually.

Mr. MONTAGU CHAMBERS thought the private builders had got the "lion's share" with respect to the building of ships for the Navy, for £144,000 of new work was proposed to be given them altogether, although only £91,000 was to be spent this year.

Mr. RYLANDS said, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) had put himself out of court by the apology he made for the Government the other night, when a proposition was made to reduce the number of men in the Dockyards to 11,000. As, however, they had chosen to employ 13,000 or 14,000 men in them, they must find them something to do, and could not, of course, give out so much contract work. It would seem from the statement of the Government as to a great part of the Vote for the Dockyards and of that for Stores being required for repairs, that the iron-clads were more injurious to each other than to anything else. The Admiralty ought to produce these accounts in such a shape that the Committee might know more accurately what was being done by contract, and what in the dockyards. As it appeared that ships were built in private yards at a cost less by 20 per cent than those built in the dockyards, he thought the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) of purchasing from private yards at least a fifth of the ships added to the Navy was a right policy, and he should like to see it carried out.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, the accounts laid before the Committee were very elaborate and costly. Of the 20,000 tons of shipbuilding required by the Admiralty, 6,000 would be obtained from private yards—that was to say, private builders would build much more than a fourth of the 20,000 tons. Some of the ships built in the dockyards cost less, others more, than those constructed by private firms.

Mr. SAMUDA said, it had been shown before the Committee presided over by the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely), that if a very moderate sum were added for Establishment charges, a vessel would cost £100 per ton in the dockyards, whereas if built by private contract, it would cost very considerably less.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, it must be remembered that the Establishment must always remain for expansion during war. Private shipbuilders might compete with the Royal Yards for the building of a certain class of vessels, though it was doubtful, whether they could build so cheaply. But there was much loose assertion as to the cost of building in the dockyards.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS, as a representative of a dockyard town, could not help saying that much of the work done in the Royal Yards for repairs was rendered necessary by the badness of the shipbuilding work done for the Navy by contract. He maintained that the dockyards, though at one time they were not well managed and the accounts were irregularly kept, were cheaper and produced better work than private yards. He protested, therefore, against attempts to run them down. He held that the time had come for placing the men employed in the steam factories, now a permanent branch of the Service, on the Establishment, they being entitled to equal advantages with the shipwrights and others in the old-fashioned yards.

SIR JOHN HAY wished to know whether the schooners required to regulate the labour traffic in Australia, for which a Supplementary Estimate of £18,000 had been taken, had been completed?

MR. GOSCHEN believed they must be all completed by this time, as they were to have been launched last February. The Estimate of £18,000 taken for them would not be exceeded.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £682,218 New Works, Buildings, Machinery, and Repairs.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE took occasion to urge on the Admiralty the desirability of erecting naval barracks at Portsmouth. They would prove a great comfort to the men, while they would lead to a diminution of crime and to increased regularity in the service.

MR. CANDLISH requested explanations of the four following items:—£1,000 in respect of a permanent hospital to be erected at Portland at a cost of £30,000; £2,000 for workshops in connection with Somerset Dock, at Malta, which would cost altogether £22,000; £1,000 on account of £10,000 for new storehouses at Sydney Garden Island; and £1,000 on account of £10,000 for dredging and forming landing-stages at Port Said.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE stated that the works at Portsmouth undertaken by the contractors would be completed before the end of the financial year, but the work in the hands of the convicts would not be completed so soon. With regard to naval barracks, no decision had been, at present, come to on the point. The land at Port Said had been bought as a coaling station jointly by the Indian and Imperial Governments, and it was intended to embank it also at their joint expense. It was proposed to build a hospital at Portland for the men of the Channel Fleet, and it was intended to utilize the Somerset Dock at Malta by building workshops in accordance with the recommendations of the Parliamentary Committee in 1864.

In reply to SIR JOHN HAY,

MR. GOSCHEN said, in his own personal view, a great deal might be advanced in favour of the establishment of naval barracks, but it was a matter of much importance to the whole of the Admiralty, that he was not prepared to make any statement at that moment, and without consultation with those whose opinions were of the greatest value. In regard to the works at Chatham, too much praise could not be given to the director of those works, for the energy and great intelligence with which he had conducted the whole of the operations, and he was glad to think there would be a surplus on the original estimate.

MR. MACFIE said, that a great deal of money was being spent on defensive works in the Southern part of the Island, but little or nothing was being done north of the Thames, and especially on the east coast. He submitted that defensive works might be erected at a comparative small cost about Queensferry in the Firth of Forth. There was at present before Parliament, a Bill for erecting a bridge across the Firth of Forth, and he hoped the First Lord of the Admiralty would direct his attention to that scheme, in order to see that the bridge was not constructed at such a low level as to prevent vessels of war from passing under it. The height proposed was 150 feet, with an alternative plan of 140 feet, and he doubted very much whether this altitude would prove sufficient for all purposes.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE could hold no hope that any proposal would be made, at all events, for some time, to construct works at the point mentioned by the hon. Member for Leith.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. Goschen

(4.) £70,800, Medicines, Medical Stores, &c.

SIR JOHN HAY suggested that a work recently published by Dr. Fayrer on the subject of wounds from Indian snakes should be supplied to naval hospitals for the information of medical men. He wished a few copies of the book could be obtained and distributed.

MR. GOSCHEN said, his attention had been directed to the subject.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £16,080, Martial Law and Law Charges.

(6.) £105,288 Miscellaneous Services.

LORD HENRY LENNOX called attention to the services rendered by Mr. May, at Portsmouth, who had been rewarded by the miserable pension of £17 a-year.

MR. GOSCHEN said, if a special application were made to the Admiralty it would be favourably considered.

SIR JOHN HAY asked whether it was intended to appoint Naval Attachés at foreign Embassies?

MR. GOSCHEN believed there had only been two permanent Naval Attachés — namely, at Washington and Paris. Instead, however, of continuing them, it had been thought desirable to gather information as to the various European Navies, and Captain Goodenough had given valuable Reports on the French, Italian, and Russian Navies. On his resignation, Vice Admiral Ryder had been deputed to go over the ground again, and he had been in France, and would go to Russia in the summer. [Mr. RYLANDS: Not as a permanent appointment.] No; his engagement would terminate two years hence. Captain Gore Jones would also be sent to Washington, where he would remain some little time.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £847,462, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Half-pay, Reserved and Retired Pay, to Officers of the Navy and Royal Marines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874."

MR. GOSCHEN said, the Vote presented an increase, which was accounted for by certain changes made in the retirement of classes of officers other than those to whom the scheme of his right

hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) applied. A certain number of sub-lieutenants had been promoted to be lieutenants, it being thought undesirable that persons should remain sub-lieutenants more than four years. He wished to state a few points connected with the Vote to which attention had naturally been drawn. It had been stated that the scheme had not diminished the lists as rapidly as his right hon. Friend expected. His right hon. Friend never, however, intended to strain the regulations so as to drive the younger captains off the list by refusing them employment. It would be unfair to diminish the lists by compelling officers to quit the service by such a course. As regarded ago, indeed, the scheme was compulsory; but as regarded a great portion of its attractions it had to be worked voluntarily by the officers. The question, therefore, was how they could offer sufficient inducements to officers to retire? He must repeat that, although the Admiralty were sometimes accused of being over-economical in working the system of retirement, a more liberal scheme than that of his right hon. Friend had never been propounded. It offered larger pecuniary inducements to retirement than any previous scheme. He entirely agreed that it was a matter of most serious importance that they should diminish the number of officers on the Half-pay List; and there were only two ways of doing that; either by employing them or offering them terms of retirement which they would accept. It was impossible to create employment simply to appoint more captains and commanders of ships. He entirely denied that the number of unemployed officers was greater now than in former years. In 1868 there were 171 captains on the Half-pay List; in 1869 the number was 187; in 1870, 199; in 1871, after the retirement scheme, the number was 150; in 1872, 146; in 1873, 139. There were now 139 captains on the Half-pay List, as compared with 171 in 1868. The number of officers unemployed, though large in itself, was therefore small as compared with former years. With regard to commanders the number on the Half-pay List had been 203 in 1868; in 1869, 222; in 1870, 231; in 1871, 157; in 1872, 156; and in 1873, 148. Though there were more officers on the Half-pay List than anyone liked, it was not true that there was anything in the proposal of the Admiralty which had increased this, which was always considered one of the "blots" of the Service. He had seen in several quarters that there was a disposition to put pressure on the Admiralty with a view to reduce the Half-pay List by some further proposal. Now, nothing could be more agreeable to the Admiralty than to receive a proposal by which, through some quick operation, they could place the lists on their normal footing, and give officers more rapid and continuous employment, because nothing could be worse for the efficiency of officers than to remain so long on shore when ships were changing so rapidly. In regard to age, no system of compulsory retirement less stringent would be applicable. If such a proposals as he had seen in some of the public organs—namely, a scheme involving a cost of £18,000 a-year by which the lists would be reduced to their normal numbers, and more continuous employment be provided for officers could be devised, he should regard it with the greatest favour; and Parliament, he thought, would not be disinclined to sanction it. But it required the greatest care and delicacy in examining it, for the more it was looked into the more questionable it would appear whether any rough-and-ready scheme of giving an extra 10 years' service to every officer to induce him to retire, as was done in the Civil Service in cases of compulsory abolition of office, would be satisfactory. All he could say was, if some such scheme would have the desired effect, the Admiralty would most cordially entertain it. He thought it right to make these preliminary remarks in proposing this Vote; for if such a scheme were carried out, a Supplementary Vote would be necessary. He did not consider that officers had now more grievances to complain of under this head than previously; but still he thought the retirement of his right hon. Friend should be helped on by every possible means, and if the Half-pay List could be reduced by any scheme of voluntary retirement the Admiralty would examine it with every wish to effect the object in view.

SIR JOHN HAY suggested that the Vote should be deferred.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [May 23] reported:

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,200,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Claims which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874, for the amounts awarded to the Government of the United States of America under the Treaty of Washington 1871, in satisfaction of the Alabama Claims."

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the said Resolution be now read a second time."

MR. G. BENTINCK in rising, pursuant to Notice, to call attention to the course taken by Her Majesty's Government with reference to the alterations in the International Law sanctioned by them prior to the negotiations, said, that the transactions of which the present Vote might be regarded as the last stage, formed one of the most remarkable episodes in the history of that or any other country. He must express his surprise and regret that they should have arrived at such a stage without having been fully discussed in the House of Commons, and he could not better show in what position we stood when the Alabama Claims were first raised, than by quoting the words of a statesman whose authority in the matter would be regarded as paramount on both sides of the House, both from the position he occupied when the subject came under consideration at the first, and also, because through a long career, he had shown himself eminently qualified to give an opinion upon the question. He alluded to Lord Russell, who, writing to Mr. Adams in December, 1862, said—

"Her Majesty's Government cannot, therefore," having given his reasons, "admit that they are under any obligation whatever to make compensation to the United States' citizens on account of the proceedings of the Alabama."

Nothing could be more clear and intelligible than that statement; but in the face of it, what course did the Government adopt? Lord Russell distinctly stated, and proved, that under existing International Law, the position of England was impregnable, and that she was not liable to pay a shilling, whereas in the statement of the matter referred to arbitration, as understood by the Government, they set forth new rules of International Law under which such liability might be established. The object of the Government, in fact, seemed to have been to frame rules by which England might become subject to a responsibility which could not be established under the previously existing law. They said—

"Her Britannic Majesty has commanded Her Commissioners to declare that Her Majesty cannot assent to the foregoing rules as a statement of principles of International Law which were in force at the time when the Claims mentioned in Article 1 arose; but that Her Majesty in order to evince Her desire to strengthen the friendly relations between the two countries, and to make satisfactory provisions for the future, agrees that in deciding the question between the two countries arising out of those claims, the Arbitrators should assume that Her Majesty's Government had undertaken to act upon the principle set forth in those rules."

Was it possible to conceive a more marvellous course for a great country to adopt? Her Majesty's Government framed an ex post facto law, and stated their willingness to have it assumed that that law existed at the time the claims arose, and their readiness to abide by it. He was much struck by a remark made to him by an hon. and learned Friend on this subject, to the effect that if he had done what the Government had, he should lose every client he had, and be deservedly branded as a fool into the bargain. What said one of the Arbitrators—the Lord Chief Justice—whose remarkable Judgment could not be perused without admiration? Why—

"That the effect of this part of the Treaty was to place the Arbitrators in a position of much difficulty, because obligation for a non-fulfilment of which redress could be claimed, presupposed a prior existing law, under which a right existed on the one side, and a corresponding obligation on the other."

But here they had to deal with obligations assumed to have existed prior to the Treaty, yet arising out of a supposed law created for the present time by the Treaty itself. His Lordship further observed—

"It was to be regretted that the whole subject-matter of this great contest, in law as well as in fact, was not left to be decided by the Arbitrators according to the true principles of International Law at the time when those alleged causes of complaint were said to have arisen."

The Government, in fact, committed a double mistake. The first was that of rendering this country liable under an ex post facto law, and the relinquishing of the impregnable position which they had occupied, and which might have been maintained with perfect justice and in entire accordance with everything due to the honour of this country; the second—an inconceivable blunder on their part—was the notion that by doing so, they were generating a strong feeling of friendship between the two countries. One result of the course they had taken would be to tempt other nations to insult this country and claim damages against it, seeing how easily we yielded in the case to be tried by laws framed for the purpose, and it appeared that the Government could have done nothing more likely to engender bad blood between England and the United States, than this very concession on their part. It was better to speak out plainly than to use the wretched subterfuges, the unmeaning expressions of friendship, adopted by Governments when hostile feelings really existed, and in that view he was supported by a remarkable book written by Mr. Caleb Cushing, in which that gentleman stated that there was in the United States not only a strong feeling of animosity against England, but likewise a feeling of triumph at the victory obtained by the Government of the former over that of the latter. The latter feeling was very natural, for it was a great victory so to have arranged matters that we had been mulcted of £3,200,000, for acts which did not make us indebted to them one shilling, and the excuse for the writer's tone of undue triumph was, that he was unfortunately a native of a country with Republican institutions, so that the high and chivalrous feeling prevailing in diplomatic matters in older and monarchical countries could not be looked for. As to his attack on the Lord Chief Justice of England, no man was better able position of the Government in the matter appeared to him to be untenable. He was not influenced by the fact that the Law Officers of the Crown had advised Her Majesty's Government not to accede to these claims on the part of the British owners who had sustained losses by the Alabama, because he was aware that the opinion of counsel was largely influenced by the manner in which a case was laid before them. The present state of this question was most unsatisfactory, and these claims could not be allowed to remain unsettled. As for the American claims, which had been awarded by the Geneva Arbitration, we must pay the money, and he could not agree that in so doing we should, as had been suggested by some hon. Members, undergo any degradation.

MR. F. S. POWELL expressed his approval of the principle of arbitration as a means of settling international disputes, although there were some points in the negotiations that had occurred between ourselves and America which he did not approve on account of the loose manner in which they had been conducted. At the same time it must be remembered that this was the first occasion when the principle was applied to the affairs of two great nations, and that the circumstances were of a highly complicated character. There was therefore nothing to cause discouragement in the fact that difficulties had arisen in the course of such a transaction. He trusted that the Government would pay the whole of the sum awarded to America by the Geneva Tribunal out of the revenue of the current year, as it was possible that our finances might not remain in so prosperous a condition as they were at present. He objected to the ex post facto Rules that had been agreed to as the foundation of the Geneva Award, and regretted that the language of the Lord Chief Justice, when acting as our Arbitrator, should have been censured by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, instead of being supported by Her Majesty's Government. Another matter to be regretted was, that the Government had not been more urgent in reference to the Fenian Raids; and there was this still further cause for regret, that the Arbitrators were not allowed to choose an intermediate channel at San Juan. The fact that this channel was not navigable appeared to him an argument in favour of it as a desirable boundary. He rejoiced in the fact that the Arbitration had been submitted to, as it had produced a very friendly feeling between the two countries, and had put an end to all present danger of ruptures between England and America. These dangers were past; he hoped there were no dangers to come. But he was not free from fear lest the settlement, satisfactory as it might seem at the moment, should ultimately prove the cause of grave complications in international relations.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that until quite recently he had thought it would be well that this Vote should be allowed to pass without comment. But, of course, it was open to any hon. Member of the House to take—and, perhaps, not unlikely that some hon. Members would take—the opportunity, when this Vote came on, of challenging the whole question; and he himself certainly would not be at all disposed to find any fault with his hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck), either for having called attention to the subject, or on account of the general character of the remarks which, from the point of view he had taken, he had thought fit to make. He himself, however, should not have taken part in this discussion but for the pointed references made to him by one or two speakers, and especially the question which had been put to him by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson). He must really ask the indulgence of the House for anything he might say on this matter. He felt that he was in a position of very great difficulty. He accepted the appointment—the very honourable appointment—of one of the Commissioners in 1871, at the request of a Government with which he was not connected, for the purpose of carrying through what he believed then, and what he still believed, to be a work of great national importance. He found himself with Colleagues officially connected with the Government, and who, of course, had much greater authority than himself on matters in which the sentiments of the Government were concerned. And the Commissioners as a body found themselves in this remarkable position—which, probably, never had been the position of any other negoof national degradation, as was presented in that transaction.

Mr. GREGORY thought that, although the payment of that money was a foregone conclusion, it was well that the country should have before it the circumstances under which that liability was incurred. The hon. Member then traced the course of the negotiations from the beginning, as given in the official Correspondence, and expressed his belief that if Her Majesty's Government had adhered to the line originally adopted by Lord Derby and Lord Clarendon, and insisted on a clear basis being laid down for any Treaty which might be concluded, much of the difficulty and the unfriendly discussion which had occurred between the two countries would have been avoided. The eagerness with which the Government had entered into the negotiations must have led the Americans to suppose that we were willing to accept terms less favourable than had been before insisted on, and therefore they proposed to raise them. He also thought it much to be regretted that the full powers and confidence which, according to the terms of their appointment, were to be given to the Commissioners, were not ultimately reposed in them. The Government had hurried them off, and when they refused, as was natural and proper, to accept the proposals of the American Commissioners, the Government repudiated that sensible decision, and assented to principles upon which all these liabilities had arisen. He thought no man of any legal experience in that House could remember a case in which an ex post facto law had been employed to control an antecedent state of things. He should have been ashamed of himself, and should deserve to lose any professional reputation he might possess, if he had ever consented to such a settlement. It was not only an unprecedented but a monstrous settlement, and he thought the House should enter its decided protest against the principles on which it was based.

Mr. ANDERSON said, he saw the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) in his place, and he should like him to explain what up to this time had never been explained, and that was—why the surrender of General Lee was taken to be the end of the war, after which no claim on behalf of British subjects was allowed to be brought forward? Now, the surrender of General Lee was not the end of the war, because three Confederate armies were in the field for weeks afterwards, and damage was done to British property after the date of the surrender. Surely, the proper end of the war ought to have been taken from the period fixed by the American Courts in dealing with cases amongst their own subjects. He could not help thinking that the Americans got the better of us in the late negotiations, with regard to that portion of the subject. The noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Viscount Enfield) had been asked whether British claims arising out of the Alabama depredations were to be considered, and he replied that they were going on; the noble Lord, however was mistaken, for the claims now under consideration at Washington were not British claims arising from Alabama depredations, but counter claims for a totally different thing. But the question at issue was not confined to the destruction of American ships and goods by the Alabama; and he regretted to find that while the Government were going to pay America over £3,000,000 for the damages inflicted on American subjects by the Alabama, yet they were not going to pay for the damages sustained by British subjects. The Alabama burnt a number of vessels in which British cargoes were stowed. He had heard of an instance in which an American ship loaded with British goods of the value of £5,000, belonging to a constituent of his, having been boarded by Captain Semmes, the captain of the ship had informed him that the goods in the vessel were British and not American, and showed him the papers signed by the British Consul. Whereupon Captain Semmes said, he knew that very well; but, nevertheless, he told his lieutenant to take out of the ship what he wanted and then to burn her, which was accordingly done. If we were obliged to pay for damages sustained by the Americans by reason of the conduct of the Alabama, why were we not equally bound to pay for the damages sustained by our own subjects by reason of the acts of that vessel? He had that night asked for the production of the Opinion of the Law Officers, in which they had enunciated that doctrine; and he was sorry it was not produced, for the Act of 1870 was under discussion, and moreover that the Rules embodied principles coinciding very closely with principles on which Lord Russell and the Government of the day professed themselves willing to act; and therefore he (Sir Stafford Northcote) could not admit that the Commissioners took an ex post facto view of the case. At the same time the expression in the Treaty, to the effect that Her Majesty's Government did not admit these Rules to have been rules of International Law at the time, was one which he did not like, and was fitted to produce the misunderstanding which had since arisen. If anybody would read the decision of the Arbitrators, he would find that with the exception of the Lord Chief Justice, they held that the Rules as they stood added nothing to International Law; and upon the merits of the general question, even if these Rules had not been laid down, the decision of the majority would have been precisely the same as it was. The Lord Chief Justice, on the other hand, would have decided that we had not committed any violation of International Law, as it was understood before the Rules were laid down. But then, the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice upon the facts of the case would have been, that we had not exercised that vigilance which we ought to have exercised, and which Lord Russell in his despatches at the time always expressed himself desirous of exercising. That position would have been a most unpleasant one, and it was far better, then, that we should have endeavoured before going to arbitration to come to an understanding with the United States as to what we really wished, for the sake of this country and of civilized countries generally, should be held to be International Law for the future. Well, then, what was the substance of those Three Rules? The substance of the Three Rules, their intent and animus, was to prevent, for the future, that which we endeavoured to prevent, but entirely failed in preventing when the Alabama escaped. There was no country more interested than our own in preventing the sending out of privateers or vessels of that character from neutral ports. We believed that the great object to be gained by means of this settlement was not so much to obviate a quarrel with America, as to get a good rule for the future, which should free commerce from the dangers to which it had been exposed. He moreover wished it to be understood, that it was on every account most desirable that that sort of ill-feeling which had been engendered between the two countries should be set at rest; not that there was any idea whatever of this matter leading to a war between the two countries, but what it would lead to was obvious enough in the negotiations about a wholly different matter. In the case of the Canadian Fisheries, upon which it was most important that there should be a good understanding between the two countries, we found that a sort of soreness which was felt by the Americans really prevented practical and good arrangements being made. Therefore, it was most important that good relations should be restored between the two countries, and the whole scope, spirit, and tendency of the Treaty of Washington was to establish such relations, and to lay down satisfactory Rules with respect to commerce for the future. He did not deny that what had happened since had been in many respects unsatisfactory. Reference had been made to discussions of last year, which we all viewed with great pain, and which we should be happy, so far as possible, to forget. He, however, was not at all anxious that we should huddle up and put certain misunderstandings out of sight, for it was much better if we thought there was anything wrong in the language used by the Americans, as, for instance, last year, with respect to the Indirect Claims, or recently, with regard to any indications that might have been given as to the result of the Arbitration, that these matters should be temperately and fairly discussed, and cleared up, if possible. Having gone so far, therefore, it would be a great pity if we allowed ourselves to stop short of a clear and satisfactory arrangement of this question of International Law; and though some few persons in America, in a prominent position, had uttered expressions which he thought deserved the reprobation they had received in this country, he believed the great mass of the Americans themselves felt quite as much annoyance and sorrow that such pretensions should have been put forward. The House was now about to pass this Vote, and it was really no matter of regret that some discussion should have occurred upon it; but he hoped that the House and the country would feel that we ought not to allow any sense of having been losers by the Arbitration, or in some respects not having been met in the way we hoped, to interfere with our passing it in a cordial manner. It was for the interest of this country and of the civilized world generally that we should be on cordial relations with America, and he believed that these relations could only be maintained on two conditions—the one that we should be uniformly courteous and considerate in our dealings with them, and the other that we should not be afraid to speak out plainly, when we thought that they were, as they sometimes were, in the wrong.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE said, he did not grudge any money we had to pay on account of the Alabama, because he believed our Government made a great mistake in not taking more effectual measures to prevent the escape of that vessel. He was very much of opinion, however, that other countries besides America—France, for instance—had suffered from the depredations of the Alabama, and he was afraid that we should be called upon to pay their losses also. There were certain of our own countrymen who suffered losses in the War, and although the Law Officers of the Crown asserted the non-liability of our Government to pay these losses, he very much doubted whether the assertion, though it might be based upon strict law, could be considered to be based on national justice or on natural justice. If compensation were paid to the foreigner for his ship, surely the subject should be compensated for the cargo carried in that ship. In these remarks he was looking forward to another question that must arise—namely, how far the Arbitration in which we had engaged rendered us liable to further extension of our liability. If the effect of an Arbitration upon a neutral Power was to render that Power liable to every species of loss, then every Power that was injured ought to be re-imbursed for the loss which it had incurred. Unless that were so, no great Power would in future resort to arbitration. If we believed the plan of arbitration to be the method by which we were to get rid of all wars, and find ourselves in halcyon days, he doubted whether the advantages of arbitration had not been overrated.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, It would have been advantageous if this Vote had been agreed to without discussion, but still I cannot complain that hon. Members have taken this opportunity of expressing their views upon it, and certainly I cannot complain of the course taken by the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck). On the contrary, I am bound to tender the hon. Member and his Friends my thanks for the very considerate manner in which they have conducted the discussion. I desire, in the first place, to disclaim, on the part of the Government, all responsibility for the expressions which have been ascribed to the hon. Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Glyn), and I must also take exception to the hon. Gentleman's view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's feeling on this subject. The hon. Gentleman seems to think the Chancellor of the Exchequer exults in opportunities for throwing away £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 of surplus, and feels it to be in the nature of absolute relief. Liberal and open-handed as my right hon. Friend is, I do not think he would carry his generosity to such a degree of extravagance; and as regards the hon. Member for Shaftesbury, I do not think he made use of the expressions that are put into his mouth by the hon. Gentleman. Perhaps, however, it is not necessary to enter into these matters, which are really by-gones, but as regards the Treaty of Washington, I consider the observations made upon it have been stated with perfect fairness, though on the other hand, the hon. Gentleman says it was a great and capital blot on the Government of this country, that the Washington Treaty was not set aside when the Indirect Claims were preferred. That opinion I cannot regard as either absurd or extravagant, but I must say it is unsound. The question in a great measure depended upon the presumption of good faith. One party thought the Claims within the scope of the engagement, and the other considered they were not. It was impossible in our view to conceive of a more gigantic error than was made by the American Government in importing the Indirect Claims into the Treaty, for as was shown by the documents of the British Government, they were so enormous, that it was incredible anybody could seriously advance them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) has stated that they were estimated at £100,000,000, and in my reply to that right hon. Gentleman, I have stated that the description was, I believed, within the mark. In fact, it was difficult to limit the number of millions to which these Claims extended, but the question is, were they advanced in good faith? If we could have shown they were advanced in bad faith, then we should have been justified in withdrawing from the Treaty altogether; but some allowance ought to be made. We have been blamed for not having used forensic statements and arguments, but such weapons have their dangers as well as their advantages. We were bound to give credit to the American Government for the same good faith as we ourselves were actuated by. If we had done what the hon. Gentleman complains was not done, we should have exposed ourselves to the most serious charges of having tampered with those principles of honour and truth which I am sure he would be the first to deplore. The hon. Gentleman went on to say that the honour of this country should never be submitted to arbitration. That is a sound doctrine, but the honour of the country has not been challenged. I am of opinion that the honour of a country should never be submitted to arbitration. It may be said that Lord Russell thought that the honour of the country had been challenged; but I feel sure that the Governments which succeeded those of Lord Palmerston and Lord Russell did not proceed upon that view, or that the honour of the country should be submitted to arbitration. Indeed, if the question had been the truth of a charge of wilful departure from national obligation, we should never have thought of going to arbitration. There are, however, some on the other side of the Atlantic who believe the neutrality of the British Government was insincere, and that it was challenged on that account, but we did not go to arbitration on that ground. The question whether a Government's subordinates had exercised all the care and diligence the case required, was a question quite apart from the honour and intentions of the Government, and that was the question submitted. Then the hon. Gentleman asks why the Arbitrators decided upon the Claims of the United States before they considered the British Claims against the United States? The hon. Gentleman is in error in supposing it was intended to give such precedence, or that precedence was actually given to the Alabama Claims over private claims. The Alabama Claims were public claims, arising between the two Governments; the other Claims were made by citizens of the United States against the British Government. The arbitration upon these private claims undoubtedly lasted much longer than the Arbitration at Geneva, and no wonder; because whereas at Geneva, there were only a small number of questions for decision, the cases for decision at Washington are exceedingly numerous, and may be counted by hundreds, if not even by a larger figure, and so far from there having been delay in carrying these cases to arbitration, as compared with the Alabama Claims, the arbitration upon the private claims at Washington began long before the proceedings at Geneva. They began, I think, in October, 1871, and have since been conducted with as much expedition as it was in the power of the Commissioners to use. Then the hon. Gentleman refers to the Fenian Raids, and complains that they were not included in the Treaty of Washington, founding upon this complaint, the further observation that a great wrong was thereby done to Canada, and must be felt by our fellow-subjects in the Dominion. Now, the conclusion at which the Government arrived was, that it was not part of their duty to insist that the Fenian Raids should be made subjects of discussion and settlement along with the other matters included in the Treaty. It would, however, be a mistake to suppose that the Government on that account forfeited their title to bring forward claims arising out of the Fenian Raids, and nothing has at any time been said or done by the Government to weaken their title to claim compensation from the United States on account of the Fenian Raids. The only question we decided was, as to the propriety, or at any rate the necessity, of mixing up the consideration of this subject with the other questions included in the Treaty. It is quite true that the Government have made a separate claim upon the United States in the matter of the Fenian Raids; but that fact does not bear upon the credit or the discredit of the Treaty. The Treaty of Washington did not surrender, and did not include these claims.

MR. G. BENTINCK: Why did it not include them?

MR. GLADSTONE: I need not now go back to the considerations which influenced the decision of the Government, because Parliament knew well what our decision was, and did not press us to include in the Treaty the question of the Fenian Raids; and I say that that claim, whatever it may be, suffered no prejudice whatever from the proceedings in connection with the Treaty, but stood upon its own merits after, as it did before, the conclusion of the Treaty. Then, again, Sir, I wish to remove an entire misapprehension—that the non-inclusion of this claim in the Treaty was a wrong done to Canada. The question as regards Canada was a question of money. Canada was informed by the British Government that we were perfectly ready to recognize her claim for the damage done by the Fenian Raids; and the Canadians, so far from being discontented, appeared by no means disinclined to entertain that view of the matter. The losses they suffered were fully discussed between the Government of the Dominion and this country, and the question of a money payment was considered, but the views of the Canadians rather inclined to a different form of compensation. It finally resolved itself into an Imperial guarantee for the purposes of a great work in the Dominion; and the Canadian Government recognized this guarantee as in full satisfaction of any losses sustained through the Fenian Raids. The hon. Member, then, should bear in mind that the Canadian Government had nothing to complain of in the shape of pecuniary losses from Fenian Raids, for which they had received ample compensation—and I apprehend that they think so too. Further, Canada herself had a far greater interest than any other part of the Empire in the conclusion of the Treaty of Washington. The Fishery question alone continually menaced the peace of Canada. No doubt, it also menaced the relations of this country and the United States; but Canada had the most direct and vital interest in the speedy and complete settlement of all these questions. So far, then, from admitting that the Treaty of Washington ought to be a subject of dissatisfaction in Canada, or that it is a subject of dissatisfaction there, I believe that the Canadian people do not view the Treaty at all in the same light as the hon. Member, and that great satisfaction prevailed throughout the Dominion at the settlement of these alarming and menacing differences. Let me, further, remind the hon. Member that Canada possesses a free and effective Parliamentary Government, and that Government has had its conduct tested since the Treaty was concluded. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire has paid a just tribute to a distinguished Member of the Canadian Ministry whose recent loss we all deplore; and the test applied at the elections to the conduct of the Government has been to give it the approval, and not the disapproval, of the people of the Dominion. The hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) has stated that Her Majesty's Government repudiated the acts of their Commissioners. He has nothing upon which to found this extraordinary statement, except a passage in the published Correspondence, in which the Commissioners stated that they were limited by their instructions in a certain matter, and that with regard to a demand made by the American Commissioners, they would refer it home for the instructions of their Government. The question was referred home, and the effect of the reference home was a modification of the ground previously taken by the British Commissioners under their instructions, but that does not give the smallest colour to the assertion of the hon. Gentleman that the British Government repudiated the act of their own Commissioners. A point of greater importance was his statement, that the fatal error of the negotiations was, that we allowed our conduct to be judged by an ex post facto law, and that, in consequence of such assent on our part, the country has been not only condemned to pay a very large sum of money, but likewise stands discredited and dishonoured by the condemnation. Now, I agree with the hon. Gentleman—if our liability for this payment accrues in consequence of any gross error of that kind, the payment does in itself imply a great deal of discredit, as well as mere pecuniary loss. But we do not admit the main proposition of the hon. Gentleman; we deny that we consented to be judged by an ex post facto law. There are various points to be considered in this connection. First, was the Award made at Geneva either in whole or in part due to the operation of the Three Rules? [Mr. GREGORY: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member evidently thinks it was; I do not presume to say that the declarations made at Geneva give us the means of saying with absolute certainty that it was not, but the opinion of many of those who are most competent to judge, and who have most carefully and completely mastered the effect of the whole proceedings at Geneva is, that the Three Rules did not either in whole or in part bring about the Award; that if the Three Rules had not been included in the Treaty the Award would have been the same; and that the Award depended upon the Arbitrators' view of the obligations of International Law, not upon the principles embodied in the Three Rules.

Mr. GREGORY: The right hon. Gentleman will remember that the words "due diligence" run through the decision of the Arbitrators.

Mr. GLADSTONE: That is perfectly true, but it is also perfectly immaterial. What can be more trivial or indefinite than the stress laid here upon the words "due diligence!" They are quoted as if they involved some new and unheard-of principle. But surely it is mere matter of course—the mere A B C of international duty—that whenever obligations are cast upon a State, due diligence—that is to say, common ordinary care, must be shown in the discharge of those obligations. But suppose that the Three Rules were responsible, as I do not admit they were, for the Award, did we on that account suffer any injustice? Were they, as regards us, an ex post facto law? I say, they were not. We deemed that they formed part of the International Law at the time the Claims arose, but we never denied that they constituted part of our own obligation. We had a municipal law, the execution of which we ourselves recognized as part of our duty to America, and the true construction of which, though it was not admitted in the Courts, was in strict accordance with the terms of the Three Rules.

Mr. Gladstone

It was the standard of duty we ourselves set up for ourselves, although we had not taken it as part of the International Law. It was not, therefore, an ex post facto law so far as regards us, but a new form of expression given to that which we had recognized as part of our own duty. Why was that form of expression used? Because the great advantage of this proceeding was to make some approximation to the International Law of the future, and we knew that the concurrence of those two great countries would be a great step achieved towards the incorporation of those Rules in the general Code which binds nations together. Therefore, I hope the hon. Gentleman will, at least, understand that to be our view. We, in no degree, admitted them to be an ex post facto law. We look upon that as a vulgar error which widely prevails in the popular mind—prevails, at least, to some extent, and no wonder it should, when supported by authority so respectable as that of the hon. Gentleman, but it is one which for the sake of the common sense and intelligence of the country ought to be dispelled. Sir, the hon. Member for West Norfolk summed up all his difficulties and objections, by stating that we did not owe a shilling, and consequently had undergone humiliation and degradation without precedent by being placed in a position in which we have to pay a great deal. Probably we may all think that a severe view was taken of our case at Geneva. That is a sentiment which it is most natural we should entertain. But let us remember that we are not the most impartial judges in our own case, and that the Arbitrators have, at least the presumption of impartiality. We must also bear in mind that high authorities here, before arbitration, declared publicly that if arbitration resulted, we should have to pay a considerable sum. It is but fair to remember these things on behalf of Arbitrators to whom our obligations are admitted for having undertaken a case of such interest to us both. But suppose it is true that we have to pay more than a temperate, or perhaps I should rather say exact, view of our conduct would have awarded. At any rate, that excess is one which, although it tells against us for the moment, will tell in our favour in the long run. The interest of this country is in the strictness of the Code, not in its relaxation, and it is highly for our interest that the obligations of neutrals in regard to the escape of cruisers from their ports should be highly estimated, strictly defined, and rigidly enforced. We should, therefore, remember that whatever may be considered the undue strictness of this judgment—if there be undue strictness—it is certainly a fault not likely to be injurious to us, but the contrary, in the long run. But we must look a little higher than the precise question whether the Arbitrators exactly hit the mark. They accompanied their Judgment with a multitude of propositions which have become the subject of debate, but these are in our view the preamble of the sentence, and have no relation to the general law on the subject. The hon. Gentleman will not, I am sure, forget that if we look beyond the mere question of success and failure, there are important deductions to be borne in mind. Suppose the position of the two countries with respect to the Indirect Claims were reversed, and that the hon. Gentleman, instead of being, as he is, a patriotic Member of the House of Commons, was a patriotic Member of the American Congress. What would he have thought of the position of his own Government with respect to those Indirect Claims? Because he will bear in mind that the Indirect Claims were not waived. They were excluded, and therefore repelled not on the merits, but on principle, by the Arbitrators. I am endeavouring to find some soothing consideration for the hon. Gentleman. He will have the satisfaction of bearing in mind, also, that although we are going to pay a large sum, it is not the sum asked for by the Government of America at Geneva. Well, that is some consolation. The damages claimed were between £8,000,000 and £9,000,000, the damages given were between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000, a large sum certainly; but instead of voting $40,000,000 the hon. Member will have to vote only $15,000,000. In our view, whether in that respect the judgment is a right or accurate judgment, or whether some considerations may not have been pressed against us beyond what exactitude would warrant—that, in our view, is a very small matter. It is a small matter compared with the cost of war; it is a small matter compared with the value of the goodwill and the improved and peaceful relations subsisting, and happily likely to subsist, between this country and America. I have heard the criticism of my hon. Friend behind me upon the Government of America, and we are told that that Government is not in the right hands. Well, there are a great number of people who think that the Government of England is not in right hands. We ought not to rest the case too much upon criticisms of that sort. It is not easy to understand the entire spirit of the institutions of a country, and unless we do, criticisms upon particular features of them are apt to mislead. If it be true that there are many of the most illustrious citizens of America who do not hold public offices of responsibility; on the other hand, it is admittedly true, as we have seen in the case of the Trent and other cases, that the Executive Government in America does enjoy a very considerable independence, and it is, again, a purely vulgar error which prevails on this side of the water, to suppose that the pressure of the mob or the afflation of the moment governs as a matter of course the proceedings of the authorities in America. I believe that to be entirely wrong. I believe in the genial, cordial, good feeling of the bulk of the American people towards this nation, from which it springs. I believe, also, that whatever be the defects of the American institutions—and, of course, they are defective like our own and all others—they will suffice to give such expression to the good feeling of the American people as will powerfully tend to maintain good and cordial relations between the two countries. Sir, it is a great happiness to see this serious and menacing cause of alienation and estrangement, if not of war, removed by a great international arrangement. Naturally, we wished, as Englishmen, to win at Geneva—I did for one—probably all of us did; but any amount of disappointment we may feel at the result is but an inconsiderable deduction for the satisfaction attendant upon an arrangement which removes such causes of difference between two great countries like England and America, and does so much, as I contend, for mankind at large by the example it sets of a peaceful settlement of disputes as a substitute for the bloody arbitrament of war.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, it had never been his lot to hear a statement more bewildering and unsatisfactory than that which had just been made by the Prime Minister, and he felt the House was indebted to his hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck) for his courage in speaking the plain truth upon the Washington Treaty, when the subject was sought to be stifled by the occupants of front benches. Availing himself of this, the legitimate opportunity for a discussion upon the results of the Treaty, and before the usual answer of "You are too late" could be given, he desired to ask the Government and to press for their answer, what were their intentions with regard to the communication of the Three Rules to Foreign Powers? The policy of the Government, was in a state of uncertainty, extremely injurious to the maritime interests of this country; and it was absolutely incumbent upon the Government to announce, without further delay, whether an attempt was to be made to maintain these Rules, or whether they were to be dropped in ignominious silence. He was afraid that in this respect, as well as in all others, the Treaty would prove a failure—as a failure it was admitted to be—by Members of all parties except the occupants of the Treasury bench—and indeed they were by no means strong in any opinion to the contrary. But his main object in troubling the House at that late hour was to argue and maintain that the disasters which had occurred were due to the unconstitutional course pursued by the Government in not submitting this Treaty for the consideration and ratification of Parliament after it had been approved by the Cabinet on behalf of the Crown. A section of the House of whom the hon. Members for Warrington and Kirkealdy were amongst the exponents, maintained the doctrine that all Treaties should be submitted to Parliament for ratification. He would give no opinion upon these views which, whether right or wrong, did not touch the Treaty of Washington, for this was a Treaty which was, by the leading principles of our constitution, under the control of Parliament, because the Crown, as of strict right, could in no case "engage to pay money" without the authority of the House of Commons. He had ventured to urge this point upon the Government so early as the Address in answer to the Queen's Speech last Session, when the First Minister admitting his (Mr. Bentinck's) case, urged that the Government—

"In concluding the Treaty on their own responsibility, had a right to assume that Parliament as well as the country approved the general principle of a reference of these unfortunate differences to impartial arbitration."

But granting the right hon. Gentleman's argument, it failed to meet his (Mr. Bentinck's) objection, which applied, not to the general principle of arbitration, but to the particular principles established by this Treaty. The policy of the Government had been unconstitutional at the commencement, and unhappy and unfortunate in its termination, and was carried on, moreover, in distinct violation of all precedents, for it had never been assumed by the Crown in any similar case that Parliament would, as a matter of course, vote the money. He would cite two instances only in support of his argument. In 1815, when the Treaty by which the Russo-Dutch loan was guaranteed in pursuance of the Treaty of Vienna, an article expressly provided that the King would "engage to recommend to his Parliament" to pay the money. In 1857, when the Baltic Sound dues were altered, an article in the Treaty again provided that Her Majesty "engaged to recommend to her Parliament to pay;" and during the Session of that year a Resolution was submitted to the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for effectuating the provisions of the Treaty, and carried after no small opposition by the late Mr. Williams and other hon. Members below the gangway. If, in like manner, the Treaty of Washington had been constitutionally dealt with, Parliament would have jealously guarded the interests of the country, and advantageous results would have followed—the Three Rules would have been repudiated, we should have saved the Island of St. Juan, and what was of more importance, we should have obtained an impartial and efficient Arbitration. He could conceive no greater want of due diligence on the part of the Government than their assent to the nomination of the three independent Arbitrators who sat at Geneva. He would not for a moment cast any imputation upon them—he believed them to have discharged their duties with honesty, honour, and impartiality—

but they were unfitted for their office by want of sufficient acquaintance with English law and the English language. The Prime Minister had that evening proved the case against himself when he admitted that the judgment of the majority of the Arbitrators was formed independently of the Three Rules, for it was a matter of common notoriety that according to English law we could not have been held liable for a shilling, unless for the retrospective action of these Rules, and this was the ground upon which the Lord Chief Justice decided the single case of the Alabama against us. And yet, notwithstanding these considerations, the right hon. Gentleman said the Rules had no operation, and that whether adopted or not, we should still have had to pay the money. Was there ever a conclusion so preposterous? Had Parliament obtained its due control, care would have been taken to nominate efficient Arbitrators, and the ordinary rule of a fair arbitration would have been followed by the appointment of an Umpire upon the well-known principle, "no umpire no arbitration," and thus additional security for a right decision would have been obtained. Allusion had been made to the professional career of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory). He (Mr. Bentinck) would plainly say, that if that hon. Member, or any other solicitor, had in a private case submitted a similar question to similar arbitrators, he would have been open to the charge of simple idiocy, if not indeed to a charge of a more serious nature. The real secret of the transaction was that the Treaty and Arbitration were the creatures of political exigency — that they were adopted by the Government in the erroneous belief that the exploded doctrines of the late Mr. Cobden and of the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) still had hold upon the country. Therefore they were determined to secure peace at any price, no matter how ignominious the conditions. The truth of this view was established by the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), who had with frankness and even simplicity, admitted that evening that he and his Colleagues sat, as High Commissioners, at the end of a telegraph wire, and that they derived all their inspirations from the Government, to one effect only—"Sign the Treaty whatever the terms imposed." He (Mr. Bentinck) was quite satisfied that the true opinion of the House, and the true opinion of the country, were adverse to the humiliating and un-English policy of the Government; but though their country had, by the machinations of the Manchester school, been degraded to the rank of a third-rate power, inasmuch, as had been testified by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), that it was almost impossible for a British subject now to obtain relief against injury by a Foreign Power, he hoped and believed there might be better days in store, and that old England would again assert her strength and resume her position, in spite of the enmity and envy of other nations and the incapacity of her Government.

(Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Childers, Mr. Arthur Peel.)

[BILL 171.] LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Lords' Amendments considered.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the Amendments made by the Lords in this Bill were merely formal, with one or two exceptions.

First Amendment agreed to.

Page 2, line 40, "after Clause 4, insert Clause (A) (Commissioners not to be interested in Railway or Canal stock)," the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. W. N. HODGSON proposed, after the Lords Amendments relating to the qualification of Commissioners, to insert words providing that no Commissioner should be in any way interested in, or directly or indirectly carry on any business which would tend to his emolument or profit.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of Clause (A), to add the words "nor shall any such Commissioner be interested in, or directly or indirectly carry on, any trade or business for his own emolument or profit."—(Mr. Nicholson Hodgson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

R

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "be interested in, or directly or indirectly."

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, after the words "carry on," to insert the words "or exercise."—(Mr. Gregory.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the words 'nor shall any such Commissioner carry on or exercise any trade or business for his own emolument or profit,' be added to Clause (A)."

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE admitted that the feeling of the House was in favour of some limitation of the kind, but he was not prepared off-hand to accept this particular form of words. He would, therefore, promise to consider the subject, but for that purpose it would be necessary to postpone the further consideration of the Lords' Amendments.

Amendment, as amended, by leave, withdrawn.

JURIES (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 166.]
(The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time said, its object was to carry out the recommendation of the Select Committee, by raising the qualification of special and common jurors in Ireland. The measure was only a temporary one, and would in no way interfere with the power of Parliament to deal with the whole subject on some future occasion.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow at Two of the Clock.

BLACKWATER BRIDGE [COMPOSITION OF DEBT] BILL—and BLACKWATER BRIDGE BILL.

Resolution [May 23] reported;

"That it is expedient to authorise the Commissioners of the Treasury further to reduce the Composition for the public debt due by the Commissioners of the Bridge across the River Blackwater, near the town of Youghal, in the county of Cork, and to make provision for transferring the said Bridge to the Grand Juries of the counties of Cork and Waterford."

Resolution agreed to:—Bills ordered—Blackwater Bridge (Compensation of Debt)—to be brought in by MR. BAXTER, and MR. WILLIAM HENRY GLADSTONE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 177.]

And—Blackwater Bridge—by MR. MONTAGUE GUEST and SIR JOHN ESMONDE.

COLONIAL CHURCH BILL [H.L.]—(No. 118)
(The Lord Blachford.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD BLACHFORD, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time said, the colonial Church was suffering under two grievances—one might be called the Episcopal, the other the clerical grievance. With regard to the former, the Crown had by Letters Patent created colonial bishoprics, giving to the Bishops and their successors a corporate character and diocesan jurisdiction, and it had continued these corporations, as vacancies occurred, by similar Letters Patent. The Judicial Committee had decided in the Natal case that where independent Legislatures have existed the Crown had had no power of giving this jurisdiction, and the Crown had in consequence discontinued the issue of Letters

Patent, not only in these but in all other cases. The consequence was, that the legal mode of continuing these corporations being no more, the corporations themselves would come to an end, and the endowments of the bishoprics would be left without any legal owners. The Bill enabled the Crown to remedy this injustice, by enabling the future elected Bishops to succeed to the endowments of the patented Bishops. This was to be done on application of the clergy and laity of the diocese, made through the Bishop, with sufficient notice to objectors—important objections to be referred to a committee of the Privy Council. The clerical grievance arose under an Act of 59 Geo. III., which declared that a clergyman ordained by a colonial Bishop, not having jurisdiction or not residing in his diocese, should not be thereby made capable—

“in any way or on any pretence whatever of holding preferment in her Majesty’s dominions, or of officiating in any place or in any manner as minister of the Established Church of England and Ireland.”

As re-ordination was out of the question, an ordination which qualified disqualified; and this clause inflicted a permanent incapacity on those whom it struck. It struck clergy ordained by Bishops declared by the Natal judgment to have no jurisdiction; and it further struck all clergy ordained by colonial Bishops hereafter appointed, who in the absence of Letters Patent would have no jurisdiction cognizable by law—except so far as that jurisdiction was accidentally supplied, if it ever was or could be supplied, by colonial legislation. It therefore incapacitated in this sweeping and stringent way a large, an increasing, and, what was almost worse, an unascertainable body of colonial clergymen. This grievance might be removed by little more than a prospective and retrospective repeal of the statute which inflicted it. But to do no more than this would merely be to add a patch to a piece of patchwork alike unjust and confused, which would bear no more mending [to show this the noble Lord read a short summary of the results of the existing law,] and which might be reduced to order by a single firm touch of common sense. Ordination was a ceremonial condition of ecclesiastical employment, which could not be better or worse like education, but was either absolutely good or absolutely bad. Why then should they inquire what Bishop ordained a clergyman more than what Vice-Chancellor conferred his doctor’s degree. The reason was obvious. The English Church had practically no check on ecclesiastical appointments. Any man might buy a living, present a friend or himself to it, and force the Bishop to institute him, however notoriously unfit, unless that unfitness could be proved to the satisfaction of a Court of Law. But proof of this kind might, in the most scandalous cases, be wholly unattainable. How was it then that the appointments were so miraculously inoffensive as they were? Partly owing to the conscience of patrons, partly owing to the general poverty of the incumbencies, but mainly because the Bishops, though they had no substantial check on appointments, had an absolute discretion in giving or refusing ordination, and so a most effectual check on the obtaining a qualification for employment, and because the mode of appointing the English Bishops and their responsibility to each other and to the public opinion of the English Church were such as to ensure a wholesome vigilance in the exercise of that discretion. But these securities only exist in the case of ordination by English Diocesans. In all other cases what was wanted, and all that was wanted, was to enable the English Diocesan to exercise, on the occasion of appointment, that discretion which he had not had the opportunity of exercising on occasion of ordination. And this would be effected by applying to all cases alike the principle already adopted by Parliament in the Scottish Episcopal Church Act. This the Bill did with a modification which had been considered requisite by those competent to judge. It would be observed that the principle on which these restrictions were imposed applied directly to the now disestablished Church of Ireland. He (Lord Blackford) though convinced that this application was in point of reason unavoidable, would have hesitated to submit it to the House, but for the fact that the bulk of the Bishops, as far as he knew, considered it proper, and that those who thought otherwise considered that the question would be properly raised by submitting the Bill in its present shape. As the case stood, he proposed the repeal of a string of statutes enumerated in the Schedule; and with regard to the capacitating effect of colonial and other ordinations, the substitution of two clauses taken in the main from the Scottish Episcopalian Church Act.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Blachford.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, the intricate nature of the subject was such that no other person but the noble Lord could have dealt with it and brought it under the attention of their Lordships. The noble Lord was the only man in England who understood the subject, and that was the reason why the Episcopal Bench had handed it over to him to deal with. And he thought the Bishops were fully warranted in imposing the task on the noble Lord, because he believed the noble Lord had had a hand in the establishment of a system which had given rise to the difficulties which the Bill was intended to remove. He (the Archbishop of Canterbury) held in his hand a document, which showed the great addition which had been made during the past quarter of a century or so to the Bishoprics and ecclesiastical property of our colonies. It appeared from this document that in 1841, when the Colonial Bishoprics Fund was first established, there were only 10 Colonial Bishoprics in existence, and that the total number of Colonial and Missionary Bishoprics now was 55; that 30 diocesan and four provincial Synods had been established; and that in seven dioceses the number of clergy had risen from 121 to 509. Their Lordships could therefore see that the question involved did not concern a few persons only, or a small amount of property. He did not think that the intricacies which had been the cause of such embarrassment could be attributed to ecclesiastical legislation. When the extension of the colonial episcopate was begun, it was little expected that Law Officers who had advised the issue of Letters Patent would, a few years afterwards, when they had risen to more elevated posts, decide that those Letters Patent were not worth the paper on which they were written; or that after one Court had, with great distinctness, pronounced them to be valueless, another would declare that they created corporations which could hold property. It seemed to him that there was only one course open to Parliament by which

what was so justly complained of could be remedied—namely, that of making a clean sweep of the whole of the existing legislation on the subject. That was the course proposed in the Bill of the noble Lord, and although for a long time he (the Archbishop of Canterbury) held an adverse opinion to that, and many colonists were still of that opinion, it had been proved that whatever Government was in power the new system was maintained, and therefore he thought that the best course was to abandon the old policy that had been pursued, and that it should be left to the Churches in the colonies to accommodate themselves in the best way they could to the altered circumstances in which they might find themselves. He had known of clergymen ordained in the colonies officiating in the diocese of London who did so in violation of the law, and who had no idea that they were acting illegally. In the case of these clergymen marriages had at times been celebrated, respecting the legality of which doubts might be raised under the existing state of the law. It was nearly time that this state of things should be remedied. As to the application of the Bill to the Irish Church, while he thought those who were promoting the Bill could scarcely accept the Amendment which he understood was to be moved by a noble Lord, he believed he might say for his most rev. and right rev. Brothers that they would be most desirous to make an exception in favour of the Irish Church if it were possible to do so, because they sympathized with the Bishops and clergy of the Irish Church, and looked upon them as ministers of a sister Church, teaching the same doctrine as was taught by the Church of England, and animated by a similar spirit. With regard to the Protestant Episcopal Church of Scotland, he well understood that some astonishment would be created among the people of Scotland when they found themselves included in a Bill having reference to the colonies; and it might be that they would say they were treated as a portion of the colonial possessions of Great Britain, instead of as part of the United Kingdom. He was quite certain that no indignity was meant, and he hoped that no class of persons in Scotland would look upon it in that light. The fact, he believed, was that it was considered advisable that the Acts to which this point referred should be repealed. There was another matter to which the noble Lord did not refer, but regarding which Notice of Amendment had been given—namely, the interest of the representatives of persons who had left endowments to the colonial churches. We knew that very little attention had of late been paid to the wishes of pious Founders who were no longer alive, but he hoped these wishes would be attended to in the case of persons still living. On the whole, he could recommend the Bill to the favourable consideration of their Lordships.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND concurred in what had fallen from the most rev. Prelate with regard to the intricacy of the subject, and how much they were indebted to the noble Lord who had brought it forward for introducing this Bill. The measure was purely of a colonial character. Its title was colonial, and its objects ought to be purely colonial. It was because the noble Lord had gone beyond the real object of the Bill, and proposed to include in its scope Scotland and Ireland, that he felt bound to offer some objection to it. The Bill proposed to remove two great grievances—namely, an episcopal grievance, and a clerical grievance, and those grievances were felt only by the Colonial Bishops and clergy. He should have thought enough had been done with the Irish Church to leave the rest in peace without any Irish disturbance. He confessed he could not see what the grievances of the Colonial Church had to do with the Irish Church. And not satisfied with including the Irish Church, the noble Lord proposed to subject the Protestant Episcopalian Church of Scotland to its provisions also. As a Scottish Episcopalian he objected to being dealt with under such a Bill as this. The Bill would interfere with the status of the clergy of the Irish Church, because all of them, except those ordained before the 1st of January, 1871, would be placed on exactly the same footing as the colonial clergy. There would be a similar interference with the status of the clergy of the Episcopal Church of Scotland, because the Bill would repeal the 27 & 28 Vict c. 94. The Act now in existence with regard to Scotland was by no means complicated. It was, on the contrary, a very simple measure. It consisted of six clauses, and it gave satisfactory facilities to do all the Episcopalian Church of Scotland required. He had no objection to deal with the colonial grievances; but it was not necessary that the Church of Scotland should be dealt with in the inconvenient and injurious manner it was proposed to deal with it under this measure. He had no objection to the principle of the Bill as regarded the colonies; but he entirely objected to the Scottish Episcopal Church being introduced into it, and in Committee he would move that nothing therein contained should be taken as applying to the clergy of the Episcopal Church of Scotland.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in referring to a section in the Irish Church Act of 1870, which provided that all enactments heretofore relating to the United Church of England and Ireland, should be distributive—subject to the provisions of that Act—to show that it reserved the rights of the clergy of that Church so far as related to their status, said, he did not object to so much of the Bill as came properly under its title; but he did object to the clause of the Bill which seemed to disqualify the clergy of the Church of Ireland, ordained since the passing of the Irish Church Act, from holding benefices and exercising their spiritual functions in England in the same manner as those ordained before the Act. This, the clause did, by professing to save the rights of the latter, which did not want saving, and so by inference it would put the newly ordained clergy in a worse position than, he contended, they were at present. To make a distinction now would be extremely invidious, and the future clergy of Ireland would stand in the same position as the existing ones so long as the general Synod of Ireland had the good sense not to alter the present form of ordination. If any alteration should be made in that service the position of the clergy might be altered. The Statute of Uniformity forbade any one to hold preferment or administer the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper in the Church of England who had not been ordained according to the English ordinal unless he had "formerly" received episcopal ordination, and this word "formerly" was held by some authorities to refer to ordination previous to the passing of the Act of Uniformity itself, and not to episcopal ordination received by the clergyman before he came to take the preferment. He much feared that if the Irish Church varied her form of ordination from the English one, her clergy thereafter ordained would find themselves shut out from preferment in England. He intended in Committee to move the exclusion of those provisions of the Bill which referred to the Church of Ireland.

THE EARL OF COURTOWN said, that a proposal was made in the late sittings of the Irish Synod to alter the Ordination Service, but it was rejected. The Archbishop of Dublin brought this Bill under the notice of the Synod, and a Petition to Parliament against the passing of that portion of the Bill which affected the Irish Church was adopted unanimously which he had presented to the House. The separation caused by disestablishment was a political act and was adopted for political reasons, it therefore caused pain to Irish churchmen to see it followed by a Bill which appeared to them one of spiritual pains and penalties. The Irish Church was at present in communion with the Church of England, and hoped to continue so. It was the opinion of eminent lawyers that the Irish Church Act did not affect the position of the Irish clergy in England, and that in fact it was the same as it was before the Irish Church Act was passed. It seemed ungenerous on the part of the promoters of this Bill and the English Church to deal with the Irish clergy in the way proposed, because formerly English clergymen were glad to cross the Channel to accept the Irish Bishoprics, and at one time nearly the whole of the bench of Bishops were Englishmen. He would repeat that the Irish Church was most anxious to remain in close communion with the English Church.

LORD CAIRNS said, that the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill had made out very clearly two grievances; the one in reference to those Bishops in the Colonies who had suffered by reason of certain decisions in the Courts of this country, and the other in reference to clergymen ordained in the Colonies. The Bill was intitled a "Colonial Church Bill," and if it were confined to the Colonies he should not object to it; but he did object to the repeal of Acts which affected the Irish Church. Section 8 of the Bill gave power to the Archbishops of Canterbury and York to consecrate Bishops for the Colonies and foreign countries without the Royal licence; but the noble Lord could not mean that they would have power of scattering as many Bishops as they liked over Scotland and Ireland. He strongly recommended that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, that, whatever it might mean, it was not intended by the 8th clause to dispense with the licence of the Crown. It was a matter of detail, and could be dealt with in Committee. He thought that the words "elsewhere than in England" were too wide, and might be struck out. He wished to disclaim in the strongest manner anything like hardness or want of sympathy with the Irish Church in her trouble and distress. This was a Bill not of exclusion, but of inclusion; it showed the terms upon which the clergy of all other Churches might come into the English Church. The wish was to put the Bishops in a position to approve of other than English clergymen coming into the English Church. This was a scheme not to repel any, but to welcome all on such conditions as might seem to be reasonable and just.

LORD CAIRNS pointed out that the Irish clergy were under no disability whatever, and that they wished to remain as they were at present.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he thought they ought all to be indebted to the noble Lord (Lord Blachford) for his attempt to deal with a complicated and, he was almost going to say, an unintelligible subject. He should be glad—without, of course, pledging himself to details, which could only be properly discussed in Committee—to assist his noble Friend in arriving, if possible, at a satisfactory solution, a result which would probably be furthered if his noble Friend were to accept the advice of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns), and to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, that Scotland had been taken by surprise on learning that the Scotch Episcopal Church had been included in the Bill. Such a measure ought to be confined to the Colonial Church, leaving Ireland and Scotland to be dealt with by a separate Bill. He trusted that the Bill would be referred to a Select Committee.

The Earl of Belmore

Scotland which would make a law which the House thought good for England objectionable in regard to Scotland, he expressed exactly the impression he entertained at that moment. But if his hon. Friend (Mr. T. Hughes) was right in saying that a measure which merely proposed to extend the English Act to Scotland would meet with no opposition, it appeared to him that such a measure would be as likely to succeed in the hands of a private Member as in the hands of the Government.

Mr. MILLER hoped the Government would see its way to bring in a measure to extend the Betting Houses Act to Scotland. It would be a very short affair in their hands, but it might be a very long and tedious one in the hands of a private Member. It was a great grievance to the people of Scotland to be afflicted in the way they were by these betting-men coming down from England and from all quarters to carry out their schemes.

Mr. GORDON also hoped a Bill would be brought in by the Government, for he did not see any hope of a private Member carrying such a measure. There was no doubt it would meet with some opposition, and if it met with any opposition at all, a private Member would in that case be utterly helpless.

Mr. BRUCE said, the state of the case was this—the Government did introduce a Bill on the subject, which met with very considerable opposition, and the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) then stated that he would move at the commencement of this Session for a Select Committee to enquire into the whole subject with a view to legislation. He had no doubt that a Bill amending the present Act and dealing in a satisfactory manner with this subject would require a good deal of time for discussion, and it could only be introduced with the chance of being carried on condition that some other measure of the Government was laid aside. For that the Government was not prepared. On the other hand, a measure extending the Betting Houses Act to Scotland would, as his hon. Friend said, meet with no opposition at all; and if it met with no opposition, the rule relating to Opposed Business not being taken after half-past 12 would not apply, and therefore in the hands of a private Member it would be just as likely to come to a satisfactory issue as if it were in the hands of a Member of the Government.

LORD ELCHO asked what Business would be taken after Whitsuntide, and when the Army Estimates would be discussed?

Mr. GLADSTONE said, the Bills put down for Thursday week were not, perhaps, of special interest to the mass of the House. They included the Merchant Shipping Bill and the Juries Bill. On the following Monday the second reading of the Judicature Bill would be taken, and on the succeeding Thursday the Committee on the Bills of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) would be proceeded with. The Government proposed to begin with those Bills on the previous Tuesday morning, and they would go on, in all probability, continuously through the week.

House at rising to adjourn till Thursday the 5th day of June next.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA.

QUESTION.

Mr. DENISON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, In what manner it is proposed to mark the national sense of the importance of the visit of the Shah of Persia to Great Britain?

Mr. GLADSTONE: Sir, the hon. Member will understand that I have had no time since his Notice was given to institute the inquiries necessary for a detailed reply to his Question. The day on which we are apprised that the Shah of Persia will probably arrive in this country is the 18th of June, and in the interval all proper arrangements will be made. Her Majesty's Government have a deep sense of the interest attached to the visit of that Eastern Potentate to the countries of the West, and they have every desire to show their sense of that interest. The Shah has been invited to be the guest of Her Majesty, and will be received at Buckingham Palace, and the hon. Member may rely upon it that full consideration will be given to what should be done during the period of his stay.

METROPOLIS—STREET TRAFFIC REGULATION—HYDE PARK—QUESTION.

Mr. HERBERT asked the First Commissioner of Works, If his attention has been called to the almost total stoppage of traffic in some of the streets approaching Hyde Park on last Saturday afternoon; whether, considering the crowded state of Piccadilly, Grosvenor Place, and Hyde Park during the season, he would take into his consideration the desirability of throwing open Constitution Hill to the public for carriage and cab traffic; and, whether experience has shown that any inconvenience has resulted from opening the road in St. James's Park, opposite Buckingham Palace, for a like purpose, or the road opposite the Horse Guards for Members of the House of Commons?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, that his attention had not been called to the state of the traffic on Saturday afternoon, but he had experienced, in common with other people, the great inconvenience that resulted from the stoppage of traffic at the point to which the hon. Member referred in his Question. It was no doubt a very serious inconvenience, not merely to the general traffic of Piccadilly, but to any persons who happened to be passing on foot. At the same time, it was to be remarked that this stoppage arose from the happy condition of a great number of the inhabitants of the wealthy parish of St. George's, Hanover Square, who, at certain periods of the day, enjoyed themselves and afforded great delight to other persons in looking at the equipages in which they drove to the Park. That being the case, it was peculiarly incumbent upon the local authorities of that parish to make proper arrangements, as far as they had any connection with those forming the wealthy inhabitants of the district, and it was also incumbent upon the Metropolitan Board of Works, if they thought the subject was one of magnitude, to take it into their consideration in order to see what could be done; and if they could not carry out what was necessary without the assistance of Her Majesty's Government, then to make proper representations on the subject to himself (Mr. Ayrton), so far as they might relate to any property in his charge. The property in Constitution Hill was not in his charge as regarded its enjoyment. It was in the enjoyment of His Royal Highness the Ranger, who was the proper person, subject to the control of Her Majesty's Government, to regulate the Park. The local authorities ought to communicate with him on the subject if they found the resident inhabitants of their districts were suffering great inconvenience, or the public at large. When they did that he (Mr. Ayrton) had no doubt that the representations would be properly received and duly considered. But in regard to the third Question, he was not aware that any inconvenience had resulted from opening the road in St. James's Park, or the road opposite the Horse Guards, for Members of the House of Commons.

QUESTION.

MR. EASTWICK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is aware that a Copy of the Russian Map mentioned in "Ocean Highways," page 79, referred to in a question on the 15th of May, is in the Library of the United Service Institution, and that it shows a green line which marks the Russian Frontier as extending to the south of Merv?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, although I have the honour of being a Member of the United Service Institution, I cannot undertake to say whether a Copy of the Russian Map mentioned in the Ocean Highways is in the Library of that building or no; but, with all respect to the hon. Member, I must remind him that this work is not an official publication, and that our Foreign Office can hardly be held to be responsible for its maps or contents. I think, however, there must be some misapprehension in the matter, as in the maps I have seen the line extending to the south of Merv marks, not the Russian Frontier, but that of Afghanistan.

GENEVA ARBITRATION—PRESENTATION TO THE ARBITRATORS.

QUESTIONS.

SIR THOMAS BATESON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government to propose a Vote for the purchase of plate or other testimonial to be presented to the Swiss, Italian, and Brazilian Arbitrators in the Geneva Award; and, if so, whether he will state when that Vote will be proposed?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it is the intention of the Government to propose a Vote for the purpose of defraying the expense of the purchase of plate as presents or marks of acknowledgment to the three independent Arbitrators—the Swiss, the Italian, and the Brazilian—at Geneva, and that Vote will, of course, come before the House during the present Session. I cannot state at what time it will be proposed; but Notice will of course be given before the opinion of the House is taken upon it.

COLONEL STUART KNOX wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether any communications had passed between his Government and that of the United States in reference to the testimonial which was proposed to be given to the Arbitrators, for the ratepayers of the United Kingdom had a greater interest in this matter? ["Order."]

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, there have been communications.

CRIMINAL LAW—CHIPPING NORTON MAGISTRATES.—QUESTION.

MR. CORBETT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in "The Times" newspaper of the 23rd instant, to the effect that sixteen women were on the 21st instant committed to the gaol at Oxford by the magistrates sitting in petty sessions at Chipping Norton in Oxfordshire, some for seven days and some for ten days, with hard labour, on a charge of coercing or interfering to prevent men from going to their work, on the farm of one Mr. Hambridge; and, whether he will cause to be laid upon the Table of the House, a Copy of the depositions or evidence taken by the magistrates in the case, together with a Copy of any record or memorandum of record of the conviction of any one of the said women, and also a Copy of one of the warrants of commitment made out by the officer of the court to be delivered to the governor of the gaol to whose custody the prisoners were committed?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he informed the House yesterday that he had received no communication on this subject either from the magistrates or on behalf of the imprisoned persons, nor had any such communication yet reached the Home Office. He had seen the statements referred to in the Question of the hon. Member with respect to these women, and he had thereupon written a letter to the magistrates which they would have that day. As to the Papers for which the hon. Gentleman asked, he had not yet seen them; but he did not anticipate there would be any objection to their production if they were moved for. He might, perhaps, be allowed to add that it was a mistake to suppose that the convictions had been made under the Masters and Servants' Act, nor was it so stated in the public Press. They had been made under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, and it had been affirmed that that Act visited with exceptional severity offences committed by the working classes. The fact was, however, that it limited and defined the cases in which the action of masters or workmen could be punished, and was greatly less severe than the previous law. The charge against the women in question was one, he supposed, of intimidation for having proceeded in large numbers and used violent language with the view of preventing workmen from going to their work. Under the Law as it stood previously to the passing of the Act any person who was convicted of preventing a man from working by threats, molestation, or intimidation was punished as for a criminal act; but the Law as it now stood very considerably narrowed the scope of the criminal law, for unless the offence was such as to justify the magistrates in binding the parties to keep the peace, or was "molestation" in one of the forms described in the Act, there could be no conviction.

MR. BOWRING said, he hoped, as the sentence would expire during the Whitsuntide Recess, the attention of the right hon. Gentleman would be directed to the subject.

MR. BRUCE said, it was not his custom to wait until Questions were put to him in that House before taking the necessary action in any matter, after he had received the requisite official information.

METROPOLIS—THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether it is true that the Board proposed to dispose of the vacant land in Cannon Row, abutting on the Thames Embankment, for building purposes, thereby preventing the construction of an approach road from Parliament Street to the Embankment by the Whitehall Club, in continuation of Derby Street?

COLONEL HOGG: Sir, in answer to the Question of my hon. Friend, I beg to state that it is the intention of the Metropolitan Board to dispose of the vacant land to which he refers for building purposes, and as that land is immediately between the Embankment and Derby Street, the construction of an approach to the Embankment from that street will certainly be prevented. The question of the approach referred to has been frequently before the Board; but it has not been thought desirable to undertake the work, for it would greatly diminish the value of their land. The gradients of the existing street are bad; while to make a suitable thoroughfare would necessitate the removal of the whole north side of the street, involving an expenditure, in the Board's opinion, more than the value of the suggested approach would justify.

CONVEYANCING (SCOTLAND)

BILL—[Bill 108.]

(Mr. Secretary Bruce, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Winterbotham.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 19th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 10 and 11 agreed to.

Clause 12 (Right of any person to succession as heir may be challenged within ten years).

Mr. GORDON moved to leave out "10," and insert "20," the object being to extend the period from 10 to 20 years within which the right of a person to an estate of inheritance in land by succession as heir might be challenged. The Bill proposed not to require any registered title at all. The great safety and security of titles hitherto in Scotland had been that they appeared on the register, and that there was no security in a title which did not so appear. His Amendment was clearly in accordance with the principles regulating the rights of parties in Scotland, and which had given so much security to those rights—namely, that no prescription should count until there was a title on the register, and that the period of prescription should be 20 years in reference to heirs.

Mr. J. G. Talbot

Amendment moved, in line 39, to leave out "ten," and insert "twenty."

Mr. McLAREN said, he had heard a good many people, both lawyers and and those who were not lawyers, discuss this matter, and he had not heard one who had not objected to the proposed period of 10 years.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not consent to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman. They had heretofore had two periods of prescription in Scotland—one of 40 years applying to the title to the estate, and the other of 20 years, applying to the title of a person to be heir. These were two totally distinct things. The law which provided 40 years' prescription as to title also provided that after 20 years' possession as heir the right of the party as heir could not be disputed. He proposed to preserve the same proportions as at present between the two periods of prescription. The reduction of the prescription of title to an estate to 20 years, and the possession to a faulty title of the heir to 10 years, had been demanded in Scotland with almost perfect unanimity. It should be remembered that the period of 20 years was established at a time when things went much more slowly than at present, and particularly in Scotland. The rapidity with which intelligence flew, the general knowledge which was possessed all over the country as to the ownership of estates, was much greater and more accurate now than formerly, when the safety of the public required that a period of 20 years should elapse before the title could be put beyond all challenge. Now, however, the period might very fairly be reduced to one-half. The Solicitor General for England had informed him that it was proposed, with the general assent of the legal profession in England, to reduce the period of prescription in England from 20 to 10 years; and surely if this were considered sufficient with regard to general prescription in England, a similar period in the case of the right of the heir in Scotland could not be regarded as unsafe.

Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE thought there was a good deal to be said in favour of shortening the period of prescription where it could be done safely and consistently with the rights of claimants; but he must say that he could not recognize the distinction which was made—although it had existed so long in Scotland—between title by purchase and title by inheritance. His hon. Friend had done away with the security of the judicial inquiry in the case of inheritance, and consequently he had taken the question entirely out of the category in which the Lord Chancellor had put his Land Transfer Bill. Further, it could not be said that the proposals in the Lord Chancellor's Bill were part of the English law until that Bill had passed both Houses, and he for one questioned whether that House would adopt so short a period of prescription for England as 10 years, unless it were accompanied by a provision for some special inquiry as to the succession to an inheritance.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL thought it strange that in the course of this discussion so little allusion had been made by hon. Gentlemen who came from the north of the Tweed to a little country called England. He should have imagined that the laws and the experience of England with regard to real estate would have had some little weight with those who were considering changes that were about to be introduced into the Scotch law. What was the experience of England? In ancient times the limitation to claims to land was 60 years; but this period had been found too long. The main object of limiting the period of prescription was to quiet people in their possession of real property, and to prevent unfounded and vexatious claims; and it was found from long experience that the number of successful claims made by persons alleging their titles to estates after the lapse of a considerable period of time was so small that it was not worth while to leave the door of litigation open for so long a term in order that these exceptional claims might be entertained. The result was that in 1834 the period of prescription, or as it is called in England limitation, was cut down from 60 to 20 years; and this alteration of the law had worked so successfully that during the present Session, and as he believed with the approbation of the legal profession and of the public, the Lord Chancellor had introduced a Bill into the other House to shorten the prescription of 20 years to 10 years; and whether the Bill were passed or not, it would afford an indication of what was the opinion of the great majority of professional men on the subject. Scotland, however, was not invited to go so far as this. At present the Scotch period of prescription was 40 years, and the Bill under consideration only proposed to reduce that to the period which was still the English law, but which it was hoped would be cut down one-half. In Scotland, moreover, there was a register, which did not exist in England, and this gave an additional security to the titles of the people of that country.

MR. GORDON said, it was a mistake to suppose that Scotch lawyers had taken no notice of what happened in England; but the fact was they had found that the system adopted in Scotland was the wisest. This was proved by the circumstance that the Lord Chancellor's Bill proposed to borrow a portion of the Scotch system as to registration, which he considered was essential to the provision of proper facilities for the transfer of land.

Amendment put, and negatived.

An Amendment made.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 13 (Possession to be prima facie evidence of heir's right in questions with tenants, &c.)

MR. GORDON said, he thought the present law was well understood, and he submitted that it would be better to leave it on its present footing than to adopt this clause, which was condemned by conveyancers generally.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that in his own opinion the law as it at present stood was sufficient; but unfortunately some uncertainty was held to exist, and in a recent important case of disputed succession, tenants had refused to pay their rents pending the dispute. They had been ordered to pay, but he thought it well to make the law certain. He therefore asked for the withdrawal of the Amendment.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that this being merely a declaratory clause, there could be no objection to it.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, with an Amendment.

Clause 14 (Legal remedies to prevent entry preserved.)

MR. GORDON said, that by the existing law—now declared by the preceding clause—a man who obtained possession was entitled to draw the rents until his claim was set aside; and then he very often contrived to retain the rents. He thought it essential that power should be given to the Court to deal with such cases, and would therefore move to insert at end of clause, the words—

"And it shall be lawful to any person claiming right as heir to an estate in land to apply to any Court of competent jurisdiction, and such Court may, notwithstanding the completion in the person of another of a title under this Act, regulate from time to time, during the dependence of such question, the possession of such estate, and may allow possession to either or to neither party, as such Court may deem just or expedient, or may otherwise deal with such estate, as regards the interim possession and care and management thereof as if no such title had been made up."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had had this matter in view in preparing the clause as it stood, and thought he had thereby provided for every case with sufficient safety. The object of precluding the possibility of doubt in this matter was, however, quite sufficient to call for the introduction of some words, but he thought the words proposed by his hon. and learned Friend were not well adapted to obtain the end in view. He should propose to add the following words as better accomplishing the purpose—

"And it shall be lawful for a Court of competent jurisdiction to regulate possession, pending such trial, as such Court shall see just, notwithstanding of the completion under this Act of the title of any person as heir."

MR. GORDON said, he would accept the words of his hon. and learned Friend.

Amendment withdrawn.

Words added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 15 (Recovery of duties and services not being casualties.)

MR. J. HAMILTON moved an Amendment the effect of which was to revest in the superior the estate of property in the event of non-performance by the tenant of his feu-duties.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, this was rather a technical matter, and it was a process that was not at all common in Scotland, for he never saw such a process during the whole course of his professional experience. He, however, thought it very proper that such a process should be retained, and he would adopt the Amendment with some alterations.

Mr. Gordon

MR. M'LAREN said, that this was by no means a matter which never occurred. The Corporation of Edinburgh had about 3,600 of these feu-duties, which produced upwards of £8,000 annually. The value of the small feu-duties consisted in the casualty of a year's rent on death or other change, and to compel the superior to recover these small sums by action before the Sheriff would be virtually to extinguish the right, for the expenses would be greater than the sums recovered. It was therefore absolutely necessary to retain this power.

Amendment made.

Further Amendments made.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 16 (Redemption of Casualties.)

MR. GRIEVE moved, in line 35, after "cent" to insert—

"The Sheriff of the county where the land lies shall have power, on application from either party, to fix the value, and his judgment shall be final, and not subject to review."

He thought this form was rather better than that of which he had given Notice.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the provision of the clause was this—in the first place, parties were to have the power to have casualties redeemed on any terms that might be agreed upon. These terms might in some cases be too low, and in others they might be too high; but, as a general rule, they would be fixed by persons of experience in such matters. It was very desirable to avoid litigation and expense, and therefore he did not approve of the Sheriff being brought in. He hoped the hon. Member would be satisfied with the fixing of a casualty and a half as a maximum.

MR. CRAUFURD thought the Amendment worthy of consideration. There were plenty of cases in which there was a feu-duty of a few pounds, and yet in which the real value of the property had through time increased to an enormous amount. One might, for example, have a feu-duty of 5s., and have a house built on the feu worth £20,000. In such a case the superior was not likely to enter into any agreement for the commutation of the duty unless a very large sum were offered in payment. He believed the clause as it stood would not meet the justice of the case, and he suggested that the Lord Advocate should either accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Greenock, or propose some other way of putting the provision into harmony with the rest of the clause.

MR. M'LAREN thought the chief objection to the provision was not that stated by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Craufurd). Whenever it appeared to the feuar that he would have to pay a large sum to be allowed to redeem, his plan would be not to make any offer at all. The real objection, however, as it seemed to him, was this, that no means were provided of obtaining a real valuation. The object of the Bill was to abolish these troublesome casualties, and yet no means were provided for carrying it out. In England the practice was for the Commissioners to form a sort of jury, and try each case on its particular merits. Arrangements for commuting casualties were thus very much facilitated.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the clause had been framed as it stood because the option being given to the vassal, it was thought right to give the superior the same. He quite appreciated the remark made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, that it was advisable that these casualties should be put an end to, and agreed with him that if any other course could be suggested of meeting the difficulty, it would be well worthy of consideration. Hitherto he had not been able to see his way to deal with the matter satisfactorily, but he would renew his attempt, and see if he could not find some means of obtaining the end they all had in view.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 17 (Redemption of casualties by a Mid Superior) agreed to.

Clauses 18 to 21 agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 22 (Form of Conveyances).

MR. GORDON said, the clause as it stood merely made the registering voluntary, whereas it was of the essence of the thing that it should be made compulsory:—he would therefore move to add at end of clause the words—

"That no deed or conveyance, instrument, or writing, whereby any real burden upon land is assigned, conveyed, or transferred, shall be effectual in competition with third parties unless the same is or shall be recorded in the Register of Sasines in the same manner as any heritable security, and such deed of conveyance, instrument or writing, shall take effect in competition with third parties only from the date of such registration."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was prepared to assent to the Amendment with a slight verbal alteration, leaving out the word "conveyance," so as to bring it into harmony with the rest of the Bill, which only mentioned "instrument or writing."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 23 to 26 agreed to.

Clause 27 (Fees of conquest abolished).

MR. GORDON moved to omit the clause, the effect of which, he said, would be to centre the whole property in one.

MR. M'LAREN said, he was decidedly opposed to this clause, which he considered was against the present policy of Parliament. As he understood this clause, if the middle one of three brothers died intestate, the property would go to the elder brother. He was in favour of division of property, and not of cumulating property, and therefore he objected to this clause.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, not being a lawyer, had overlooked one thing well known to the forensic profession—namely, that it was the eldest son who succeeded to his father's estate and his heritage. There was no distinction with respect to fees of heritage excepting in the succession of a younger son who had not succeeded to his father's estate, and who had a living elder brother. That was the case where the distinction operated. The younger son had succeeded to nothing. It affected a case like this, where a brother, who had a younger and an elder brother still living, and who might have acquired a considerable estate, died. His property, according to the present law would not go to his younger brother, but to his elder brother, who had succeeded to the family estate, and thus the property tended to increase and concentrate in one individual, and not to divide the inheritance. But he objected to the law as it stood; because it was a capricious and unsatisfactory thing to have two modes of legal succession, and to have to inquire in determining who the feuar was, whether the deceased's property was the product of his own industry, or whether he succeeded to it as heir, giving him one succession in the one case and another succession in the other. But so far as the proposed law would operate, it would be exactly the reverse of that supposed by the hon. Member for Edinburgh.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 28 to 40 agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 41 (Certain offices abolished).

On Clause 41, which abolished the offices of Sheriff of Chancery, Sheriff-Clerk, Sheriff-Clerk-Depute, and Macer, of Chancery, and of Presenter of Signatures, and of Clerk to the Presenter of Signatures, and enabled the Commissioners of the Treasury to award full compensation, payable out of moneys voted by Parliament,

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, in line 42, after "Treasury," to leave out to end of clause, and insert—

"Who shall be empowered to award to each of such officers such compensation as the said Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury may deem just and reasonable, having regard to the terms by which such officers respectively hold their appointments, and to the net average amount of the emoluments received by them, and such compensation as may be awarded shall be subject to the provisions of the 20th section of the Act of the 4th and 5th years of the reign of His Majesty King William the Fourth, chapter 24, entitled 'An Act to alter, amend, and consolidate the laws for regulating the pensions, compensations, and allowances to be made to persons in respect of their having held civil offices in His Majesty's service.'"

MR. WEST feared, in regard to the question of compensation, that the effect of it would be, where given to men in early life, that they would be tempted to remain idle during the remainder of their years. He thought compensation should be given contingent on their being willing to accept certain offices, on the appointment to which the compensation should cease.

MR. TREVELYAN proposed to insert after the words "such compensation," "not exceeding two-thirds of the salary or net emoluments of their respective offices." He denied that the gentlemen who performed the duties of these offices had fulfilled public services to which public pensions were granted. It was quite evident that some of these gentlemen would be superannuated in a time of life in which they could assist themselves by taking business of another description. It was well known there had been gentlemen performing official duties in Edinburgh who had assisted themselves by their pens to a considerable extent. The largest income ever gained by a literary man was gained under these circumstances.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, after the first word "compensation," to insert the words "not exceeding two-thirds of the net average emoluments of their respective offices."—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

MR. CRAUFURD thought the matter might be safely left to the Treasury, who were never very lavish. Scotland paid more than Ireland, and it only got one-fourth of what Ireland got. He was not saying that what Ireland got was right or wrong; but he thought they should think a bit before they tried to cut the compensation down. He referred the hon. Member to the Camperdown Commission, and he asked him after that was he prepared to starve their public officers, who did their work marvellously well? He certainly did not think the Treasury, if let alone, would be guilty of any extravagance.

THE LORD ADVOCATE objected to be bound by any limits, and hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. MUNTZ thought the allowance of two-thirds sufficient, and believed the hon. Member (Mr. Trevelyan) was right in pressing for a division.

MR. ANDERSON agreed that public servants ought to be paid well, and also agreed that many public servants were not well paid; but this was a question of compensation for the abolition of offices, and came within a totally different category. The principle of allowing two-thirds compensation was a very wholesome one indeed, and he trusted his hon. Friend would press his Amendment.

MR. GORDON said, he knew that Scotch office-holders had considerable reason to complain of the way they were paid, and thought that in justice to Scotland there should be a reconsideration of such matters. He did not put his support of the Lord Advocate's Motion on such a ground, but he believed that in the abolition of offices there should be a considerable amount of discretion given to the Treasury.

MR. CRAUFURD said, it was clearly admitted many officers were underpaid, but this clause did not limit the Treasury in giving what they thought right as compensation.

Question put, "That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment."

VOL. CCXVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

IRISH CHURCH ACT (1869)—CLAUSE 32. QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he can state the number and amount of the applications that have been made under Clause 32 of the Irish Church Act of 1869, to enable owners of land in Ireland charged with payment of tithe rent charge to purchase the same by instalments extending over a period of fifty-two years; and, the number and amount of similar applications that have been made since the Act of 1872, c. 90 (35 and 36 Vic.), enabling the average poor rates and stamp duty to be deducted from the purchase money?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had obtained the information referred to, but thought it could be more satisfactorily given in the form of a Return; and if the hon. Member moved for it, it would be laid on the Table at once.

CENSUS OF IRELAND.—QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, In what order the detailed report of the late Census of Ireland will be published, and within what period the whole may be expected to be completed?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had ascertained from the Census Commissioners that the counties were being published in alphabetical order, beginning with the Province of Leinster, and going on to the Provinces of Munster, Ulster, and Connaught. Seven counties had been printed, and two were passing through the press. The Commissioners expected that the principal work of the Census would be completed about the middle of 1874.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION FOR INJURIES—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. HINDE PALMER asked the President of the Board of Trade, When he intends to introduce his promised Bill, comprising provisions for amending the Laws respecting compensation to workmen for injuries sustained in the course of their employment?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, he thought the subject referred to in the Question of the hon. and learned Member demanded the attention of the Government and of Parliament, but he did not expect to be able to introduce a measure relating to it during the present Session. He had found it necessary to include in the reference to the Royal Commission on unseaworthy ships all that portion of the subject of the liability of masters for injuries suffered by servants in the course of their employment which related to the sailors of this country, and he hoped they would have the advantage before next Session of possessing the views of the Royal Commission on that large part of the subject.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT—LEGISLATION—DECK LOADS.
QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK (for Mr. GOURLEY) asked the President of the Board of Trade, What steps (if any) he intends adopting for the purpose of re-enacting this Session the law which was repealed in 1862 regulating the carrying of timber deck loads; and, whether, if re-enacted, the prohibition will be extended to deck cargoes other than timber?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill which he had introduced dealt to a certain extent—to as large an extent as he thought it proper to attempt to deal under present circumstances—with the question of overloading; but the special question of deck-loading with timber from America and other countries was not embraced in that measure. That question formed part of the reference to the Royal Commission on merchant ships. When he made his statement on the second reading of the Bill, he would explain that portion of the subject.

JURIES BILL. [Bill 35.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 15th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 5 (Exemptions).

MR. GATHORNE HARDY moved, in line 8, after "schoolmaster," to add "schoolmasters of public schools, professors, and college tutors resident in the Universities to which they belong." Previous to 1870 all graduates of the University of Oxford were exempt by charter. The exemption was not asked for as a favour to the persons themselves, but to prevent the inconvenience that might arise in the event of a schoolmaster being called away for some days in the discharge of his duties as a jurymen. The privilege was asked for in behalf of those they had to teach.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 8, after the word "schoolmaster," to insert the words "schoolmasters of public schools, professors, and college tutors resident in the Universities to which they belong."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not oppose the Amendment out of disrespect to the persons named, but because the object of the Bill was to narrow exemptions and to bring as many as possible into the net of service, and thereby diminish as far as possible those numberless exemptions which in the sister country had gone to the extent of exempting all the persons most fitted to discharge the duties. On principle he objected to exemptions; but he had been obliged to retain many because he could not help it. He had, however, struck out two. Everyone ought to be liable to serve on a jury, except where it was plainly for the public interest he should not do so—as in the case of doctors.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the children at the public elementary schools had to earn certain money by attending a certain number of times, and if the masters were taken away to serve on juries the children would be unable to attend the requisite number of times to earn the capitation grant.

MR. SCOURFIELD trusted the Government would re-consider the question of qualification, with a view of fixing a maximum and a minimum sum, and leave any question that might arise to be decided by the local authorities.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, while admitting that the question of qualification was deserving of consideration, thought that it would be most inconvenient to narrow the area from which jurymen were obtained by increasing the number of exemptions.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 70; Noes 55: Majority 15.

MR. HINDE PALMER moved, in page 4, line 9, after, "officers," to insert "of both Houses of Parliament." Officers of Courts of Law and Equity were already exempted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would accept the Amendment if the words "during the Session of Parliament" were added.

Mr. HINDE PALMER said, he would agree to that Amendment.

Mr. CRAUFURD said, that a case might happen in which an officer of the House of Commons might be put upon a jury a week before Parliament met, and the jury continue to sit on.

Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, having voted with the majority in the division on the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Mr. G. Hardy) wished to be consistent; but he really could not see why, if this Amendment were agreed to, the Committee should not also say that Professors and college tutors were to be exempt during term time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, any Judge would readily excuse such persons on their own application.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. MUNTZ moved in line 12, at end of line to add "justices of the peace for any county or borough, mayors and town clerks of boroughs," on the ground that, as regarded the borough magistrates, they should not be asked to sit on a jury, and so pronounce judgment upon the very men they might have committed for trial, and also because it would be inconvenient they should be taken from their duties.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL opposed the Amendment. Justices of the peace were now not exempt by law, and as they were intelligent gentlemen he did not think they ought to be exempt. The same observation applied to the mayors of boroughs. If these exemptions were allowed they would very much lower the character of special juries. Nor did he think the mayors ought to be exempt—the boroughs might get on without them for a few days; and as to the town clerk, if he were an attorney or a solicitor, he was exempt already.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. WEST (for Mr. BIRLEY), moved in page 4, line 14, after "same," to insert—

"Members of the council of any municipal borough, and every justice of the peace assigned to keep the peace therein, and the town clerk and treasurer for the time being of every such borough, so far as relates to any jury summoned to serve in such borough, or in the county where such borough is situate."

This was an existing exemption, and, considering the onerous public duties discharged by those gentlemen, the exemption ought to be continued.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. LOPES said, that no ground had been laid for the exemption, and there were strong reasons why it should not be granted. The professional or social status was abolished, and a great change had been made in persons called upon to serve on special juries. It was therefore essential that they should not withdraw from them any such individuals as were mentioned in the Amendment.

Mr. MUNTZ said, that the members of municipal councils did a great deal of hard work, and serious inconvenience might arise if they were compelled to serve on juries.

Mr. GOLDNEY said, the exemption might with equal propriety be extended to members of boards of guardians. They were quite as hard worked as town councillors.

Mr. LEEMAN remarked that it was not only the monthly meeting of the town council, but the attendance at committees which should be considered.

Mr. WATKIN WILLIAMS believed that no practical inconvenience would arise from making these persons serve on juries, and that if they were withdrawn the result would be greatly to impair the value of this Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, there were two or three counties in which the names of the special jurors had been returned. From the Return, which he admitted was two years old, it appeared there were in Sussex 197 special jurors; in Kent, 400; in Lancashire, 1,450; and in Gloucestershire, 276. He asked the Committee to consider what would be the effect on the special jury list if they were to take out the whole of the town councils of the boroughs in Sussex, and everybody employed in municipal affairs in Lancashire, and the names of the persons proposed to be exempted by this Amendment. He would not deny that it was an invidious thing to stand against such an Amendment as this. He conceded that if it were merely a question of whether these gentlemen were not fully occupied, there was a great case for them; but if they were to go to every person who was fully occupied, and say that he was therefore exempted from serving on a jury; they would have a class of professional jurymen—people who had nothing to do, and with loose and inaccurate minds—the mere hangers-on of society—the very worst class they could possibly have for special jurors. It was because he desired to keep intelligent men on the jury that he objected to this Amendment.

MR. LEEMAN said, the figures quoted by the Attorney General were likely to mislead. The lists to be composed under this Bill would be very much larger than those at present in force.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that most of the gentlemen who were giving such good advice to the Government and the Committee in this matter had never served on juries; but he hoped the Attorney General would not make the clause too stringent and allow little latitude.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 42; Noes 126: Majority 84.

MR. ASSHETON moved, in page 4, line 14, after "public," to insert "or private." The private asylums were licensed and inspected by the magistrates, but they were supported by the friends of the inmates. There were greater reasons for the exemption of the keepers of these private asylums from service as jurors than for the exemption of the keepers of the public institutions. In the larger and public institutions there were many sub-warders having charge in the absence of the principal, but not so in the smaller and more private.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the keepers of these private asylums were already exempted from serving as jurors, either as physicians or as surgeons.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY suggested that the best mode of attaining the object would be to strike out the word "public."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL assented.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, that as there were so many exemptions he proposed to make another, by inserting, in line 24, after "respectively," the words "also members of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons actually in practice."

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that veterinary surgeons in some country districts were very scarce, and lived a great many miles apart. If, therefore, the Amendment was not adopted, he did not see how the House could look the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals in the face.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped the Government would consider the peculiar position in which the country was now placed with reference to cattle. Heavy penalties were imposed by recent legislation with a view to prevent the spread of disease among cattle, and great risk would be incurred if a veterinary officer were not present to certify that cattle were free from disease. It should be borne in mind that in many districts properly qualified veterinary surgeons were not so plentiful as attorneys or other doctors. If the veterinary officer at a landing place for cattle happened to be absent serving on a jury, were the cattle to be kept on board ship or landed without inspection? Under the circumstances, the Government ought seriously to consider whether it would not be expedient to exempt veterinary surgeons.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, that during the Assizes last year about 700 sheep and cattle on his own farm were attacked by disease in one week, and the loss he sustained would have been far greater had the veterinary surgeon been called away to serve upon a jury.

MR. SCOURFIELD remarked that, although large numbers of cattle were landed in the county he represented (Pembrokeshire), there was only one properly qualified veterinary surgeon in the whole county.

MR. LOPES said, he thought it unnecessary to make a special exemption in the case of veterinary surgeons, as under Clause 20 the Justices were empowered to revise the jury lists and make such exemptions as they might deem expedient.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could see no ground for the exemption asked for. In the case of these gentlemen being engaged in the discharge of public duties, they would be exempted by the magistrates, who would have power under the provisions of the Bill to revise the list. The Bill did not propose in any way to change the law with regard to the liability of this class of persons to serve, and no instance had been brought forward to show that any inconvenience had resulted from their having to serve.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS pointed out that, although these gentlemen had hitherto been legally bound to serve on juries, the Sheriffs, in the exercise of their common sense, had never summoned them. The present Bill, however, proposed to deprive the Sheriffs of their discretion in the matter.

MR. BRAND said, he thought it was impossible for a man properly to discharge his duty as an Inspector of cattle and a jurymen at the same time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL gave way with considerable reluctance; but thought that, after the opinions which had been expressed with regard to it, it would be useless to go to a division on the question.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. DILLWYN moved, in page 4, line 25, at end, to insert "general managers of Railway Companies."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL opposed the Amendment, being of opinion that no sufficient case had been made out for the exemption of railway managers.

MR. LOPES referred to Clause 20 of the Bill, which empowered the Justices to strike off the list the names of those persons whose business engagements were incompatible with their serving on juries.

MR. BOWRING observed that managers of railways appeared always to have sufficient time to attend before Committees upstairs when Railway Bills were being considered. If the Directors of Companies were able thus to spare the managers year after year from their regular avocations when their interests required it, he did not see why they should not serve on juries.

MR. LEEMAN supported the Amendment. Under Clause 20 the lists would only come before the magistrates for revision once a year.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON supported the Amendment on the ground that the whole of the work on the railways depended on the constant attention of managers, and their absence might lead to mismanagement and accidents.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL remarked that the same arguments would apply to managers of mines and other responsible positions. Railway managers were absent from their duties through the ordinary accidents of life and attendance before Parliamentary Committees, when their places were efficiently supplied by deputies.

Amendment negatived.

MR. CRAWFORD moved, in page 4, after line 25, to insert "the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England," with a view to their exemption. He had known three gentlemen fill these offices who during four years were not absent for a single day. He did not, however, ground the Amendment on their Bank duties, but on their duties with regard to the State. They were Commissioners of the National Debt, and he would appeal to Gentlemen who had been Chancellors of the Exchequer whether at times they did not require immediate communication with the Governor and Deputy Governor, and whether delay would not be to the public detriment?

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 25, after the word "service," to insert the words "the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England."—(Mr. Crawford.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that as the exemption was only for two persons serving a period of four years, it was hardly worth while to oppose it.

MR. ANDERSON said, he was disappointed at this concession on the part of the Government. He objected to an exemption which would benefit the shareholders of the Bank, and believed it would have been to the public advantage if these gentlemen had been drafted away yesterday to serve on juries.

MR. CRAWFORD said, the Amendment was based solely on the public duties of the Governor and Deputy Governor.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 57: Majority 31.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he thought that in accordance with the proposition of the Government in the case of officers of the House, that the exemption should not exist during the recess of Parliament, it would be proper to add to the exemption now granted that it should not operate during bank holidays, so as to make it consistent and sensible in every respect. He moved that the words "except on bank holidays" be added.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, he thought the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman were really beneath himself. He was turning a serious proposal into ridicule. The Governor and Deputy Governor might be employed on public duty during bank holidays.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. RATHBONE moved, after line 27, to insert "the members of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board." The Masters and Wardens of the Trinity House, who were exempt, were well paid, while the members of the Mersey Docks Board discharged important duties without remuneration.

Mr. T. E. SMITH said, that in the event of this exemption being allowed he should move to exempt the River Commissioners of the Tyne and Wear.

Mr. GOLDSMID, with reference to the exemption of the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England, said, they were only two members of the Board, and he understood they were not present at all the meetings.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, that there were acts which only the Governor and Deputy Governor could discharge. During four years he had not been absent for a single day, except on one or two occasions from ill-health.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that a great deal might be urged in favour of this Amendment; but if this exemption were permitted every public body having a great deal of business to discharge might put forward the same claim. The Master and Wardens of the Trinity House were exempted because they had special jury work of their own to discharge in the Admiralty Court. He (the Attorney General) was very unfortunate—because if he did not give way, he was called obstinate; and if he did, he was called weak. In this instance he must stand firm.

Mr. MACFIE said, that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board was the largest trust in the world, and the members administered gratuitously a property worth £20,000,000, which was every year increasing in value.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Vernon Harcourt

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE moved, in page 4, line 41, after "cers," to insert "Commissioners of the Income Tax," a body of men not, he believed, the most popular in the kingdom. They performed a public duty which they undertook under Act of Parliament. The proposal was no new one, as they were exempted by the Act of 1870 (35 Vict. c. 103). He had no doubt the Attorney General would accede to the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was sorry to disappoint his Friend's expectations. He had considered the Amendment, but felt there was not sufficient reason for exemption.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, that he was being elected as a Member of that House, and he had been exempted from serving on juries as Commissioner of Income Tax, but if at any future time he should be elected to be a Member of that Assembly, he had no objection to the liability.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he had placed on the Paper a somewhat similar Amendment. The Commissioners of Income Tax were by the Act of 1870 liable to serve on juries; but so much inconvenience was found to result that a special Act was brought in to exempt them.

Mr. COLLINS said, that the offer of the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford) was one which did deserve much gratitude, because it was probably the hon. Gentleman, by ceasing to be a Member of that House, would be exempt on account of his position under another clause.

Amendment negatived.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE next moved to exempt Aldermen of London, who, he contended, ought in that respect to be placed in the same position as stipendiary magistrates and officers of the Courts. The Aldermen had many duties to perform, and might be summoned to serve on a jury at the same time that they were called upon to serve as magistrates at the Central Criminal Court.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 42, after the word "magistrates," to insert the words "Aldermen of London."—(Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. JAMES said, he thought it would be very advantageous to every class the public that Aldermen should sit upon juries. There were good Aldermen and bad Aldermen. The good Aldermen found their way into the House of Commons, and were, therefore, exempt from serving upon juries. As regarded bad Aldermen, it was desirable that by serving on juries they should obtain some acquaintance with their jurisprudence. The six Aldermen who were in the House of Commons might very well take the duties of such of their Colleagues as were compelled to serve on juries.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he thought that, considering the various ways in which the Aldermen of London served their fellow-citizens, it would be only fair to exempt them from liability to serve on juries.

MR. CRAWFORD pointed out that the Aldermen were Commissioners of the Central Criminal Court, and that unless the Amendment were acceded to it might happen that an Alderman might be summoned to serve on a jury before the Court of which he was a member.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK believed that the employment of Aldermen on juries would seriously interfere with the business of the London Police Courts and the Central Criminal Court, in fact they were Judges in the latter Court.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not himself see any very good reason why the Aldermen of London should be exempted. He believed, however, that they could claim exemption under the 5th clause of the Bill. He had once argued this question in "another place" upon the point of the constitution of the Central Criminal Court, and he believed it was decided that the presence of Aldermen there during the trials was essential, and that the trials could not go on legally without them. His own impression was that they would come within the definition of Judges, and upon that ground he objected to the Amendment as unnecessary.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE insisted that the Amendment was necessary, not only for the Aldermen, but for the officials and clerks of their Courts.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he thought that the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James) ought to remember that Aldermen performed their duties in Court gratuitously, while attorneys and counsel were well paid, and therefore he should not be so hard on them.

MR. J. S. HARDY was of opinion that the Attorney General's interpretation of the words quoted by him as to Judges presiding at any trial to be decided by a jury would wholly exempt all magistrates sitting at Quarter Sessions from serving on juries.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the exemption would apply to the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions only.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE observed that the Aldermen of the City of London were members of the Commission under which prisoners were tried at the Central Criminal Court.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that without the presence of an Alderman the Court could not be constituted. The Lord Mayor was head of the Commission.

MR. JAMES said, it was very desirable that this matter should be made clear, and gave Notice that at a later stage he would move that the clause should not apply to the Aldermen of London, except to those sitting as members of the Central Criminal Court.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 17; Noes 81: Majority 64.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (for Mr. OWEN STANLEY) moved, in page 4, line 44, after "Members of the Executive Government," to insert "Any person who can neither understand, read, or write the English language." It was a common thing in Wales to summon jurors who could not understand the evidence of English witnesses, or the charge of an English Judge.

MR. RAIKES said, he thought it would be more respectful to Members of the Executive Government, who were exempted from serving by the clause, that the persons mentioned in the Amendment should be placed in the next clause among those who were disqualified from acting as jurors.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS objected to this exemption, and believed it would be extremely difficult to give effect to it. He had met men in Wales who could neither understand nor read nor write English, and yet who made most excellent jurymen.

MR. COLLINS said, it appeared to him that no person should be allowed to serve on a jury in Wales who did not understand the Welsh language.

Mr. LEEMAN referred to Yorkshire, where, he said, such an exemption as that proposed would be most unjust.

Mr. LOPES asked whether the overseers were to institute an examination in order to ascertain whether or not a man really understood English, and could read and write it. Moreover, it was not improbable that many men would claim the benefit of the proposed exemption who were not actually entitled to it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, if this exemption were to be allowed they might as well abolish altogether trial by jury in Wales.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. BOWRING asked what was meant by the words "members of the Executive Government" in the clause. They appeared very elastic, and might extend to the whole of the civil establishments, including not only the higher officials, but all clerks, and even temporary writers.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he proposed to meet that criticism by the terms of the Interpretation Clause.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER moved in page 5, line 3, to leave out "seventy" and insert "sixty." Everyone would admit that it was desirable a jury should be composed of men in full health, and capable of discharging the duties before them. It seemed to him that 60 was a sufficient age for people to be compelled to discharge such arduous duties, and that persons in their declining years were entitled to exemption.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 3, to leave out the word "seventy," and insert the word "sixty."—(Mr. R. N. Fowler.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'seventy' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the exemption was absolute at 70, but there was nothing to prevent a person from claiming to be exempted at 65. There were many men between 65 and 70 in full possession of their faculties mentally and bodily, and who at that time of life would be particularly useful as jurors. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Mr. LEEMAN suggested that the provision as to age should be struck out altogether, as it would be exceedingly difficult, in large parishes especially, the overseers to ascertain whether a man was 70.

Mr. ALDERMAN LUSK hoped that Amendment would be pressed.

Mr. GREGORY was also in favour of the exemption above 60 years of age.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not think that the labourers and jurors were generally very heavy, submitted that the line which he already drawn in the clause was a fair and reasonable one.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 18: Noes 18: Majority 36.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Clause 7 (Men of 65 years of age upwards to be exempt, if exemption claimed in time).

Mr. GREGORY moved in page 5, line 24, at end add—

"and any man who shall be liable to serve any borough or county in respect of his place of business, and who shall have a separate place of residence, shall be exempt from service in respect of such place of residence, if his claim to exemption be in like manner duly made and established."—(Mr. Gregory.)

A man ought not to be liable to serve twice. His discharging double duty would be inconsistent with the principle of the Bill.

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could not accede to the Amendment. If he were to do so, it would almost destroy the jury panel in the City of London, because all who resided out of London would elect to serve where the work was likely to be the lightest. If a man had two qualifications he ought to be liable to serve for both.

Mr. GREGORY said, his Amendment would only give a man a right to that being on the City list he was liable for the country. A business man should only be called upon to serve where his business was carried on.

Mr. LEEMAN supported the Amendment. It was not reasonable to require upon a man to perform double service as a juror, when the two summonses might sometimes clash.

Mr. WEST said, that a man having two qualifications ought to be liable to serve on both.

MR. LOPES considered the Amendment a very reasonable one. It was unfair to call upon persons to discharge the same duties in a borough and also in a county.

MR. GREGORY said, his Amendment was confined to persons in business, and was not intended to apply to persons of independent means having qualifications in different places.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he had known instances where persons had been summoned to appear at two different places on the same day and hour.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the answer to one was that he was engaged on the other.

MR. REED said, that without the Amendment persons of Yorkshire and Lancashire having business premises in London would be liable to serve in London as well as where they resided.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that a man having two qualifications was no reason why he should not be liable to serve in both places.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 16; Noes 46: Majority 30.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 (Juries in particular places).

SIR JOHN HAY called attention to the wording of the clause. As it stood, although the jurors of a borough would be exempt from serving at the county quarter sessions, the justices would not. Justices who were not eligible to serve as jurors at the borough general or quarter sessions, and who had to attend the county general or quarter sessions as justices, would be liable to serve there as jurors. It had been suggested to him that the clause should be amended by inserting the words "burgesses of" in place of the words "jurors in." As the law now stood, "jurors in every borough in and for which a separate court of quarter sessions shall be holden, so far as relates to any jury summoned for the trial of any issues joined in any court of general quarter sessions of the peace in the county wherein such borough is situate" were exempt.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the term "burgess" would not meet what the hon. Baronet had in view. He would undertake to meet the objection by inserting proper words in a subsequent stage of the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WEST said, that the object of the clause was to exempt jurymen in boroughs who had to serve at borough sessions from being called upon to act at the county quarter sessions. He did not object to jurymen serving in boroughs being relieved from serving in counties; but the Bill provided no machinery for having separate lists for these separate services.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, there were certain boroughs which had limited jurisdictions of their own, and where jurors were called upon four times a-year to serve in these boroughs it was fair and reasonable that they should be exempted from performing analogous duties in counties. The Sheriff would be required in all cases to summon juries, within the jurisdiction of the authority from whom he received the precedent. The Bill did not interfere with either the limited jurisdiction, or what he might call for the purposes of this Bill the more unlimited jurisdictions now existing.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 10 to 28, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 29 (Making out lists in the City. Secondary to issue precepts.)

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE moved the rejection of the clause. In the City there were 98 or 99 parishes, and the lists were at present made out by the authorities of the different wards—by the clerks of the 25 wards. By the present Bill a new machinery would be set up and a considerable expense incurred. At present the City was treated as one parish; but the present Bill would resuscitate the several parishes. There was no reason for altering the existing machinery and throwing an additional duty on the vestry clerks. The clause did not apply to any place outside the City, and he proposed its omission with the view of hereafter inserting a clause providing that the Act should not affect the present mode of forming the jury list.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could not agree to the proposal, which was intended to except the City of London from the operation of the Bill and leave the City exactly in its present state.

There were nominally 93 parishes, but by co-operation and amalgamation the number had been considerably reduced, and the number of persons to be employed under the provisions of the Bill would not much exceed the present number. The object of the clause was to assimilate the condition of the City to that of the large towns and the rest of England, and he saw no reason why the City should remain in its present peculiar position.

MR. LOPES observed that there could be no doubt that the present state of things in the City of London was exceptional, and no reason had been shown for perpetuating that exceptional state of things. The case made for the City of London had been fully considered by the Select Committee, and the proposal made by the hon. Alderman had been rejected by a large majority.

MR. R. N. FOWLER, believing that the proposed change would create many difficulties and inconveniences, supported the Amendment.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he thought it would be impossible to make the City of London like the other parts of England, and was of opinion that the affairs of the City were very well managed. The lists were better made up, to his knowledge, in the City of London than in Middlesex or Hertfordshire.

MR. JAMES complained that the commercial juries had been getting worse and worse in London every year. The Select Committee which had lately sat had tried to trace that fact to its source. They found that the ward clerks selected these juries, and the clerks, he believed, were themselves appointed by the Court of Aldermen. The Committee had come to the conclusion that it was better to place the making up of the lists in the hands of the overseers. The hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Alderman Lawrence), however, clung to the ward clerks; but it was impossible to understand why the City should have the distinction of having bad juries.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE, in reply, attributed the unpleasant experience which hon. and learned Gentlemen had had of London juries to the difficulty they had found in convincing them in cases where the juries were really in the right. Allowance was always made in the City for the inconveniences and mortifications encountered by gentlemen of the long robe. This was the first time he had heard an imputation thrown on the returning officers of the City of London. The charge was a very grave one, and he denied that the lists were selected from the worst citizens in the City of London. He agreed, however, with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. James), when he stated that the lists had depreciated. The Bill of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Viscount Enfield) had deteriorated the juries, and it would go on deteriorating them unless some alteration was made. He contended that the lists for the City of London had been made up with great impartiality. The City in this matter was asking for no privilege, but for the retention of satisfactory and inexpensive machinery.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 97; Noes 19: Majority 78.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 30 to 40, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 41 (Corrections of the lists both in the city and elsewhere to be made every three months).

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE moved, in page 12, line 32, after "lists," to leave out "for the city of London and elsewhere," and insert "elsewhere than in the city of London." It would be impossible for the overseers to fulfil the duties cast upon them by this clause.

MR. LEEMAN said, he thought that in many large parishes it would be impossible to carry out the provision.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS also thought that the proposed plan could not be carried out, and that persons would not be found to become overseers if so many extra duties were attached to the office.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL upon reflection, agreed that perhaps the clause would cast too heavy a burden upon overseers in populous places. His object had been to keep the lists as clear as possible of the names of persons who would not appear when summoned. He would consent to the clause being negatived, and would probably bring up a new clause upon the Report.

Clause negatived.

Clause 42 agreed to.

Clause 43 (Overseers and vestry clerks to be paid for making out the lists).

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE moved, in page 13, line 29, after "the" to insert "Secondary of the city of London," his object being to afford the Aldermen an opportunity of awarding that functionary remuneration for the additional duties that would be cast upon him by this Bill if they thought it advisable to do so.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL objected to this proposal, because he did not think that the Secondary should be placed in a better position than he was at present, or than the town clerk, who performed similar duties in respect to those lists.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, the Bill would impose additional duties upon the Secondary, and it was only fair that he should be paid for them. It appeared to him that hon. Members did not understand how justice was administered in the City of London.

MR. JAMES observed, that the hon. Alderman was quite right in saying that they could never understand how justice was administered in the City of London, inasmuch as it was the only city in which 26 Aldermen administered the law.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked the hon. Member for the City of London whether he was prepared to say what the salary of the functionary referred to was?

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE was unable to say; but he knew that the fees of the Secondary had been greatly reduced by the Act which abolished imprisonment for debt.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that the late Secondary received about £1,000 a-year; whereas the present officer was only paid about £500 to £600 a-year, chiefly from fees.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 44 agreed to.

Clause 45 (Overseer and vestry clerks to present their accounts to the courts of revision).

MR. MAGNIAC said, he had an Amendment to propose of which he had not given Notice; but, nevertheless, he hoped that the Government would accede to it. He thought that if there was one charge which ought to be borne by the Imperial Revenue it was the charge incurred for the due administration of justice; and with that object he proposed in page 14, line 8, after the word "from," to omit "out of the first moneys thereafter to be collected for the relief of the poor in the several parishes," in order to insert "from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, as provided in respect of prosecutions by 31st and 32nd of Victoria."

THE CHAIRMAN informed the hon. Member that a proposal throwing a charge on the public revenue required the Queen's consent to be signified, and it was also requisite that the House should go into Committee for the purpose.

MR. MAGNIAC said, he hoped that, under these circumstances, the Attorney General would consent to postpone the clause.

MR. GOLDNEY suggested to the hon. Member for St. Ives, that he might effect his object by proposing to omit the latter part of the clause, leaving the Government to find the means to defray the expenses to be incurred under the Bill.

MR. MAGNIAC, acceding to the suggestion, moved to leave out all the words after "from" in the eighth line to the end of the clause.

MR. MUNTZ considered that the question raised by the Amendment of the hon. Member (Mr. Magniac) was far too serious to be discussed without due Notice. Moreover, he thought it would be a great pity if the question of the expense of preparing the jury lists under this Bill were allowed to enter into the consideration of the important subject of local taxation when all these expenses had hitherto been defrayed out of the poor-rate.

MR. W. ORMSBY-GORE protested against the Imperial Revenue, to which Ireland was an important contributor, being called upon to pay the expenses in connection with jury lists in England alone.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL could not help hoping that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Magniac) would, upon consideration, not press his Amendment. The cost of preparing jury lists and all the expenses connected with juries were a purely local matter; and further, they constituted a charge that had hitherto been borne without any question whatever by the different localities of the country. This matter had been expressly considered by the Select Committee, which was unanimously of opinion that it would be most unfit in a Bill of this kind to change the incidence of a charge of this nature from counties and parishes to the Imperial Exchequer.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH said, he thought the House, after its Resolution of last Session respecting local taxation, had a right to expect long before this definite proposals from the Government. It was natural, under these circumstances, that an hon. Member interested should take the first opportunity of raising the question.

MR. LOPES said, the Attorney General had not stated the case correctly. Up to the present time, the overseers had been paid the pocket expenses incurred, but had not been entitled to receive remuneration for preparing the jury list. No doubt they ought to be remunerated; but the remuneration ought not to be charged on local taxation.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS replying to the statement of the Attorney General that this was an eminently local charge, said, that anyone who was acquainted with the Northern Circuit must be aware that the cause list of Liverpool was anything but local. The question was one deserving the consideration of the Government when they came to investigate what charges were local and what Imperial.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK remarked that seeing by the Bill as it now stood 95 new officers, at great expense, would be required for the City of London, he must support the Amendment.

MR. MAGNIAC explained that his object was to prevent any fresh charge being laid upon the poor-rate. He must go to a Division.

MR. CRAUFURD said, as a Scotch Member he supported the Resolution of last year with regard to local taxation, and he hoped this Committee and also the House would for the future resist any further imposition of local taxation until the Government had thought fit to give effect to the Resolution of last year.

MR. GLADSTONE protested against a division being taken upon such a question without Notice. The hon. Member for North Hants (Mr. Solater-Booth) regarded the Amendment as a Vote of Censure on the Government for not having acted on the Resolution of last year. Would it be satisfactory to deal with the large question of local taxation by allowing small charges of £2,000 or £3,000 to be thrown on the Imperial Revenue, while the main grievance remained untouched? What would be more contemptible than for the Government to endeavour to stave off the obligation resting upon it by making small concessions? The hon. Member for North Hants was ready to take credit for the reduction of the income tax and sugar duties. Was his financial genius equal to the task of making these reductions and at the same time relieving local burdens by the same means? It was untrue the Government had overlooked the Resolution of last year. In deference to the feelings of the House the Government had announced that it was prepared to deal with local taxation, and had described the order in which they thought it should be dealt with. Proposals were now before the House relating to matters which must first be disposed of. Was it the duty of the Government to overlook that which was necessary for the effectual dealing with the question merely to make a show of prompt obedience to the Resolution? The Government had gone to great lengths in committing themselves to the proposed transfer of local taxation to Imperial funds. The scheme of the Government would involve a large financial displacement, and the reconsideration of the principles which regulate the distribution of taxation between real and personal property, and between property and labour. It was not fair, nor was it a wise and prudent recommendation to make to the Committee that, in lieu of raising the issue directly in a straightforward manner, a Motion of this kind should be made which was totally insignificant with regard to the amount it involved, and which, if adopted, could have no other effect than that of neutralizing, or of destroying altogether, the attempt of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General to amend the state of the law with reference to juries. Whatever was done should be done broadly and fairly. The question now raised was a very important one, and he hoped that the Committee would not adopt the Motion of his hon. Friend. If the House saw any desire on the part of the Government to shrink from dealing with the subject which it had greatly at heart, it could inflict upon them any mark of its displeasure which it thought fit. A Motion of this kind was totally unsatisfactory, and the only effect of it would be to leave the present measure without any provision for meeting expenses in themselves proper and reasonable, to cripple a useful Bill, and to discourage an energetic, laborious, and well-considered effort to improve the jury system.

Mr. SCLATER - BOOTH observed that, as a matter of fact, he did object to the remission of the sugar duty, and if he had had an opportunity he would not only have given his voice but his vote against it. He contended that any Gentleman who took part in the division of last year was justified, when a new charge was proposed, in telling the Government that they were proceeding in a course which was objected to by the majority of the House. The proposal of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Magniac) was moderate and reasonable. As for the Bills now before the House, they quite failed to carry out the Resolution of last year, and it seemed to him as if the subject was relegated to an indefinite future. He would certainly support the hon. Member if he went to a division, or if the Committee wished that Progress should be reported he would not object.

Mr. BOUVERIE said, he hoped the Committee would be cautious before adopting any such decision as it was invited to take by the hon. Member for St. Ives. Who could have thought that on a Bill dealing with the jury laws the question of local taxation would be raised? The Committee would not wish that a question of such importance should be decided, as it were, by a snatch division. His hon. Friend had given no Notice of his Amendment, and was the Committee to anticipate what ought to be its deliberate judgment in the way now proposed by the hon. Member? Nothing could be more unwise or imprudent.

Mr. GOLDNEY said, he did not think the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) had looked at the matter fairly. The question before the Committee at present was this: when the Government were bringing forward a scheme for the improvement of the judicial arrangements of the country, were the expenses to be thrown on the rates?

What the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Magniac) proposed was, that the matter should be dealt with in the same way as the expenses that would arise under the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill would be dealt with. What he contended for was that no new charges should be thrown on the local rates.

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that a very important issue had been raised upon a very small matter. It would be monstrous if the House were to attempt to dispose of the subject of local taxation on a point such as this.

Mr. HENLEY said, it was proposed to give to every petty sessions, without any directions whatever, the power to make an order on the rates. There ought to be some provision to secure at least uniformity in a county, but there was nothing of the kind. He trusted that the Government would re-consider the question.

Mr. MAGNIAC said, this charge was shown, and could not be denied, to be a new one; and it was on that account he objected to it most strongly. As the Bill would not come into operation until the 1st of November, ample time would be given for bringing the charge on the Imperial funds. It was said by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that he had not given Notice; but that had arisen from circumstances over which he had no control. Still, he felt it would be pressing unduly an important question on the House without Notice if he insisted on a division. He would, therefore, ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Mr. CRAUFURD said, he hoped the Committee would resist the imposition of any new local tax, unless the Government consented to report Progress.

Mr. MONK said, he did not think they should snap a division on an important question. He did not see why the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Magniac) should not be allowed to withdraw his Amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed that there were many inconveniences attending the practice of taking a division without Notice, and among them was this—that many hon. Gentlemen could not know what they were voting about. Everybody seemed to think that the 46th clause applied only to a single payment, for making out the jury lists. But if hon. Members turned to the 45th section, they would see that two payments were contemplated. [Mr. ASHETON CROSS: That has been struck out.] That made no difference. The proposal was that the charge at present made for expenses incurred should be transferred from the local rate to the Consolidated Fund. The object was not a small sum; but to make a ground-work on which a hold could be made for the future. This was a fair object, but not one which ought to be achieved without Notice. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would be allowed to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he understood the Amendment was limited to what had been laid down as a new charge. If there was any dispute about it, and if the Government was in the least taken by surprise, they should move to report Progress. He had not the slightest disposition to snap a division. The Committee should vote on the question with full knowledge.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL contended if there had been the slightest intention to raise the question of local taxation on this Bill it should have been raised on the 43rd section. He put it to the candour of hon. Gentlemen opposite whether it was fair to come to a conclusion wholly inconsistent with the earlier part of the scheme, which had been agreed to without opposition.

MR. ASHETON CROSS said, that as the Committee had got into a dilemma he thought the best course to pursue would be to report Progress, so that the matter should be considered when there was a larger attendance. He therefore moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress."—(Mr. Asheton Cross.)

MR. LOPES said, he could not agree with the Attorney General that the present clause was not the one on which this question ought to be raised.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government would not at so late an hour resist the Motion for reporting Progress if the Committee desired to carry it. In the interval, however, before the consideration of the Bill was resumed, hon. Gentlemen opposite would do well to consider whether the proposal supplied or constituted a form in which they wished to assert the principle which they entertained with regard to local taxation. As to the Amendment, his hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Magniac) put upon it the construction he desired it to bear—namely, that it was a protest and a warning. It would have been far better if his hon. Friend (Mr. Magniac) had been allowed to withdraw his Amendment. The intention of his hon. Friend was that the charge should be transferred to the Consolidated Fund. With respect to that the Government said the question of local charges ought not to be dealt with in this manner. The other branch of the question was, that there was a new charge created, which it was proposed should be thrown on the Consolidated Fund. This charge was the remuneration to the overseers for their trouble, and this charge, it was proposed by the Amendment, was to be fixed by the local authority.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the proposition hardly amounted to this, as the first Amendment had been withdrawn.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the amount must be paid from either local or Imperial funds. The Committee had constituted this charge in Clauses 43 and 44, and they had committed to the local authority the power of determining the charge which was now sought to be thrown on the Consolidated Fund. If the local authorities were not to pay from local funds they must come upon the Imperial funds.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH said, that if the Amendment had been carried, no charge on the Consolidated Fund was of necessity entailed; but these three clauses must have been altered on the Report.

MR. MAGNIAC said, that the Prime Minister having asserted that he had only moved his Amendment as a protest, he wished to explain that he intended it to the best of his ability to be an effective protest. The only reason why he withdrew his Amendment was that it had been made without Notice.

MR. PELL said, he thought it just as improper that the local authorities should fix the charge on the local rates as that they should fix the charges to come out of the Consolidated Fund.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, unless objection were taken at the time when local taxation was proposed, those who wished to relieve local burdens were told they were too late. This charge was part of the administration of justice.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked when the Bill would be taken again?

MR. GLADSTONE said, Monday was to be given to the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill, and on Tuesday the House would begin the consideration of the Local Taxation Bills. He was afraid that the present measure must now stand over until the more urgent Business was got rid of.

Motion agreed to.

LAW AGENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Adam.)

[BILL 150.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Interpretation of terms).

MR. GORDON hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate would state the understanding on which he wished the discussion to proceed, and particularly, whether he proposed that the rights of the existing corporations should be destroyed altogether, or whether the corporations which at present had the power of passing practitioners should have their powers continued?

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Admission, enrolment, and powers of Law Agents).

MR. CRAUFURD said, there was one point he wished to call attention to. The Bill proposed to open up all the Law Courts to qualified practitioners, but there was one privilege which was not interfered with—no person could issue summonses or take out processes in connection with the Superior Courts, without obtaining the signature of the Writer to the Signet. He believed, although it was that on which the name of the Society was founded, the privilege was a small one, and one from the continuance of which no advantage could be expected. Indeed, the Law Commissioners, as would be remembered, recommended that it should be done away with. He proposed, therefore, to move the addition of a Proviso to that effect.

MR. BOUVERIE said, there was another point on which he wished to get information. The clause provided that no one should practise in the Law Courts except those qualified in accordance with the provisions of this Act. The qualification was a general one for all the Courts, and it undoubtedly seemed to be the proper system to have one door through which all solicitors should be admitted. In another portion of the Bill, however, other modes of admission were provided. He was informed that they were eight or nine in number, and he wished to know how matters really stood; because, on the first blush, it seemed to him that the exceptions were not reasonable ones. In order to elicit an answer to his queries, he would move the omission of the first part of the clause.

Amendment moved to leave out "From and after the passing of this Act no person shall be admitted as a Law Agent in Scotland except in accordance with the provisions of this Act."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) for giving him an opportunity of making such a statement as was desiderated by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gordon). According to the system which had prevailed for a very long time in Scotland, solicitors were not admitted over the whole country by the decree of a Superior Court, but were admitted by the Courts in their several localities; and their privileges as regarded practice related solely to those Courts, whether superior or inferior, by which they were admitted. There was thus one body of solicitors before the Supreme Court in Edinburgh, another body of practitioners in Glasgow, a third in Perth, and so on. Another feature of the system was that in the various localities there existed Societies having exclusive privileges. In Edinburgh there were the two Societies of the Writers to the Signet and the Solicitors before the Supreme Court, and they had the exclusive privilege of practising before the Court of Session. In Glasgow, again, there was the Faculty of Procurators, with the exclusive privilege of practising before the Sheriff Courts of Lanark, and with the power of admitting practitioners. There were other bodies having corresponding powers in other parts of the country. The general and main object of the present measure was to put an end to this system of partial admissions to practise before particular Courts, and to substitute a general admission by the Superior Court in Edinburgh for the whole country. Its second object was to terminate all existing monopolies, so that the right to practise would no longer depend on the will of local Societies, and these Societies would no longer have the right to say who was qualified. The 19th clause, to which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) had referred, did not continue any of the monopolies in question. It proposed—and it was a proposition merely, for there was an Amendment on the Paper which might or might not be adopted—that the Court in Edinburgh should be allowed to accept a certificate of admission to any of the Societies referred to—they were nine in number—as equivalent to a certificate of qualification and fitness from examiners appointed under the Act, provided they were satisfied that the conditions of admission were such as to show a satisfactory qualification. It was proposed to empower the Court to accept certificates of examination by the Society of the Writers to the Signet as equivalent to an examination by their own examiners, if—and only if—the Court should be satisfied that the examination of the Society was sufficient to afford qualification and guarantee to practise.

MR. CRAUFURD moved the insertion of words, the effect of which was to take away from the Writers to the Signet the exclusive privilege of signing writs and summonses.

MR. M'LAREN said, he entirely approved of the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Ayr. The Lord Advocate had stated that the object of the Bill was to destroy all monopolies. He (Mr. M'Laren) agreed that it was desirable to effect that object, and this Amendment was to destroy a small monopoly which now existed.

THE LORD ADVOCATE hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not press his Amendment. He admitted that a great deal might be said against Writers to the Signet enjoying the exclusive privilege of signing writs which passed the Signet, but that was not the proper occasion to deal with the subject. To do it now, without its having been under the consideration of the body interested, would be a somewhat objectionable proceeding. He quite appreciated the views of his hon. and learned Friend, and he should be prepared to give them favourable consideration at a fitting period; but he did not think the present was the occasion. It was a sentimental grievance; and he believed there was no difficulty in getting the summons signed by a brother practitioner; but there was a feeling of sentiment in asking for a favour of this kind, and he should be glad to consider the matter at a future and more appropriate time.

MR. CRAUFURD said, though it might be a sentimental grievance, the Lord Advocate had said nothing to show that it ought to be retained.

MR. MILLER hoped the Amendment would be persisted on. If it was a sentimental grievance, it would be easier to redress than a real grievance.

MR. ORR EWING, on the other hand, hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he felt the force of the argument, that he had not given Notice of his Amendment; but he hoped that some other opportunity would be given him of raising the question. He should withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Provisions as to the qualification of applicants or admission as Law Agents in future. Cases in which service for the term of three years will suffice).

LORD ELCHO proposed as an Amendment, in page 2, line 25, after the word "Agent," to add the words, "or sheriff clerk." The object was to compensate the sheriff clerk when an alteration was made imposing new duties upon him.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that was not a matter to which he attached much importance, and he was inclined to give way to the feeling of the Committee. It was quite true that heretofore sheriff clerks had been permitted to receive apprentices; but he did not think it was a fitting training school for solicitors, who would have to practise in a Superior Court.

Mr. BOUVERIE said, the present proposal would work very great hardship and inconvenience to the sheriff clerks. They would be deprived of a source of emolument without any corresponding compensation. He therefore proposed that the present sheriff clerks should have the privilege allowed them.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, on the Report, he would bring up words to carry out the suggestion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. CRAUFURD moved as an Amendment, in page 3, line 11, after "Agents," to add as a separate paragraph—

"A person who either before or after the passing of this Act shall for three years have been in practice as a notary public, or shall for five years have been a clerk to and engaged under the superintendence of a notary public."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he objected to the Amendment, on the ground that it applied to notaries public for all future time.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

INDIA—M. DE LESSEPS' PROJECT— CENTRAL ASIAN RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to M. de Lesseps' proposed Railway to India through Central Asia from Orenburg via Samarcand to Peshawur; and, if it be true that the Russian Government is in treaty with M. de Lesseps on this line of communication, whether Her Majesty's Government will reconsider their policy on the subject of Railway communication with India, and especially with regard to the Euphrates Valley line?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have been informed of communications which have passed between M. de Lesseps and General Ignatieff, the Russian Ambassador at Constantinople, on the subject of a proposed Railway to India through Central Asia, but they are not aware of what view the Russian Government take of such a proposal.

NAVY—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MR. TROTMAN AND THE ADMIRALTY.

QUESTION.

MR. G. BENTINCK asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, when the Return of Correspondence, &c. ordered on the 2nd of April, between Mr. Trotman and the Admiralty, will be laid upon the Table?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, the Return would be laid upon the Table of the House in a few days. It would have been done before, had he not been anxious to present with it some letters anterior to the date asked for, and which would be printed in a separate form.

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA— NAVAL REVIEW AT SPITHEAD.

QUESTIONS.

COLONEL ANNESLEY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it has been decided to hold a Naval Review at Spithead on the occasion of the visit of the Shah of Persia to this Country?

MR. GOSCHEN: Sir, the Shah will be received at Dover by a considerable gathering of iron-clads of the Channel Fleet and the Reserve Fleet, with several other ships; and the demonstration, if I may call it so, at Dover will of itself partake to a certain extent of the nature of a naval review. There will also be a gathering of ships on another day at Spithead. The Shah is expected to go to Portsmouth during his visit to this country, and will have an opportunity of witnessing a large number of men-of-war, and every honour will be done him on that occasion; but there will be no naval review in the strict sense of the word.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that being dissatisfied with the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, he wished to know from him, Whether, as we could not hope to vie with other countries in military displays, or, indeed, in presenting any great spectacle on land, Her Majesty's Government would not think it advisable to signalize the approaching visit of the Shah of Persia by a grand assemblage and review of our Fleet, an element of national strength in which this country was wholly unsurpassed, in some better way during his visit to Portsmouth than the answer just given seemed to indicate? He should like, therefore, to hear from the right hon. Gentleman what was intended to be done in the matter, as it would appear there was to be no naval review.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he had not exactly stated that there would be no naval review. There would be a very large gathering of men-at-war at Spithead, representing what the hon. Member called our "unsurpassed strength," and the Shah would have the opportunity of seeing our most magnificent ships assembled there. He would also have the opportunity, of which he would in all probability avail himself, of going on board some of our largest vessels, and thus observing the power of the naval resources of this country.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE CHIPPING NORTON MAGISTRATES.—QUESTION.

MR. BOWRING asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is able to inform the House of the result of the inquiries instituted by him with reference to the recent Chipping Norton case; and, whether he is able to inform the House if there is any truth in the statements which have been published to the effect that the infants of two of the imprisoned women were insufficiently supplied with food during the period of their mother's incarceration?

MR. BRUCE in reply, said, that neither from the prisoners themselves nor from anybody on their behalf had he received any Memorial at all. Having seen a statement on that subject in the papers of the 26th May, he addressed a question about it to the magistrates and received their answer on the 29th of May. But in the meantime the sentences of a large number of the women had expired, and those of the rest were on the point of expiring. The magistrates had contented themselves with sending him a report in a newspaper, for the correctness of which they vouched, from which it appeared that the following were the facts of the case:—Some 30 women, a few of whom were armed with sticks, went to a gate and waylaid two men, who had accepted employment from a farmer named Hambridge, threatening that if the men went back to work they would beat them; and after some parley the men retired, when the women followed them, hustled them, pushed them into a hedge, and declared they would duck them in a pond if they attempted to return to work. The men in about half-an-hour attempted to go back to work, when they again met the women, some of whom asked them to go to the public house to have beer, and some tried to get them to join the Union. The men refused, and on their refusal the same threats of ill-treatment were repeated if they returned to work. Charges were afterwards brought against 16 out of the 30 women for a breach of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, in having used violence, threats, and intimidation to prevent those men from working. The witnesses for the prosecution fully proved the case; there was no evidence for the defence; and there appeared to be no doubt that the women had broken the law. Indeed, it was said, they were ignorant of the law; but he could hardly believe their ignorance was so barbarous as to lead them to suppose that any person, whether man or woman, had a right to interfere with men in that way and endeavour, by means of threats, intimidation, and violence, to prevent them from working. If the women themselves had been so treated by men, and when they complained had been told that it was only the ordinary rough play of the district, and, in fact, no legal offence, they would, he thought, have had good reason to be astonished at such a state of the law. Nor did he think they could have supposed that what was an offence in a man ceased to be an offence in a woman. At any rate, if that was their idea, it was very expedient that the contrary should be proved to them. So far, the case was clear. The question remained as to the discretion of the magistrates in the punishment they inflicted. It seemed to him to have been quite excessive, and at the same time unnecessary for the vindication of the law and in order to give a wholesome example in the neighbourhood, that as many as sixteen persons should be committed to gaol. The magistrates, as he understood, said it was impossible to distinguish between their cases; but in the first place, they had themselves distinguished between the cases by inflicting on seven of the accused a heavier punishment by three days than they inflicted on the remaining nine. As to the necessity for so severe a punishment, he thought that was contradicted by the fact that one of the magistrates called on the prosecutor not to press the case. That course not being acceded to, the magistrates, he was informed, said that they had no other course to adopt under the Act than to commit the women to prison. But there was no doubt they might have passed a lighter sentence, and have bound the women over in their own recognizances to appear and submit to the sentence; or, on the other hand, it would have been quite competent for the magistrates, on the evidence before them, to convict those who had taken the most active part in the disturbance for an assault, and to fine them, enforcing the fine, if necessary, by imprisonment. Neither of those courses, however, appeared to have occurred to the magistrates, and the case did seem to show a very grave want of discretion; because, although the women undoubtedly had committed an offence, the extent to which their punishment was carried had a tendency to enlist the sympathy of the public on the side of those who had broken the law, whereas a moderate punishment would have been accepted by all as a suitable penalty. Under these circumstances, the Lord Chancellor had thought it proper to write to the Lord Lieutenant of the county with regard to the conduct of the magistrates in the matter, and to call on them for an explanation of that conduct; and after receiving such an explanation, he would take the course which he thought necessary. With respect to the statement contained in the latter part of the hon. Member's Question, when he saw it in the newspapers, he had desired inquiry to be made of the Visiting Justices as to its accuracy, but no answer had yet been received.

COMMISSION OF THE PEACE— CLERICAL MAGISTRATES.—QUESTION.

MR. MCCARTHY DOWNING asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is aware that a rule has been for many years in force in Ireland by which clergymen of all denominations have been excluded from the Commission of the Peace in that Country; and, whether he is prepared to apply the same rule to the other portions of the United Kingdom?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he believed, although he had not had time since Notice of the Question had been given to make any inquiry on the subject, such as he should desire to make, that there was a rule in Ireland which had been observed for a length of time—and, he dared say, a very salutary one—by which no clergyman or minister of any denomination had been placed on the list of magistrates. In regard to Scotland, he had had no time to obtain authentic information on that matter. He would observe, however, in passing, that the case of England was not exactly parallel to that of Ireland, because there were in Ireland resident magistrates, and a large portion of the duties executed by unpaid magistrates in England was performed by stipendiary magistrates in Ireland. As to the case of England, he was not prepared to give his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing), the summary reply for which he asked. The matter required consideration, and any decision which might be arrived at ought to be stated with the reasons for it. The first thing he wished to do was to ascertain the facts, and he had requested the Home Secretary to obtain some Return or information showing not only the actual number of clerical magistrates in this country, but also the course of practice in late years, which undoubtedly had tended to a very great extent—and he thought it a salutary tendency—to restrict materially the number of such magistrates. Perhaps when his hon. Friend saw that information, he might or might not think fit to return to the subject. However that might be, it was a subject which could not be dealt with in the summary way indicated by his Question.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—COMMITTEES OF SEAMEN—RETURN.
QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Return, ordered by the House of Commons on the 17th February last,

"of the Crews of Merchant Ships which have been committed to Prison in the years 1870, 1871, and 1872, for refusing to proceed to sea; showing the numbers of men in each case, the name of the ship, and the term of imprisonment, together with the reason alleged by the seamen for refusing to go to sea," will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that there had been considerable delay in getting the Returns, in consequence of the form in which the order for them was originally drawn up. It had especially been found difficult to obtain any information as to the reasons alleged by seamen for refusing to go to sea. It had therefore been necessary to ask for the Returns in a fresh form; but the English portion would be ready next week; the Scotch portion had arrived that day, but the Irish had not yet come in.

RIGHTS OF PATENTEES—GOVERNMENT MANUFACTURES.—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Her Majesty's Government claim right to have patented articles manufactured for them by private firms with payment of royalties to the patent and, whether they have ordered patented articles in any case for the Department, and have indemnified manufacturers against the claim royalty; and if such action has been taken on the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, under the advice of the Law Officers of the late Government, Her Majesty's Government claim the right to have patented articles manufactured for them by private firms without payment of royalties to the patentees; and, although I might, perhaps, demur to any questions being on legal proceedings now pending, have no objection to state that the Department have ordered such articles, and, in case of dispute, I shall take measures as I may be advised proper for maintaining the public right.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read; Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.

ARMY—THE CAVALRY FORCE.
RESOLUTION.

CAPTAIN TALBOT, in rising to attention to the inadequacy and inefficiency of the Cavalry Force in this country, and to the present system of purchasing horses; and to move—

"That in the opinion of this House, considering the smallness of the Force, it is expedient to at once take steps for providing sufficient reserve of men and horses for Cavalry," said, he wished to point out that astounding successes of the German in the late war with France were probably to have been due more to the preparation and organization of the Prussian troops than to any difference in the fighting qualities of the two armies, and he would quote a passage from the review which appeared in The Times of the German official History of the War, to show that "all the wretched fusion" which existed in the case of the French—

"occurred . . . because the War Office at Paris had kept the administration in its own hands, and had never understood the vastness of the task of mobilizing a great Army. Let no smile pass over the face of an Englishman when he reads Von Moltke's account. We, the practical people par excellence, are in no better case at this moment. We have the same evil system of centralization, the same blind confidence of what we could do on the spur of the moment; and the case of France would be ours, if we were suddenly to mobilize all our available troops to resist invasion."

He did not, however, on the present occasion, intend to enter into the question of the general system of military administration, and would confine himself to that arm of the service to which his Notice particularly referred. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) had, in an attack made upon the Household Cavalry in the Session of 1871, made the astounding remark that cavalry, and especially heavy cavalry, had taken but little part in the last war. But that was far from being the fact, as he (Captain Talbot) was able to show in the debate. Cavalry, and especially heavy cavalry—for German cavalry was principally heavy—contributed as much as any arm in the service to the success of the German armies, and perhaps more than any arm to the rapidity of that success. That glorious day—the 17th of August, 1870—when at the battle of Rezonville the Prussian cavalry enabled one Corps d'Armée to hold its ground against, and prevent the retreat of the whole French Army, was a sufficient proof, even if it stood alone, that the days of cavalry charging cavalry and engaging infantry had not gone by. Colonel Bonie, of the 11th Dragoons (French), who wrote with great frankness and ability, said of this battle—

"As for bodies of cavalry meeting cavalry that happened repeatedly. The horses of our light cavalry were knocked to pieces against the solid and impassable line formed by German Dragoons. From which it appears that as the advantage is on the side of size and weight, one should never engage where there is too great a disparity."

He (Captain Talbot) was supported by authorities in denying that the days of cavalry had gone by. On the contrary, their rôle in warfare had changed but not diminished. The duties of reconnaissances and of veiling the movements of an Army had taken a first place in importance; while with the increasing range of artillery and its greater mobility the necessity for cavalry, both in the attack and defence of that arm, was greater than ever. He could not accept the last war as a certain precedent as to what would happen in any future war, because in that instance one Army was fully prepared for war and the other was totally unprepared. In future wars, instead of a few horsemen taking possession of large towns and requisitioning whole provinces, they would see cavalry engagements great and small, and that cavalry which, by the perfection of its organization and the ampleress of its reserve was able to maintain itself in the field, would be able to give that assistance to the main body so essential to its ultimate success. What was the state of our own cavalry force at the present time? Was its number sufficient for the duties it had to perform? Was it fit to take the field, and could it maintain itself when it was there? He fully admitted that it was impossible in the present state of feeling in this country to keep up the cavalry at a war standard in a time of peace; and, indeed, it would be impossible to keep that force up to such a standard, without the expenditure of an enormous sum of money annually. But in time of peace preparation might be made for war, without undue expenditure, by reorganizing our cavalry system. Our cavalry force, as compared with that of other countries, was most inadequate. We could not attempt to compete with the numbers of foreign armies—indeed, the comparison was too appalling—but surely their units should be of something like equal strength—regiment for regiment, squadron for squadron. Thus, the cavalry regiments of North Germany during the last war consisted of five squadrons, numbering 690 riding and 115 draught horses, of which four squadrons took the field and one remained at home to train men and horses to fill the vacancies occasioned by the casualties of war. Our regiments consist of only four weak squadrons, all of which are supposed to take the field, no reserves being left at home, nor any provision being made for maintaining the force during war. The regiments averaged 320 horses, of which 10 per cent were four-year-olds. At the Manœuvres their regimental transport was found by most regiments, and their number still further reduced by furnishing orderlies, &c., for the cavalry Staff. The result of our present system was that each of our cavalry regiments which took part in the last Autumn Manœuvres did not exceed the strength of two squadrons of German cavalry, while towards the end they probably little exceeded one. It must be recollected that it was impossible to improvise cavalry. Colonel Bonie said—

"Before the war, much was written and said in France in favour of the cavalry being reduced, but better informed and more clear-sighted Prussia allowed us to theorize, and silently prepared her own cavalry, and increased its numbers and relative proportions to other arms."

Again, he said—

"As soon as war had been formally declared against Prussia, the various cavalry regiments received the order to mobilise. Immediately the vices of our organization were brought to light, and, in spite of all efforts, our zeal failed to contend successfully against impossibilities. It is evident that during peace regiments cannot be kept up to a war footing: such a system would be ruinous. But since this is the case there is all the more reason that a system should be adopted which should enable the cavalry to receive, on the shortest notice, supplies of men and horses sufficient to carry the total to a war strength, otherwise the cavalry, which ought to precede the Army in order to obtain intelligence, will on the contrary be the last ready, and instead of being the vanguard will be the rearguard. At the commencement of this war we not only had no reserves of horses, but a portion of our effective strength was composed of four-year-old remounts. Thus it was that with the greatest difficulty we only succeeded in getting together four squadrons per regiment, of 102 horses each, which strength, the smallest with which one can take the field, was soon lessened by a few days of hard work. . . . Thus, from the commencement of hostilities, the weakness of every part of our organization became only too apparent. Owing to our system of remounts, we were obliged, for want of reserves, to march with a strength that was barely sufficient for a peace establishment; and once on the road our squadrons of 80 horses remained at that strength without ever being completed up to their proper total. Therefore, we must reorganise and perfect this branch of our system. An improved system should supply an inexhaustible supply of remounts told off to regiments beforehand, and which should be numerous enough to fill up all vacancies. The same thing applies to the teaching of both man and horse."

We had at the last Manœuvres a force of something like 30,000 men, of which 12 regiments were cavalry in brigade and one broken up—a very proper proportion; but that exhausted the whole force of cavalry in the United Kingdom, except one regiment in Manchester and one in Scotland. Was that an adequate reserve? The seven regiments in Ireland were not included, but could they reduce the garrison there? But where was the cavalry to come from for the rest of the infantry? The Secretary of State for War would not admit it was all he could produce; and indeed, while few infantry regiments took part in the Manœuvres of 1871 and those of 1872, the cavalry that was present in the former year were also at the latter. He ventured to assert that if the Manœuvres last year had been a campaign and a successful one, that we should not have had any cavalry for further operations. How could reconnaissances and other duties be well performed without abundance of strength to relieve men and horses? The Army was exposed to great disasters by neglecting the lessons they should have learnt, and the officers would be blamed for ignorance and incapacity in failing in the performance of duties beyond their powers to undertake. They had had little experience in cavalry warfare since arms of precision were introduced, and none since the great development of artillery and the introduction of breechloaders. The Crimea was no field for cavalry—a fact the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) might remember when he thought fit to taunt certain regiments with not being there—and, except at Balaclava, played a passive rather than an active part, and yet what was its state after ten months. Colonel Baker reminded them in his most valuable lecture at the United Service Institution, that the light brigade could only turn out one heterogeneous squadron made up from the different regiments. Where were the re-inforcements? Where the reserves? Very much where they should find them if they unhappily should go to war in the next few years. Now, it had been said by an eminent writer (Jomini) on military subjects, that an Army deficient in cavalry rarely obtained a great victory, and found its retreat uniformly difficult. That was as true as ever. And we must have more men, and we must have the means of laying hands upon a large number of horses. The cost of a cavalry soldier was little more than an infantry man. The latter could be produced in a few months, the former took at least two years. And yet while something was being done in providing a reserve of infantry, nothing had been done for a cavalry reserve. He (Captain Talbot) gave credit to the Secretary of State for what he had attempted in that direction—not that he was satisfied either with the mode or the amount—but in this country one must be contented with very small mercies; but it did seem anomalous that with the greater necessity nothing should be attempted for the cavalry. If trained men were necessary for trained or untrained horses, it was also imperative that we should be able to lay our hands at a moment's notice upon a sufficient number of horses—if partly trained so much the better. Some persons imagined that if we went to war the right hon. Gentleman could with the greatest ease buy horses in any quantity and put them into line; but anyone who knew anything about the subject knew that that was an absurd idea. It would be difficult to buy or to requisition—and at all events the machinery for doing one or the other should be framed now, instead of waiting until they were in want of them. Colonel Baker had made two suggestions, which he (Captain Talbot) thought were worthy of close examination. One suggestion was that all the horses of the country should be registered and divided into two classes—that one class should pay a higher duty, and the other should pay no duty at all, or a very small duty, on condition that if wanted in the event of war we should be able to have them. The other suggestion was that 1,000 additional horses should be purchased every year for the cavalry and artillery; that they should be trained for one year and then lent to farmers or yeomen, to be their property after five or six years, on the condition that they should be forthcoming when wanted for Autumn Manœuvres, or, in case of war, that they should give them back to the Government, in which case they would again become the property of the Government. That was a plausible suggestion, and one which might be at all events examined with advantage. Last year the cost of supplying transport for the Autumn Manœuvres was £42,000. They had consequently paid £42,000, and got nothing to show for it. That sum would be sufficient to purchase 1,000 horses, which would be available for the Autumn

Manœuvres, the keep of which they would only have to pay for one year while being broken in. Under that system they would have in a few years a great number of horses available for Government purposes. He would now direct attention to the system of purchase. At present the colonel of the regiment bought his re-mounts. Some persons thought that that was not the proper way of buying horses, and that there should be a Commission to purchase all the horses for the Service. He did not agree in that opinion, and he thought it was a great advantage that the man whose anxiety it was to mount his regiment as well as possible should purchase the horses. It was also said that the colonels of regiments competed with each other, and thereby raised the price of horses; but it was impossible that the small purchases effected by the colonels could make any difference in the market. They had a Commission for buying horses in India, which came down to Bombay on the arrival of horses from Australia, and purchased them in large batches, taking the rough with the smooth, and there was not that careful selection or the pains taken as when a colonel knew that he was buying for his own regiment. The real fault of the system of buying horses in this country, however, was that they had a great deal too much to do with the dealers instead of the breeders, and it was not generally known what price the Government would give for their horses. The price ought to be known to the farmers, and they ought to be encouraged to bring their horses to the cavalry barracks and depôts, and then they would come into the hands of the Government without having to pay the toll of the intermediate horse dealer. He believed if farmers knew they would obtain £42, or whatever the re-mount price might be, for every sound useful horse at four years old, it would be a great inducement for them to breed. He would recommend that a stallion should be kept with each regiment, and farmers invited to send mares, upon condition that the stock should be offered to Government under certain conditions at three or four years old. He (Captain Talbot) would lend or give shapely well-bred mares, after they had done a certain amount of work, to farmers upon conditions as to their stock. He was a great advocate for buying horses young. The best animals of the cavalry regiments were bought at three years; but they should not be put upon the strength of their regiment until they were five years old. A fifth squadron should be added to each regiment as a depôt and a training establishment, and all four-year-olds should be in that squadron. If three-year-olds were bought—which he believed to be the best and cheapest age to buy, for there was no competition then—they should be left at grass with the breeder or other farmer at a small expense, or be put in strawyards attached to barracks. He believed that the Government would soon have to pay a higher price for their horses. The French Government were paying from £48 to £72 for the heavy cavalry, and from £40 to £60 for their light cavalry horses, whereas our price for the corresponding class of animals was £30 and £42. Their heavy cavalry ought to be well mounted, and in order to effect that there could be no worse economy than that of paying little for horses for the Service. General Blumenthal, two years ago, said that he had never seen anything like the Household Cavalry; but it could not be kept in its present state if they were only to give the same price for horses that they gave 30 years ago. He wished to draw attention to the extravagant manner in which the additional transport for the last Autumn Manœuvres was provided. He believed that 2,000 horses were purchased at something like £40 to £42 each. He was not exactly certain upon the point, for the Army Estimates, in treating upon it, were very hazy. The course, however, pursued upon that occasion had not proved very advantageous. The right hon. Gentleman made a contract with a London dealer for the whole number, and the result was that he got a lot of old, infirm, worn out, useless, and soft animals at a very extravagant price. The proof of that was that when they were sold a few weeks after, there had been a loss of some £20 a-piece upon those horses, which showed they must have been bought dearly or sold badly. He was told that a new contract had now been entered into for this year, and that foreign horses would be introduced in consequence. He very much regretted this result. These foreign horses were of an inferior class; they would be bred from, and there would then be a deterioration of the quality of horses in this country. It seemed to him that it would be better either to issue tenders for 100 or 200 horses in the different districts and in the large towns, to be delivered at each of their depôts, or to have imposed the duty of buying the horses upon the commanding officers of cavalry. He wished to say one word with reference to the breeding of horses, and he must say that he thought there was a great deal of nonsense talked in the name of political economy with reference to the subject. He did not pretend to any knowledge of political economy, but it did seem to be against the principles of common sense that where there was only a limited supply of an article no means should be taken to prevent the loss of the power of producing it, no efforts made to stimulate the supply, and no steps taken to regulate the causes that lead to the decrease of the supply. They were at present burning the candle at both ends. They were allowing their best brood mares to go out of the country, and they were importing animals of the most wretched and rubbishy description from the Continent. Another matter to which he wished to direct attention was the want of a cavalry Staff. In case of a war they would have to improvise a Staff. That was not a satisfactory state of affairs, and he believed that they could at a moderate expense maintain a Staff. It would have ample work in time of peace, and would be of the greatest service in promoting the efficiency of the force; and no other country with an Army was without it. In The Times last year there was an article, written with great ability, and in a spirit of fair criticism, on the subject of cavalry manœuvres and the duties of cavalry; but the fact was that this country did not possess a sufficient force of cavalry to perform the duties which would devolve upon them under the new system of tactics; and that was an answer to most of the criticisms. There never was greater occasion for cavalry than existed now. Man for man, the British cavalry, he believed, was superior to that of any other country; but individual excellence could not make up for what was chiefly wanting—numbers—and in failing to supply them we had not profited by the lesson which had been taught us two years ago. It would be well if the Government would make some inquiry on many points upon which information was necessary—for example, as to the number of the cavalry force required; what should be their strength during peace and in war; the means of increasing that strength; the formation of a reserve of men and trained horses; a system of registering horses; the proportion necessary for different branches of the cavalry force; and the cavalry equipment. The last point was one of great importance, for, though the system of tactics had changed so greatly, the equipment of our cavalry remained the same. Then there was the question of Government studs and Government farms. From observation in India he was not an advocate for Government studs, but that system was spoken of so highly in Germany and Austria that he should like to have further information on this point. The question of farms was quite distinct from that of studs. He hoped that the Government, on all the points he had mentioned, would make close inquiries by the aid not only of War Office officials, but of independent men. He had taken up this matter in no party spirit, and he would be glad to receive an assurance from the Government that they understood and appreciated its importance and difficulties. Their Army should be like a clock wound up, and only requiring the pendulum to be touched in order to set its vast and complicated machinery in motion. Instead of that, if an emergency arose, he feared they would have chaos, confusion, and trouble. He knew that the responsibility rested with the Government, but the responsibility of that House was only second to theirs. And what satisfaction would it be when great disasters occurred to be able to lay the blame on this or that Government? What satisfaction was it to the French nation? It was because he felt that he could not accept the responsibility of being alone—having an opportunity of speaking that few cavalry officers had—that he ventured to bring this Motion before the House, feebly and imperfectly as he was aware, but to the best of his ability, and with a sincere desire not to encase victory upon the time of the House. The noble and gallant Member continued by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, considering the smallness of the Force, it is expedient to at once take steps for providing a sufficient reserve of men and horses for the Cavalry,"—(Mr. Reginald Talbot.)

—instead thereof.

Mr. BROWN said, that while some of the remarks which had been addressed to the House would be of great use to the nation, he thought, generally speaking, it was a subject which could not be properly discussed there. He agreed that our present cavalry system was inelastic, and might be much improved; that it was a system which suited old times, but did not meet modern requirements; but at the same time, he thought that, as far as the horses were concerned, a large cavalry reserve in time of peace would be unnecessary. As to the purchase of horses, he also agreed that the present system was unsatisfactory. The great evil of the present system was that it tended to keep up the price of horses. To take a common case, four or five colonels attended a fair in Ireland in person, and although they did not bid against each other, the dealers knew what they were about, and took advantage of the competition to run the price up to the maximum allowed by the regulations. It appeared to him the simplest thing in the world to take the purchasing out of the hands of the colonels, and transfer it to one person who should buy for the whole cavalry service, as was done in the case of the artillery horses. Another evil of the present system was that light horses were attached to heavy cavalry and heavy horses were attached to light cavalry, according to the fancy of the colonels. With regard to the reserve of men he would point out that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Office had the power to create that reserve by simply applying to the cavalry service the same principle as that which was passed in the army. That had not been applied to the cavalry, and it might be done without cost or any paying it to the cavalry. It concerned the whole of the nation, and gallant gentlemen in the House like himself (Reginald Talbot), as to the scarcity of horses, had seen and that a great number of horses would be required by us in the event of war breaking out. But we had established new means at our command, and machinery was coming to our aid to help us in the movement of our supplies; and the result would be that a smaller number of horses would be required than had been expected. Now, the hon. Member proposed a plan by which farmers should be lent horses by the Government. But in his opinion that would be a very good plan for the farmers but a very bad one for the Government; for the Government would only use them in time of war. But we wanted horses for the Autumn Manœuvres, and he should like to ask the hon. Gentleman if farmers would be willing to let their horses go in time of peace when they wanted them the most for the harvest.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he had the honour of bringing this subject forward in 1871, and he then hoped to obtain an answer from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He brought it forward again in 1872, and also again in 1873, on which latter occasion he drew the attention of the House to the fact that the Germans reckoned one horse to four men, and we one to 15 men. He also pointed out that we were deficient in our Reserves. He quite agreed that that House was not the United Service Institution; but it was a place where attention might be called to the great deficiency of our cavalry horses and reserves with advantage. What he complained of was that nothing had been done, notwithstanding that the attention of the Government had been several times called to the subject. It was true that we were not threatened with a foreign war; but the old proverb told us that if we wished to avoid war we must be prepared for it in case it broke out. He was not present when the right hon. Gentleman made some remarks on the War Estimates of the present year; but, as he read the Report, the right hon. Gentleman said—"If you want horses you must vote the money, and I will buy them." But he was now rather shrinking from his responsibility.

MR. CARDWELL stated that what he said was, that a Committee had been appointed by the House of Lords to consider the cheapest mode of obtaining horses; but in his opinion the best plan was to wait until horses were wanted and then go into the market and take care that good ones were bought.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: But in what position did this leave us? Supposing we waited for a war to break out, and then went into the market to buy horses, were we likely to get them? Would it not be more prudent to secure a sufficient supply of horses in reserve, to be brought into the field at a moment's notice, without being dependent on any market whatever? He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would tell the House what course he intended to adopt? On the question of the Government stud he made no observations. Sending round the country a number of stallions would much improve the breed of horses. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to wait till the Committee of the Lords had reported, or did he mean to have a Committee of military men to consider the whole subject? Would he be prepared, when the Army Estimates were brought forward next year, to express his views? He (Lord Eustace Cecil) thought the nation ought to be prepared at once with a sufficient stock of cavalry as well as of artillery, ready to take the field at any moment.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE said, he regarded the subject as one of great importance to the country, and as the Resolution only dealt with one branch—the supply of horses—he regretted that the hon. and gallant Member for Stafford (Captain Talbot) had brought his Motion forward without waiting until the Committee sitting in "another place" had made its Report. He thought that if war broke out to-morrow the nation would have very great difficulty in finding cavalry horses, and still more difficulty in finding reserved horses, the dearth of horses was so very great. The cart horses throughout the country also had become exceedingly scarce, and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Office was buying French horses for service during the Autumn Manœuvres. He concurred in the recommendation of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, that the Government should go into the market and buy horses three years old, and they would then have the pick of the market, and enable the farmer to get a remunerating price for his horseflesh. At present the farmers could do better by producing beef and mutton; but if they could get a market for their three-year-olds they would breed horses with profit to themselves and with advantage to the country. If that course was adopted, he thought they could afford to dispense with a Government breeding establishment. Then the cavalry and artillery cast horses every year. Why should not these horses, by being cast at the proper time, be utilized for the Autumn Manœuvres? In that way a great saving might be effected. He hoped that due consideration would be given by the authorities to the suggestions which had been thrown out.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH said, his experience had convinced him that our cavalry had always been stinted and starved, and of late years its inefficiency had been increased. The horses were not so good as they used to be, and the removal of officers from their regiments to Sandhurst was not a step in the right direction. Sending men to their regiments for a year and then sending them to school again was not the proper thing to do. There was nothing the cavalry were employed to do at the Autumn Manœuvres which might not be done from Aldershot, where the horses would be under cover at night. He understood that the number of hours on an average that the horses were employed, exclusive of Sundays, was eight a-day, and when they returned they were picketed, not 5 per cent of them lying down. The consequence was that there was no end of broken knees and other injuries. There was no doubt there was a want of officers, and if, instead of the Autumn Manœuvres, we had been engaged in real service, we should have been without officers in a month. In his time we used always to buy horses at three years old, and the system was a good one. Many persons, when they bought a baddish four or five-year-old, used him at once; but no one would think of using a three-year-old at once. We should buy nothing but three-year-olds and good ones, and if we could not get a good horse for a small sum we must give a larger one. That was the system which would succeed. We had not sufficient horses, nor men enough for those horses. It was all very well to say "a man for a horse;" but in his opinion the men ought to be increased in a greater ratio than the horses, and the horses ought to be good, unless, indeed, we were prepared to have a band of donkeys to carry out our arbitration policy.

SIR HENRY STORKS observed that the real question was entirely one of demand and supply. If money were no object, it would be very easy to have a very large force of horses; but the question was really one of expense. The hon. and gallant gentleman the Member for Stafford (Captain Talbot) began his observations by referring to what he called the centralization system of the War Office. Now, on the part of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War and the Office over which he presided, he would repeat what he had formerly stated, that if there was one object more than another which he had at heart it had been to de-centralize the War Office—to allow general officers commanding districts to command their own districts, and officers commanding regiments to command their own regiments. That was the policy which he had faithfully pursued. Of the three propositions laid down by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, the first was that the cavalry should be sufficient. He would leave his right hon. Friend to explain to the House his policy and the steps he had taken to maintain the cavalry in a state of sufficiency and efficiency as regarded numbers. With regard to the cavalry being ready to take the field, the hon. and gallant Gentleman knew that regiments of cavalry varied in strength; some regiments were of larger proportions, both as regarded men and horses, than other regiments. He had no hesitation, however, in saying that those regiments which were destined to go abroad were quite sufficient for the Army to which they would be attached; and as regarded maintaining cavalry in the field, he had no hesitation in saying that we should be able to maintain the cavalry as well as during the Crimean War. The hon. and gallant Gentleman referred to the great review in the Crimea where there was only one squadron on the ground composed of heterogeneous materials. Now, if he referred to the review at the close of the war, at which the Russian Generals assisted, it was quite true there was only one squadron present, and that was of the 11th Hussars. The rest of the cavalry had been removed to the Bosphorus, where an equally striking review was held by the

Sultan, at which 14 regiments were present, less one squadron of the 11th Hussars left in the Crimea for orderly duties, both men and horses being perfectly capable of taking the field, if operations had continued. These regiments were perfectly complete, and if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would move for a Return of the force, he would lay it on the Table. The number of horses required for re-mounting the Cavalry, the Royal Artillery, and the Army Service Corps was about 1,500 annually. The cavalry were re-mounted entirely in Ireland, with the exception of the 9th Lancers. The horses bought were generally three and a-half years old—they were reckoned four years old in October. At present it might be interesting to know what the state of the mounted services was. On the 2nd of June the establishment of horses of the cavalry, artillery, and engineers (exclusive of India) were 14,033; of which there were effectives 13,894. We wanted 132 horses to complete the Cavalry, six in the Artillery, and one in the Royal Engineers. As to the age of horses, there were under five years of age 948 in the cavalry, 194 in the artillery, and 18 in the engineers, making a total of 1,160 under five years old. Speaking generally, no one could say these were not horses of the right age and stamp. He was sure the hon. and gallant Member would be very sorry to put a trooper of his own regiment on a three-year old horse. Looking to the number of horses—only 1,500 annually—required for the public service, he thought under the present system arrangements were admirably managed, and the regiments perfectly efficient. Commanding officers were perfectly satisfied with them, and he did not think they would be satisfied if the horses were bought by any other means. The course pursued in the Artillery was to purchase horses from the dealers; the Deputy Adjutant General of Artillery passed them after inspection, and then they were drafted over to the regiment. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had made some rather severe remarks with reference to the horses with which he was more particularly concerned for the Autumn Manœuvres last year. Now, he distinctly and emphatically denied that statement. He thought those horses were of very fair average, admirably suited to the purpose, and they did their work remarkably well. The hon. and gallant Member should consider under what circumstances those horses were provided. He had not the power to buy them when he liked—he was limited as to the period of purchase. He must have them as soon as he could within a given time. The House only voted a certain sum of money for the Autumn Manœuvres, and he was bound to economize that sum as much as possible. It was said he ought to purchase by tender, but that would only lead to dealers bidding against each other. Then it should be remembered that two-thirds of the horses used at the Autumn Manœuvres were foreign horses. Who was to go to the Continent to buy horses for him? He was obliged to buy through a dealer, and the contract had been very well performed. He had passed 60 horses that morning, and having inspected them, he might say they were for the greater part of a good stamp. [Mr. OSBORNE: How much did you pay for them?] Well, horses all over the world had risen in price. He was paying £47—an increase of £5 on last year; and he thought himself very fortunate in getting them at that price. Undoubtedly the horses last autumn when sold did not fetch a very good price; but there were reasons why. In the first place, they were worked very hard, and they were driven by men who were inexperienced in driving. Having introduced the system of regimental transport, it was quite impossible to have drivers so trained and so careful of their horses as he hoped and as he was sure they would become with more practice. It should also be borne in mind that the stable accommodation for these horses was not of the very best description; for if he had come down to the House and called for a large sum of money to provide stabling many hon. Members on both sides would have questioned the prudence of such a Vote. Probably, there had not been for many years a season of such continued rain and bad weather as that which followed the Autumn Manœuvres. Well, of course, horses, like other people, suffered from that kind of weather. At all events, he thought horses caught cold as well as we did. However, these horses were well cared for, and fetched an average price of £23 9s. 11d. all round. His hon. and gallant Friend had asserted that the Government lost £40,000 by the horses; but, at any rate, a great deal of work was got out of them, and if the Government had contracted for the same amount of work, he thought it would have cost quite as much. The horses they were now buying were for the most part young ones—generally five, six, or seven years old. He believed there was not one above 10 years old. The hon. and gallant Gentleman knew perfectly well that we had a certain number of dismounted men, because it was impossible to have a horse for every man. Indeed, Colonel Baker always advocated having a large number of men with a very small number of horses. The great object of the Committee which was examining this question, and which was nearly ready to report, had been to lighten the weight of the cavalry by taking away from them everything that was not absolutely required. He would now make a few remarks with reference to providing reserves of horses. The proposal in regard to a stud was one which few hon. Members would advocate, as its establishment would be extremely costly. In breeding horses we had what was bred—namely, a very uncertain production, whereas by purchasing in the market, we got what we required, as we need not take a horse unless we liked it. Again, Government farming would render another new establishment necessary; but his opinion was, that Government establishments ought to be as few as possible, and therefore he thought it was far better to go into the open market and buy when and where we could. In conclusion, he promised to attend to many of the valuable suggestions which had been made in the course of the present discussion.

COLONEL BARTELOT concurred in some parts of the statement made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Surveyor General of Ordnance, especially that part wherein he said that officers commanding cavalry regiments did at the present moment obtain a very good class of horses. He also agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that it would be unwise to overburthen ourselves with more horses than we required; but he was unable to endorse the statement that it was inexpedient to purchase horses at less age than four years. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman said, indeed, that horses were purchased at three and a-half years old in the month of October, but he omitted to mention that they cost as much as four-year-olds. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman ought to have gone a step further, and said that if horses were purchased at four years, or at three years and six or ten months old, we were certain to have a large number of competitors. Foreigners, and especially Frenchmen, would come over to compete with us for horses of that age, but not for three-year-olds, and therefore we ought to purchase horses at the age of three years. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wenlock had argued that it was not necessary to have a reserve either of men or of horses; but the opinion of the War Office was decidedly in favour of a system of reserves. He wished, however, to give the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cardwell) an opportunity of explaining how the cavalry reserves were to be obtained. The right hon. Gentleman had found he could not apply the system of short enlistment to the cavalry or artillery, and he wished to know what course the right hon. Gentleman proposed to adopt in case of emergency. Perhaps it might be said the horses might be procured on the spur of the moment; but the plan would not answer as regarded men, and it was well known that the horses which were bought in a hurry during the Crimean War were far inferior to those originally sent out. He contended that if we were to be in a complete defensive state, we should not only have a proper reserve of infantry, but of cavalry and artillery.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was not in the least degree inclined to charge the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Stafford (Captain Talbot) with presumption for having brought forward the Motion, or to complain of the tone and temper of his remarks; neither had he the smallest inclination to deny the great importance and interest of the subject to which the Motion referred. He should have great pleasure in answering the question addressed to him by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite the Member for West Sussex (Colonel Barttelot). It was always gratifying to meet with converts. He was not quite certain whether the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex was a convert to the system of having reserves of cavalry by means of a shorter period of service or not; but the hon. and gallant Gentleman who brought forward the Motion did, upon a recent occasion, avow himself to be a convert to the system of short service. He (Mr. Cardwell) hoped to see the day when this system of short service would be applied to the cavalry as well as the infantry. The noble Lord the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil) had said he had brought forward the question three times, and complained that nothing had been done; but the fact was that something had been done—for instance, he had before him a Return of the number of cavalry in this country. There were 23 regiments, 8,053 rank and file, and 6,242 horses in 1857; 19 regiments, 8,949 rank and file, and 6,346 horses in 1868; and 22 regiments, 10,422 rank and file, and 7,661 horses in 1873. Therefore, the first answer he had to give to his hon. and noble Friend was that the absolute number had been considerably increased during the last four years. Preparations had also been made for obtaining a reserve by short service. In 1870 he passed a Bill into an Act for that purpose; but the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for West Sussex (Colonel Barttelot) asked him why the system of short service had not yet been introduced for the cavalry as well as for the infantry. Now, although the labour market had been in an exceedingly abnormal state, the cavalry recruiting had been going on extremely well. The numbers were "up," and we had now arrived at a period of transition, because by the new scheme of localization a new and local mode of recruiting had been introduced throughout the country. It was, therefore, the opinion of the principal military authorities in this country, and of those by whom he had the honour of being advised, that it would not be expedient at this particular moment to introduce any change in the system of cavalry recruiting, and it was thought better to do nothing until the new system of re-organization was actually introduced. With regard to the cavalry reserve, it was also thought more expedient to wait for the new system than to disturb the recruiting that was now going on. With regard to horses, the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Stafford, while he mentioned several suggestions, adopted none, and said that the present mode of purchase was the most judicious. He also quoted the opinion of General Blumenthal, who said that the English cavalry were second to none, either in men or horses. The Horse Guards and the War Office wished the cavalry force to be adequate and elastic, and every measure would be resorted to in order to give effect to the object which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had in view. The House, however, would not be prepared to come to a Resolution which declared virtually that the Army Estimates ought to be increased, and he trusted that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would be satisfied with the discussion that had occurred.

The House divided:—Ayes 128; Noes 68: Majority 60.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," again proposed.

MASTERS AND SERVANTS—LAW OF CONTRACT.—OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, in rising to call attention to the Law affecting the contracts of Masters and Servants, and the Law of Conspiracy in connection with the recent conviction of the gas stokers; and to move—

"That the Common Law of Conspiracy, as declared in the case of the Queen v. Bunn and others, ought to be amended, limited, and defined, and that where Parliament has prescribed limited penalties for particular offences, it is inexpedient that more grievous and indefinite punishments should under the form of indictments for conspiracy be inflicted for agreements to commit the same offences; and that the exceptional laws which enforce the civil contract of service by criminal penalties are unjust in principle and oppressive in their operation and ought to be amended."

said, nobody could reflect on the character of the question with which the Motion dealt, without feeling that he undertook a very grave responsibility in addressing himself to it. The House would, no doubt, recollect the ineffectual attempts he had made last year to get the question of the laws affecting labour discussed in the House of Commons, and that he had then been rebuked for bringing it on in an irregular manner. On that occasion, he predicted that mischief would occur in consequence of the question not being fairly met in the House of Commons. The Home Secretary replied in effect—"Let us wait to see the law worked out by the Judges and the magistrates of the country?" Well, they had waited, and seen it worked out, and what was the result? The result was, that within six months two important sentences had been passed—one by a Judge and another by a bench of magistrates—sentences of which, wishing to speak with moderation, he would only say that they had not been ratified by the public opinion of the country. That was a condition of things which was dangerous to society, and it justified him in asking the House of Commons to consider the law which resulted in such effects. They had seen batches of men sent to prison, under sentences which a responsible Government had thought it necessary to commute—they had thought it necessary to remit at least two-thirds of the sentences passed by the highest tribunals of the country. The House had also seen what he might describe as a whole village of women sent to prison, under a sentence which had been treated by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in a manner of which he need not remind hon. Members; and whatever might be the judgment of the Government on those sentences, the judgment passed by the sentiment, the conscience, and the opinion of the country had been, at least, as severe. There was a very strong feeling among all classes of the people of this country, and, especially, among the class mostly affected by this matter, the existence of which it was idle to deny. Indeed, the meeting in the Park last Monday showed what was thought of the law by the working classes. But with meetings out-of-doors the House had nothing to do; it was in the House of Commons that errors, if they were errors, could be best corrected, and grievances could alone be redressed. He could not follow the course which had been taken by the right hon. Gentleman in endeavouring to shift the responsibility, either from the Government or the House of Commons, to the shoulders of the magistracy. Magistrates were attacked because they were clerical and because they were unpaid. He had always thought that ecclesiastical persons should be confined to spiritual functions; but he did not believe for a moment that magistrates, because they were clergymen, were likely to act harshly in administering the law, especially to the humbler members of the community. He was not going to attack the magistracy or Mr. Justice Brett, by whom the sentence most complained of had been pronounced. All those who knew Mr. Justice Brett esteemed him for his high character, respected him for his learning, and knew that on the Bench as elsewhere he would perform his duties according to his conscience. They could not shift the responsibility on Judges of the land which they ought to bear themselves for making bad laws. Legislation of the description he was alluding to commenced shortly after the Commission on Trades Unions. The Trades Unions Act declared that trades unions, unaccompanied by molestation of workmen who did not belong to them, were not in themselves illegal. Before sitting in judgment upon the Judges or the magistrates, who had done their duty according to their lights, the House had better look nearer home and see whether these results were not the natural consequences of what he believed to be rash and inconsiderate legislation. Parliament must not, as King John did to Hubert, and Henry II. to the murderers of A'Beckett, condemn men who had been really only the instruments of their will. The results were due to legislation against which he had often protested—a system of piling up misdemeanour upon misdemeanour and crime upon crime; wanton legislation which established a sort of chaos in the criminal law, and was only tolerable because it was not executed. When, therefore, men who were appointed to execute the law really did execute it, Parliament shrank back, and shuddered at the ferocity of the laws itself had made. To the question—"Why did you do this thing?" the simple answer of the magistrate would be—"Because Parliament bade us do it." He did not intend to meddle with the Master and Servant Act, which was in the able hands of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella); but he would call attention to the Trades Unions Act, and the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1871, the object of which was, while providing against unjust menaces, intimidation, and molestation, to declare that combination for trade purposes was not illegal, and that, as long as trades unionists kept clear of menaces, intimidation, and molestation, they should not be subject to criminal offences. Practically, the legislation of 1871 repealed the old Common Law doctrine against persons acting in restraint of trade, and trades unions were legalized, Parliament following in this respect the example set in 1864 by the Emperor Napoleon. The Act which was passed in 1871 was intended to be impartial, giving mutual remedies on either side, but in its operation it had proved to be one-sided. Having called attention to the action and intention of Parliament in that year, he would now refer to the celebrated case of the gas stokers' strike. A certain man named Dilley was dismissed from the employment of one of the gas companies, and the men struck. They declined to continue their services unless he was restored, and the extent of the threats and violence they employed was this, and this only—that they simultaneously announced their intention of leaving. True, they were under contract; but the offence of breach of contract was a separate and different matter from the present question. That there was nothing beyond breach of contract in the conduct of the men was clear from the language of the Judge, who distinctly stated that there were no threats, no molestation, nothing at all, except an intimation of their intention to leave the service of their employers—

"You may take it for granted," said Mr. Justice Brett, "that whatever was done was not done by threats or by personal violence, either towards their employers, or the manager of the works."

Apart then from breach of contract, there was nothing in the course pursued by the men which, according to the principle intended by Parliament in 1871 to be established, ought to have been regarded as illegal. He spoke not with respect to the law, but with respect to the intention of Parliament. Indeed, the determination of the men to leave the service, so expressed, ought to have been regarded as unquestionably legal. Well, what happened? Twenty-five of the men were proceeded against under the Master and Servant Act for breach of contract. Now, the most extreme advocates of trades unions did not justify the conduct of the men in breaking their contract. They were summoned under an Act which Parliament had provided to meet such an offence, and they were sentenced to six weeks' imprisonment, just one half of the most extreme sentence that could be possibly passed. The stipendiary magistrates of London—men as competent as could be found anywhere to administer the law—thought that an adequate sentence under the circumstances; and for his part, he should have thought that the sternest capitalist would have regarded it as sufficient to meet the justice of the case, and that it was calculated to reassure the most timid gas consumer. But it was considered that something more than Parliament had determined should be the punishment for breach of contract should be discovered, and accordingly recourse was had to the most ingenious of created beings—a special pleader—and it was thought how the declarations of the Trades Unions Act and the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1871 that combinations of trades unions should not be illegal, might be evaded and defeated. Accordingly, an indictment was drawn up, taken out of the rusty armoury of the Common Law. They furbished up the old instrument of the ancient common law of conspiracy, which he need not tell any lawyer had long been the scandal of English jurisprudence. In a sentence passed upon it by Mr. Justice Talfourd, he said that it consisted not in the accomplishment of any unlawful or injurious purpose, but in the actual concert of two or more persons to effect something which, owing to such concert, became indictable, and he added that it was not easy to understand on what principle conspiracies had been holden indictable, when the thing to be effected was not regarded by the law as unlawful; and he asked if there were no indictable offence in the means, in the end, or in the concert, in what did the offence consist? Could several circumstances, each in itself lawful, make up an unlawful act? Another authority well known to lawyers, Mr. Roscoe, said—

"The law of conspiracy leaves so broad a discretion in the hands of the Judges, that it is hardly too much to say that plausible reasons might be found for declaring it to be a wrong to combine to do anything which the Judges might consider to be morally wrong, or politically, or socially dangerous."

find any justification for such a law, which was in itself unjust, invidious, and cruel. Legislation of that character became the more odious and the more dangerous when it was remembered that it took its origin in a Parliament which was necessarily a Parliament of employers, and was administered by magistrates who also belonged necessarily to the class of employers, whose interests were adverse to the interests of those against whom that legislation was directed. He might be told that it was necessary for the trade of the country to retain that anomalous and invidious distinction in regard to labour contracts; but he maintained that nothing was good for the trade of the country which left a just sense of dissatisfaction in the minds of that numerous class on whom, after all, the prosperity of our trade so greatly depended. If a man dishonoured a bill of exchange, those whose arrangements were based on that bill of exchange might be ruined; if banks broke; if insurance offices, on whom a man built the future hopes of his family, became insolvent, wide-spread ruin was the result; yet they did not send those who caused those disasters to prison, in the absence of fraud, as they did the workman who was charged with breach of contract. If they took as their test the irreparable nature of the consequences ensuing from a breach of contract; why were they not consistent in extending it to all other cases, and why did they apply it alone to that class of the community who were not there to remonstrate against such a law. In the case of a breach of promise of marriage, accompanied often by seduction, the law did not sentence the offender to imprisonment; but where proved, stopped at a pecuniary penalty, calculated according to the nature of the case and the circumstances of the parties. A poor man made, perhaps, three contracts, and broke them all—one of them a contract for service, and two other contracts; but the law only sent him to prison for a breach of the one. The unfortunate man could not pay in purse; but then the Master and Servant Act was called in aid of the criminal law, and under it he was thrown into prison. Now, if that was not class legislation, he (Mr. Harcourt) did not know what class legislation was. The gas stokers, it was said, had produced a great public danger and injury to the country, and therefore they deserved to be sent to prison. But suppose that the coal-owners had broken their contract, by refusing to send the usual supplies of coals to the gas companies, and that in consequence the metropolis had been plunged into a state of darkness and confusion, would the law have sent them to prison, in the same way as it had sent a few gas stokers to prison, for endangering by their action the safety and convenience of the inhabitants? But it was said that those who could not pay in purse must pay in person; that was an old and barbarous doctrine, belonging to the ruder ages of civilization. They had abolished imprisonment for debt in all cases, except in those which came within the jurisdiction of the County Court, and those were the poorer classes of society; and with regard to that one, he hoped that his hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Mr. M. T. Bass) would succeed in clearing away from our Statute Book that last remnant of a barbarous law. He thought that when the people became sufficiently intelligent to understand their real condition, they would decline to enter into any contract. If they came to that conclusion, he could not blame them. To tell men that the breach of such a contract involved the sacrifice of their personal freedom, was to strike a heavier blow at those contracts than could be done in any other possible way. To guard himself against possible misconception, he admitted that the State was justified in applying to the Army and Navy, rules which could not and ought not to apply to matters which only concerned private gain, because such rules were required for the general security of the country. For the purpose of defence, he would say, that he should have brought in a Bill upon this subject; but everyone knew how impossible it was for a private Member to effect legislation without the active assistance of the Government. For instance, the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), in respect to his great University Bill, which contained but two clauses, would have found it utterly impossible to carry his measure through Parliament without the co-operation of Her Majesty's Government. He had, therefore, sought to invite the consideration of the Government and the House to the question, because on them the responsibility of the existing state of things must rest. He had no fear for the trade of the country by dealing with the question, neither did he share the alarmist views entertained by many in regard to strikes and other subjects. There had been great strikes in the coal and iron trades; but he was not aware that those industries were on the verge of ruin; indeed, he believed that no class were making larger fortunes than the proprietors of iron and coal mines. It was not the strikes or the trades unions which had raised the price of coal. A large coal-owner had told him that the price of coal within the last 12 months had increased 15s. per ton, while the rate of colliers' wages had increased only 1s. 6d. per ton. That increase of price was owing to other combinations, and to other causes over which the Legislature had not, and could not exercise, any control. Coercive legislation of the character upon which he was commenting would not solve the difficult problem which remained for solution between capital and labour, for all attempts which had been made to regulate those two enormous interests had failed. Capital and labour were two great natural forces which, like the waves of the sea, would not be dammed by such barriers as the legislature could raise. These forces must be allowed to find their natural level; the introduction of irritating influences would not prevent their operation, but only tend to make the political machine extremely hot in its bearings. The solution of these difficult problems could be found only in absolute freedom, rigorously applied without fear of the consequences—freedom between masters and men, freedom, above all, between man and man. If anything was more detestable than the oppression exercised by the superior over the inferior, it was that worst form of tyranny, the tyranny among equals themselves. The speech by Lord Fitzwilliam, reported in The Times that morning, was worthy of the name he bore. Lord Fitzwilliam said he never would, for the purpose of encouraging trade, or for any consideration whatever, be a party to a system which would allow of one man oppressing another for the purpose of pursuing the objects of a combination. In that sentiment he (Mr. Harcourt) cordially concurred. He trusted, in conclusion, the House would not think he had improperly intruded this subject on its attention, and left it to the candid consideration of the Government and the free debate of the House.

LORD ELCHO said, he had listened with great pleasure to the able and temperate statement of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), and was sure no part of his speech was more cordially approved by the House than its closing sentiment, which insisted upon the necessity of securing perfect freedom between man and man. Having taken some part in legislation on the subject of contracts between master and servant, as comprised in the Master and Servant Act, he asked permission to make a few remarks, with a view particularly of correcting some misunderstanding and even misrepresentations which were current respecting the intentions of Parliament. The gravamen of the charge against the House of Commons was, that Parliament had acted unfairly and unjustly in the interests of capitalists, and contrary to the freedom and fair interests of labour. That was the sum and substance of the allegations, whether made in Hyde Park or upon public platforms. His hon. and learned Friend had also said, that Parliament was the place to correct misrepresentations, and it was fortunate the subject had been introduced to the notice of the House so soon after the meeting in Hyde Park. Had his hon. and learned Friend made himself acquainted with the evidence upon which the clause he complained of was framed, and had he inquired as to the motives of those who suggested it, he would not have lent the weight of his authority to the error that seemed to have taken possession of the minds of those who represented labour. The Committee which sat upon the question, and upon whose Report the Act was eventually founded, came to an unanimous conclusion, that in aggravated cases of breach of contract causing injury to the person or property of anyone concerned, the magistrate or sheriff, at his discretion, should have power to award the punishment of imprisonment instead of a fine. The Bill was drawn upon that foundation. Imprisonment was applied only to aggravated cases involving injury to persons or to property; but his hon. and learned Friend had not noticed the distinction between those cases and ordinary breaches of contract. He had spoken strongly against the Act, as though it applied the extreme punishment of imprisonment to all breaches of contract alike. That, however, was a distinction the Committee thought it necessary to draw. What had led to the Committee coming to that decision? Was it simply concern for the capitalist? On the contrary, he could state, for he acted as Chairman of the Committee, it was the result of evidence given by workmen themselves. Mr. Newton, Secretary of the Executive Committee of the trades of the United Kingdom appointed to promote an alteration of the law of master and servant, had given evidence before the Committee of the House of Commons. He there expressed a desire that the odious position in which the workman was placed should be improved, and "as nearly as possible approximated to the position of the masters in the matter of fines." Thus by using the words "as nearly as possible," clearly admitting that it was impossible to legislate in such a way as to put the rich and the poor upon an absolute equality in relation to each other, where a money penalty was inflicted. Mr. Newton further went on to say, that there could be no doubt that it would be necessary to protect both the masters and the men from open and wilful violation of contracts on the part of persons knowing that their acts would injure the employer, and, indirectly, their fellow-workmen. He went on to state, that he desired that all the laws which related to masters and servants should be placed in one statute; that masters and servants should be placed upon the same footing as to bringing actions against each other for breach of contract, both of which had since been adopted; and, thirdly, that in certain aggravated cases which could not be defined, it would still be requisite to give power to punish the workmen criminally for neglect of duty. He had, however, another witness to bring into Court—into the Court of the House of Commons, where erroneous statements could be easily refuted if made—and that was a witness from the platform in Hyde Park, who had moved the manifesto which had been referred to—namely, Mr. Odger himself. Mr. Odger had stated before the same Committee, that although he had not turned his attention to the point, he was of opinion that if it could be clearly proved that a workman had wilfully broken his contract, or been guilty of misconduct, and had thereby endangered life or property, to the injury of his employer or his fellow-workmen, there could be nothing unjust in enacting that he should be punished criminally; and he had added in reply to the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), that it would be only reasonable to extend the same law to the masters. The law, however, was absolutely so in cases when, by neglect of duty, life and limb and property were imperilled. Mr. Odger afterwards qualified one part of his statement, by stating that it was sometimes difficult to draw a distinction between wilful and accidental neglect of duty. He thought that in the face of that evidence, he was justified in saying that the clause had been inserted at the suggestion and in the interests of the working men themselves, and not by the capitalists of that House, in order to oppress their workmen. [Laughter.] He saw a smile on the face of the hon. Member for Nottingham at that statement. The hon. Member appeared to think that no one who sat on the Opposition side of the House had any feeling or wish to benefit the working classes; but he (Lord Elcho) distinctly stated that the object of the Act was to do away with the iniquitous inequality in the law which then existed, and to put masters and servants on a more just footing in relation to each other. That part of the statute which authorized the workman who broke his contract to be punished criminally was drawn up with the view of protecting the working man. To show the feeling of the House when in Committee on the Bill he might say that the only difference of opinion manifested in connection with the subject was on the point, whether a summons should be taken out in the first place, or whether a warrant should be at once issued in the case of a workman breaking his contract, and by a large majority it was decided in favour of the first alternative. The Workman's Executive Committee had, however, authorized him to yield on this point sooner than endanger the Bill. That House had been recently denounced as a body of capitalists who were desirous of oppressing the working man, but Mr. Macdonald, the former President of the Miners' Association of Great Britain, who had taken up the cause of the working men long before Mr. Applegarth and Mr. Odger and others had attained notoriety, had stated, having had many years' experience on the subject, he had always found Members of both Houses of Parliament willing to take up questions for the benefit of the working classes and likely to tend to the social improvement of the community, and he went on to add that the House of Commons, however it might be constituted, had passed more beneficial laws, such as the Factory Acts, for the improvement of the working classes than any other body of men had done in the same number of years. Therefore, out of the mouth of one of the most able and intelligent working men he believed he had been able to justify that House in the legislation they had adopted, to the condemnation of certain libellous statements which had been made upon the subject. The question of the legislation between masters and men, however, should not be looked at in the light of recent decisions, either of magistrates or Judges, but according to the views held by the public at the time the Act was passed. What was said with reference to the Act, shortly after it passed by the chief organ of public opinion in this country? The Times, in a leading article, said—

"Among the Bills which received the Royal Assent on Thursday last was one which crowned a long series of measures of remedial legislation. The state of the workman has been improved; the Master and Servant Act puts the employed and the employers on an equal footing before the law."

And it went on in the same strain to say that the sound principles of freedom and equality were too powerful to be warped in the interests of master or workman. Soon after that, a public dinner was given to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) at Edinburgh. At that dinner, the right hon. Gentleman, speaking of the Act, said—

"In my opinion, a more important and beneficial law, and one which more sensibly improves the condition of the great body of the people, was never introduced and passed through Parliament."

The executive committee of the society, moreover, which represented the operative classes of the United Kingdom, in a presentation address, referring to this

Lord Elcho

Act said, the previous law "has been replaced by one which puts the employer and the employed on an equal footing." He thought from that, he had shown by the evidence of working men that the Act did credit to the heart and head of the House that passed it. His hon. and learned Friend in a precipitate manner asked an unlearned House of Commons to swallow a Resolution dealing with legal matters, and by a vote to decide that the law of conspiracy ought to be altered, and that the criminal part of the Master and Servant Act ought to be rescinded. What was the history of that Resolution? The ink with which it was written was scarcely dry. His hon. and learned Friend, between 1 and 2 o'clock that morning, laid before the Clerk at the Table that Resolution which was to alter the law of conspiracy and to repeal a most important statute which was passed after careful consideration. That was one of the most monstrous propositions he (Lord Elcho) had heard since he became a Member of the House. He offered no opinion on the question of conspiracy at common law, or how it should be dealt with; but he found fault with the form of the Motion that had been submitted to them, and that it should have been brought forward at a time when by the forms of the House no division could be taken upon it. He also complained that the terms of the Motion were not known until that morning. It was much too grave a question to be dealt with in that way; but if it was to be dealt with, it should be by the Government. Whatever defects were to be found in the Common Law of England, it was the law of a free people; and it was alike, in a great measure, the product of that freedom and its shield. If the Government dealt with it, they must be very careful how they repealed it, in part or in whole; more especially when it was to be done at the instigation of combinations which, whatever else they might be, or profess to be, were absolutely and knowingly intended to repress individual freedom both of will and action.

Mr. OSBORNE thought that, whatever strictures might be passed upon his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), he had done useful service in submitting to Parliament a question which was looked upon as of the utmost importance by the great body of the working men in this country; and at the same time he was sorry to see the House manifest so little concern upon the subject as it did. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho) was labouring under a delusion, for nothing could have been further from the intention of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Harcourt) than to make any attack upon the noble Lord, or to question the excellent motives by which the noble Lord had always been influenced in his endeavours to reconcile the interests of labour and capital, and more especially in the great and successful effort he made in the Act of 1867. Nothing could be more odious than the old system, under which trades unions and combinations of any sort among the working classes were looked upon, not only as illegal, but as positively criminal. The legislation initiated by the noble Lord, and by Lord Lichfield in "another place," had been most useful to the country and honourable to themselves. He thought his hon. and learned Friend was fully justified in bringing forward the question, and did not see how he could be blamed for bringing it forward at the time he had. Truly, he (Mr. Osborne) might ask, Quis vituperavit? There could be no doubt that this question of the gas stokers had given a very great shock to public opinion in this country. It was a peculiar question, because with regard to them, no man defended their conduct, but everybody deprecated the extreme severity of the sentence passed upon them; and though he was no sympathizer with persons who set class against class, he thought the House was bound to endeavour to rectify any defects there might be in the law. These men were tried upon two distinct charges. The first was illegal molestation, and the second conspiracy, by simultaneous agreement, to break their contract. They were not found guilty upon the first, but convicted upon the second; and, according to the Master and Servant Act of 1867, a conviction on the second charge would have carried with it a sentence of three months; whereas, in the present case, the sentence was 12 months' imprisonment. During his absence from the House he understood that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had, in answering a Question, reflected severely upon the clerical magistrates in the Chipping Norton case. For his own part, though he wished to say nothing derogatory to those gentlemen, yet he thought it was unfortunate that anyone in clerical orders should occupy the position of a magistrate, because it was one which placed them in antagonism with people towards whom they should act as advisers and consolers. Nor had he anything to say against one of the ablest Judges on the Bench, though the decision of Judge Brett had produced an unfortunate shock on the public mind—a decision which was evidently a wrong one, since the right hon. Gentleman had remitted the sentence. It was only natural that on the eve of an election a little exaggeration should be indulged in, and appeals made to the public against the House of Commons; but a residuum of wrong existed, and he was glad that his hon. and learned Friend had taken up the matter. In that view, the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend to do away with all imprisonment for breaches of contract was a very fair subject for consideration. He did not, however, agree with him that the man imprisoned for breach of contract felt himself degraded, for the gas stokers on leaving prison were fêted and caressed, and the tendency of that legislation was to bring the law into contempt by making men feel themselves martyrs. He would remind the House, or rather the skeleton of the House, that the Act of 1867 was renewable from year to year, and the Government having done little enough this Session, might make themselves useful by abolishing imprisonment for breach of contract, and dealing with the law of conspiracy, thereby blunting the weapons of agitators.

Mr. AUBERON HERBERT said, that unless he was satisfied that the law left him no alternative, he must still think that the sentence passed by Mr. Justice Brett was excessive and unjust. It was unjust for the reason that the jury had found the verdict entirely on the counts of the indictment based on the statute, and had refused a verdict on the common law counts. The Master and Servant Act imposed imprisonment for breach of contract of an aggravated character, and for default in paying a fine; but it had been interpreted by magistrates as if any ordinary breach of contract was to be visited with imprisonment. A trustworthy authority had called his attention to two cases. A man unable to read, and therefore not thoroughly acquainted with the engagement to which he had affixed his mark, asked for 11s. a-week instead of 10s., and unfortunately used some threats to the policeman who arrested him. He was sentenced by the magistrates at Farringdon to six weeks' hard labour, not under the Master and Servant Act, but for the use of threats. Another labourer who, after a dispute about overtime, left in the middle of the day without notice, was last year sentenced to a month's hard labour. He was, however, liberated after a fortnight's detention, and the hard-labour part of the sentence was not enforced. Now, even for gross breaches of contract, imprisonment would be an unequal punishment; for a man who by lavishly contracting debts caused suffering, and, perhaps, ruin; a contractor who, entering on an undertaking beyond his ability, broke down, causing loss and inconvenience; and a barrister who, by failing to appear in a case, exposed his client to defeat and injury, were not punished by imprisonment. There were many breaches of contract in this country, but only one which the law enforced by the penalty of imprisonment, and if this exception were continued great mischief must constantly arise. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) had called attention to the bad effects which arose from this state of things under the Merchant Shipping Act. A man engaged to go on board a vessel for a voyage, he thereupon got an advance note, which some disreputable person cashed for him, relying on the immense powers in the hands of the shipowners to enforce the contract. The man was then, perhaps, kept drunk until the vessel sailed, and often was put on board in a state of drunkenness. He believed that a large portion of the evils of which we had heard so much was owing to the excessive powers conferred on shipowners over the men who signed the articles. The relations between capital and labour were in a very unsatisfactory state, and the great problem of the day was how to bring them into a better condition. If the present law were continued, the members of trades unions would not make any contract at all, and they would thus destroy long engagements, which he always regarded as very excellent and satisfactory things. It was said that they must suit the penalty to the person; but if they acted on that principle, when a rich man was brought into Court charged with a common assault, they ought to fine him not £5, but £500, or £5,000, according to his wealth. Once the law interfered in a harsh and violent manner, no one could foresee what evils might be produced. The evil burrowed under ground and appeared in unexpected places. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Eleho) quoted the evidence of Mr. Odger before the Committee, to show that Mr. Odger was a consenting party to the obnoxious clause. But, if he was not mistaken, Mr. Odger guarded himself tolerably clearly from any such consent. For instance, Mr. Odger was asked—"In cases of wilful misconduct, do you think power ought not be given to deal exceptionally with them?" Mr. Odger's answer was—"I think not. The number of such cases is so few as to be scarcely worth mentioning." And in reply to another question Mr. Odger gave a similar answer. He hoped something would be done in this matter before the General Election. He had seen personally how strongly working men felt on this matter. Last year at the congress of the trade societies there were present representatives of only 260,000 persons; but this year so strong was the feeling excited by the case of the gas stokers and one or two others that representatives of 600,000 men attended. [An hon. MEMBER: 700,000 attended.] Well, then, with the strong feeling that existed in the country, would it be wise for either party to let a General Election be held, which would entirely turn, as he ventured to say the next would if nothing was done in the meantime, upon this question? If the question was not dealt with, he would say with confidence that we should have a more bitter tone imported into the next General Election than had prevailed at any election for years.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was anxious to take some part in the discussion initiated by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), although he was tempted to be sorry that no practical, definite, or tangible result could arise from it. Indeed, a moderate examination of the topics discussed with the ability and eloquence which always distinguished his hon. and learned Friend would satisfy the House that there was no foundation for many of the accusations which, in strong terms, he cast upon that House and the recent legislation to which they had all been parties. It was a somewhat unfortunate peculiarity of his hon. and learned Friend that, while fully coinciding with him in objects he professed to have in view, they often found themselves utterly repelled and unable to follow him to his conclusion, because—he did not like to say of the reckless—but of the extravagant misstatements with which he enveloped the case which he took in hand. On the main subject they were entirely at one with him. That was a matter which it became the Legislature to deal with. There was material for observation in the subject, he quite admitted—wise, temperate, sustainable, consistent statement. The speech of his hon. and learned Friend, however, had been, no doubt, marked by ability, but deformed by much damaging and mischievous misrepresentation. He was extremely strong in his denunciation of the House of Commons, which, in his opinion, had been guilty of what he called rash and inconsiderate legislation. His hon. and learned Friend hardly ever addressed the House without administering a lecture on rashness and inconsideration, leaving it, of course, to be inferred that his own wisdom, his own calm and temperate view of matters were above all suspicion and beyond all praise, leaving them to imagine that he alone stood the one faithful soul true to his trust, who had warned, but, like Cassandra, had warned in vain, the House of Commons not to proceed on a course of legislation which experience had shown could only lead to contempt. More than that, his hon. and learned Friend must excuse him for pointing out that he was guilty of inconsistency in these matters. Describing the legislation of the House of Commons to which he took exception, he said they had passed these two Bills, which had heaped up crime upon crime, misdemeanour upon misdemeanour, and he did not complain of the justices or Judges, who had only discharged the unwelcome functions which Parliament imposed upon them. Then he proceeded in a more temperate, candid, and reasonable mode to do justice to the efforts of his noble Friend opposite the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), and those who passed the Master and Servant Act—poor souls, they wandered in darkness, they erred, but they meant well; not doing what they should have done, but doing their best under the circumstances. With regard to the other Bill—the Criminal Law Amendment Bill—he said the Government should never have passed it; but he admitted they did not believe such desperate results would have followed it which they had now to deplore. He said he did not complain of the justices in the Chipping Norton case, or of the Judge in the case of the gas stokers, but of the Acts of Parliament which forced on them the functions which they had to perform. Now, it was remarkable that his hon. and learned Friend had not taken the trouble to state those cases correctly. The conviction of the gas stokers and the judgment of Mr. Justice Brett did not turn on the Criminal Law Amendment Act at all, and the punishment would have been exactly the same if that Act had never been passed. Mr. Justice Brett carefully explained in his judgment, and the jury carefully placed their verdict, not on the Act of Parliament, but on what they could not help finding, under the direction of the Judge, a breach of the old common law of conspiracy.

Mr. VERNON HARCOURT must remind his hon. and learned Friend that the jury rejected the direction of the Judge on the general law, and founded their verdict of Guilty exclusively on the counts framed upon the Act of Parliament.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had before him the authentic report of the case before Mr. Justice Brett, and the indictment, the summing-up, and the verdict of the jury all turned, not on the Act of Parliament, but on what had been, with more or less accuracy, but certainly with great force, described as the old common law of conspiracy. The Act of Parliament would have limited the penalty for any breach of it to a much less punishment than had been inflicted under an indictment for conspiracy. The gas-stokers were indicted, not so much for having done anything, as for having conspired and confederated to do certain things with certain intent. In the Chipping Norton case also, it was inaccurate to say that the judgment of the magistrates was in any degree dictated by that House. In passing the Criminal Law Amendment Act, the House of Commons had reduced the number of offences for which workmen could be prosecuted for offences against their employers, and had left to the Judges and to the magistrates the discretionary power of punishing the offenders by imprisonment, with or without hard labour, or by a pecuniary penalty. In both of the cases to which reference had been made, the judgments had been arrived at freely and independently, upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the respective cases. Under the circumstances, there was no foundation whatever for the statement of his hon. and learned Friend that, in passing this Act, the House of Commons had been attempting to pile crime on crime, and misdemeanour on misdemeanour. The effect of the Act was to put an end to many offences and to reduce the punishment on those that remained, while it did not create a single new offence. Had his hon. and learned Friend really read the Act? If so, he would find that it repealed two highly penal statutes of George IV., without substituting anything in their place. The words of his hon. and learned Friend were most important in their effect out of that House. His utterances would be read by large numbers of people to-morrow, and those who believed in him would assume them to be true. Either his hon. and learned Friend was not aware of the real state of the case—and he (the Attorney General) need scarcely say that he should have made himself thoroughly acquainted with it before delivering his speech—or else he was aware of it, in which case he left it to the eloquence of his hon. and learned Friend to extricate himself from the dilemma in which he was placed. After what had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire, he need scarcely take the trouble to vindicate that House against the charge which had been brought against it by his hon. and learned Friend that this Act was a piece of class legislation. It was a remarkable fact, however, that the provisions of the Act were applicable equally to both employers and employed, and that the words “masters and servants” did not appear in the clause

now objected to. He fully admitted that one class of persons might be more likely to commit that particular offence provided against by an Act of Parliament than another class would be; but the statute passed to repress that offence could not be described as an instance of class legislation. Therefore, he denied that the Act could be fairly so described. Turning from the general question to the consideration of the terms of his hon. and learned Friend's Motion as it stood upon the Paper, he found that the first part of it was to the effect—

It would be difficult to find any great objection to that proposition. The law of conspiracy was almost entirely a Judge-made law, and it was natural and perhaps inevitable, that it should not be merely elastic, which might be a good thing, but very vague and indefinite, which was a very bad thing. It was a very difficult thing to convey with accuracy to the mind of a layman a real and intelligible account of the law of conspiracy. In the case of the gas stokers, it was assumed that two propositions were true—first, that it was an offence against the Common Law of England for a number of persons to combine to compel a person to conduct his business in a way to overbear his will. That seemed to be the view taken by Mr. Justice Brett. The second proposition was, that for a number of operatives to conspire or combine to break a civil contract was also an offence against the law of England. He must honestly say that he was unable to perceive that that was otherwise than a new doctrine. It was no breach of confidence to say that the attention of the Government having been turned to this subject very early after the charge of Mr. Justice Brett, the opinion of the Law Officers was taken. He had therefore had an opportunity of considering the subject. In his opinion, these two propositions, if true, were at all events new, and unless they were questioned they might pass into the textbooks and become accepted points in the law of conspiracy as laid down by Judges of eminence. He was not going to say in the House of Commons that the law of conspiracy was in a state which did not demand some attention. That was new law, and it was high time, if Parliament thought it undesirable law, that the Legislature should interfere to limit and define it. It was only fair, however, to Mr. Justice Brett to add that there was nothing in his charge which was not warranted, or which was not a fair logical development of other dicta of other learned Judges. One or two cases decided by the present Lord Chief Justice of England, if fairly and candidly considered, went far to warrant the conclusion at which Mr. Justice Brett had arrived. That being so, it was for Parliament to consider whether the statement of the law of conspiracy had not gone beyond what was reasonable, and whether it was not time for Parliament to step in and declare the law. Let him, however, warn the House that if they entered upon a definition of the law of conspiracy, they would tread a thorny path which it would be much easier to enter than to escape from. It ought also to be mentioned that in another case almost contemporaneous, and like that of the gas stokers, Mr. Justice Lush had laid down the law in a directly opposite sense. Mr. Justice Lush ruled, that it was not a criminal offence for a man to refuse to work or to dictate any terms as to his work, provided that those terms were not criminal, and that he did not use any means inconsistent with the 34 & 35 Vict. His hon. and learned Friend in his Resolution went on to say that

"where Parliament has prescribed limited penalties for particular offences, it is expedient that more grievous and indefinite punishments should under the form of indictments for conspiracy be inflicted for agreements to commit the same offences."

Agreeing in substance with the first proposition, he was unable to concur altogether in the second. In the case of the gas stokers, for instance, if a single man broke his contract that offence might be satisfied by the infliction of a fine of 10s. or 20s.; but if 500 combined to throw the whole trade into confusion, to bring desolation upon families, and infinite danger and distress upon great numbers of persons, that combination was far more dangerous and deserving of punishment. It was therefore legitimate and right to hold that combination to effect a thing should be punished with a higher penalty than an offence committed by an isolated individual in an isolated manner. His hon. and learned Friend said that 25 stokers who were brought up before the police magistrates were sentenced only to six weeks' imprisonment, though they were just as guilty as the five stokers who were sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment; but it must be remembered, that Courts of Law had to consider not the offence which a man had committed, but the offence for which he was indicted. If prosecutors chose to waive the superior and proceed only for the inferior offence, the Court could not go beyond the indictment. An offence which a man committed singly might justify this leniency; but in cases of combination, the law might properly award a much graver penalty. So if those 25 men had been indicted for the conspiracy, they would have been properly punished more severely than they were, being proceeded against only as isolated offenders. Again, it was not true that questions of conspiracy arose solely between masters and workmen. A case of this nature had arisen under the Copyright Acts, upon the piracy of a valuable engraving. Had it been a mere individual attempt at piracy, the offence might have been suitably met by a fine under £10. But several persons were indicted before Mr. Russell Gurney for conspiring to destroy the value of the copyright by concerting to put about pirated copies of the engraving, and that being a far more serious offence it was punished—he did not know whether also by a fine, but certainly by imprisonment. He had admitted that the law of conspiracy, as laid down by eminent Judges, was in some respects unsatisfactory and required amending. So far as he had seen the cases, the inconvenience had been chiefly felt in that class of cases which might be defined as cases between masters and workmen; but in other cases it had not been found to work unjustly. He did, however, admit that in the case of masters and workmen, it had been found to lead to some hardship. That was not a view which he now expressed for the first time, and he should be glad if he could give effect to it by legislation. His hon. and learned Friend asked why Government did not carry a Bill. Two things were necessary for that purpose—to prepare or bring it in, and afterwards to conduct it through the House. For the earlier portion of the process the Government had no peculiar advantages. No one, indeed, was fitter for them than his hon. and learned Friend himself—his accuracy, his love of detail, his ability to devote time in a spirit of self-sacrifice to a difficult and intricate subject were recognized by all; and he had in his speech that night shown an acquaintance with the matter which fitted him better than any man in England to prepare such a Bill. He (the Attorney General) might not next year hold the office he now filled; perhaps his hon. and learned Friend himself might fill it; therefore, if he prepared a Bill, he might be able to carry it, when he became Attorney General. In any case, he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would give to that or any future Government the benefit of his experience, and not wrap himself in his virtue, as though he had now done all that could be done in the matter. With regard to the third proposition of his hon. and learned Friend, there were many cases where a breach of civil contract occurred under such circumstances, that it deserved to be made a criminal instead of a civil offence; but the proposal did not go in that direction. A contract was sometimes broken from the most nefarious motives, yet the law of the country in such cases gave a most imperfect civil remedy. If an amendment in the law were proposed in this direction, much might be said for it. He hoped he felt as much as his hon. and learned Friend did for the workman; but he must use his common sense in this matter, and he could not fail to see that there were cases of breach of civil obligation in which a civil remedy would virtually be no remedy at all—in which an amount of damage was done, and intentionally done, by a breach of civil contract for which no civil remedy could afford anything like adequate compensation. These were, he admitted, exceptional cases, but they should be dealt with by common sense and plain argument, and not by rhetoric. A man by breach of contract might flood a mine, and what remedy for such an offence, committed with a criminal intention, could be obtained by civil action? An offence of that kind ought to be regarded and be made punishable criminally. Did his hon. and learned Friend reflect that a contract to serve in the Army was a civil contract, or how far the Minister for War could obtain a remedy for breach of that contract by civil action? These were all cases in which there was nothing but contract between employer and employed, but where, there being no adequate civil remedy, the law inflicted criminal punishment. He could not, therefore, agree with the proposition that a prosecution for breach of contract to serve was unjust in principle or oppressive in operation. He trusted he had given conclusive reasons to show that it was not, and had sufficiently indicated the extent to which alone, in his opinion, the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend was well founded.

DR. BALL said, he had been much struck by one observation made by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Auberon Herbert), to the effect that at the approaching Dissolution of Parliament and General Election inquiry would be made as to the tone of the present debate. He had always entertained the opinion that nothing could be more undesirable or unsafe than discussions in that House in reference to cases which had been decided in Courts of Law and the conduct of Her Majesty's Judges in trying them. If he wanted an illustration of the utter unsuitableness of that tribunal to examine such matters, it was afforded by the fact that the hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General were unable to agree upon the principle on which the case to which they had referred was decided. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford said that Mr. Justice Brett and the magistrates had not erred, but that the law had. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, on the other hand, said that what he cavilled at was, the law as laid down on the two occasions as not representing accurately what the law was, or as being a new view of it. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL dissented.] The hon. and learned Gentleman certainly used the remarkable expression that the law as laid down was a departure from, or new view of it—qualifying the expressing by adding that other Judges had thrown out dista in the same direction. All that showed that the House was totally unfit to exercise an appellate jurisdiction. The hon. and learned Gentleman then alluded to an authority much higher than any which could be produced in that House—that of the Lord Chief Justice of England, and plainly threw out, that in his judgment there were some points as to which were he in the same position, he would probably have taken a different view. The law was a subject as to which the greatest men differed. In the same Court, there were frequently differences of opinion; and, probably, the ultimate decision of a question would be arrived at by a narrow majority of one. The system of examining and criticizing the conduct of Her Majesty's Judges by the Law Officers—as if they descended from some higher region to lay down the law for the Judges—had commenced in the case of the Irish Judges. The judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in an Election case had been discussed, the conduct of Mr. Justice Keogh had been debated; but he took that opportunity of saying, that that was not one of those erroneous principles which they sent over to Ireland that did not return and roost in England again. The Judges should not sit and discharge those high duties under the influence of terror, or any other influence than the criticisms of the counsel who practise before them—certainly not of comments in that House by some Law Officers who had their feet on the Bench and were ready to take their places there. If such a course were adopted, the Judges could not be said to be free from external pressure. With respect to sentences pronounced, he was himself of opinion that they were often too severe; but it should be remembered that the object of a sentence was to deter others, not to punish the individual. The duty of the Judge was to enforce the law in such a manner as to repress crime. The whole excuse for punishment was its deterrent effect, and its influence—through prevention of crime—upon the welfare of society. As to conspiracy, it might consist in the use of legal means to effect an illegal end, or the use of illegal means to effect a legal end. The former class was illustrated by the case of Edward Gibbon Wakefield and others, who were convicted of conspiring to procure his marriage by fraud and deception; and he remembered a similar case, in which a girl of 16 was induced by deception and fraud to contract marriage before a Registrar, in which case there was also a conviction. The latter class might be illustrated by persons coercing an old gentleman into signing a deed giving them £10,000. The law of conspiracy was not applicable to trifling cases, and it should not have been introduced in a case of this character. That, however, the Judge could not prevent, and the evil lay in allowing private individuals to put in force a powerful engine for the prevention of crime, and for dealing with cases which the positive law did not reach. In Ireland such misapplication was prevented by control over all prosecutions being vested in the Attorney General. In England, all that a Judge could do, if the law was improperly exerted, was to take care in passing sentence that injustice was not inflicted. That, however, was a different thing from altering the law, and he challenged the Attorney General and all the legal Members of the House to frame a Bill defining and limiting the common law of conspiracy. The hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford had shown his consciousness of that by confining himself to a vague declaration, that something unsatisfactory had occurred, and that some action was necessary. As to the Master and Servant Act, that, of course, could be modified or repealed; but deterrent legislation was necessary in cases where the lives and welfare of the community were at stake. It would not do to let sailors understand that if at a critical moment they struck work, they were only liable to a civil action; but he admitted that stringent provisions, requisite for extreme cases, should not be applied in every case; and here again it would be well to institute a control over prosecutions. At present the only control of the kind rested with the grand jury, and they were fettered by the direction that they were bound to find a true bill if there was a prima facie case; and had nothing to do with the policy or wisdom of the law involved. There should be in England, as there was already in Ireland, a control over prosecutions vested in the Attorney General as representing the Crown; and the Judges, of course, should take care that injustice was not done by bringing the great machinery of the conspiracy law to apply to trifling cases. It appeared to him that it was requisite now especially, considering the complicated system which was growing up in England, that a great, grave, and wise adviser should be acknowledged—one who would be at the command of the Government—who would not pander to the passions or feelings of individuals, but who would be an adviser of measures for the welfare of the community—who would have power to control, withdraw, or rigidly put in force prosecutions, and be able in his wisdom to meet the exigencies of each particular case. If such a functionary could be established, he believed much benefit would arise, and the interests of all classes would be maintained.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL, in challenging the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball), that Parliament had no right to examine propositions laid down by Judges, said, he was prepared to assert the right of every hon. Member to that same liberty of speech inside the House which every individual outside of it possessed. He understood the law to be that while proceedings were going on persons were not at liberty to make any comments which might influence the decision; but that when judgment was given, they could express the opinion they had formed upon the case. He should like to know how they could convince the House of the necessity of legislative action on any subject, if they were not to be at liberty to comment not only upon the law itself, but upon the decisions of those persons who had to administer it. If hon. Members were to be at liberty to laud the ability, the learning, and impartiality of the Judges, why should they not have the same liberty of criticizing, or of censuring their conduct? The Law Officers of the Crown, moreover, had sometimes, as a part of their official duty, to examine judgments, in order to see whether the law had been rightly stated, and the sentence pronounced should be carried, and also sometimes to see whether any amendment of the law was necessary. If, however, the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman were carried out, it would be impossible to make any alteration in the law to obviate evils which became apparent in consequence of anything which was done by the Bench. He also wished to enter his humble protest against the lavish and indiscriminate praise of individual Judges which was becoming common in this House. He had heard that night to his surprise and mortification, several Judges named individually, and lauded for their abilities, their learning, and their conduct on the Bench. What would that lead to? They could not possibly have it all on the side of praise. When one hon. Member had extolled a Judge for his ability, his learning, and his impartiality, another hon. Member would get up and say on the contrary he had always been of opinion that that particular Judge was very ignorant, anything but impartial, was actuated by class feelings, and his conduct had been such as deserved censure, and the only reason why he did not bring forward a Vote of Censure was, because his conduct had not been quite so censurable as would warrant their asking for his removal from the Bench. That would be very prejudicial to the administration of justice. Again, if by the courtesy of the House they could only speak in terms of praise of a Judge, that praise would have small value, and would become worth about as much as the epithets "gallant" and "learned" applied to hon. Members of that House. He hoped, therefore, they had heard the last of the praise of individual Judges for their individual qualities. With respect to the subject-matter before the House, he agreed with his right hon. and learned Friend opposite in the opinion that the law of conspiracy was a very difficult subject, but he differed from him in the definition which he gave of conspiracy. If hon. Members would only read a book called Russell on Crime, they would see the difficulty of defining many offences, especially that with the definitions of which he believed most of them thought they were conversant—namely, murder. With reference to that crime he would also remark that two bodies of lawyers, at least, had tried to amend its definition, but had been so convinced of their failure, that they desisted from proposing a measure to the House with that object. That difficulty was particularly great in the case of the law of conspiracy, a very useful law, which comprised three very different things. It comprised a combination to commit an act criminal in itself, either as a means or an end; a combination of several persons by means not criminal, to commit an act not criminal but illegal, such as a breach of contract; and, in addition, it comprised a combination by the use of means not criminal to effect a purpose which was not itself criminal in the eye of the law but only immoral—seduction, for instance. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the City of Oxford thought it monstrous to assign a heavier punishment for conspiracy to do an act than for the act itself when committed; but the very combination to do the act was an offence and aggravated the principal offence itself. To rob on the highway, for example, was punishable with a few years' penal servitude, but a combination to commit that crime was punishable with penal servitude for life. [Mr. HARCOURT explained that he had said the punishment for combination ought to be defined.] The punishment was limited to a fixed term of imprisonment, and, therefore, it was wrong to say it was arbitrary or undefined. He demurred to the assertion that the law which enforced contracts for service were exceptional. It was a mere delusion to use the words "criminal" or "civil" in that connection. Every civil contract had been enforced in this country by imprisonment. Formerly every ordinary debt was exigible in that way. If a man was ordered to do a thing by the Court of Chancery and disobeyed, he was sent to prison. He should like to know what means would exist of enforcing fines in a criminal court if imprisonment were taken away? The hon. and learned Gentleman proposed that there should be a civil remedy only in the case of service. But would he bring an action against a recruit who deserted from his regiment or against a marine who ran away from his ship? [Mr. HARCOURT dissented.] No; his hon. and learned Friend admitted that there must be some exceptional instances; and what became, then, of the general proposition that that was unjust in principle? He only objected to its application to the particular class of workmen, whom he wished to conciliate. The law, as it stood, applied to both the parties to the contract, and if an employer were found guilty of exaggerated misconduct, such as brought the employed within the provisions of the Act, there were plenty of workmen and associations of workmen who were well able to set the law in motion against him. That was not class legislation. Some of the "roughs" of London were much addicted to larceny; and they might as well say—"You make a law against larceny, but you do not send Members of Parliament to prison under it. How unjust and exceptional, therefore, your legislation is! You certainly prohibit them from committing the offence; but it is only a sham law, because you know they are not going to commit larceny. But we like the offence; we find it useful; and we demand that in justice you should repeal your class legislation, the law against larceny." With regard to the case of the gas stokers and the law of conspiracy, he must say he dissented from the law as laid down by Mr. Justice Brett in the case of "The Queen v. Bunn." It was contrary to a charge by Mr. Justice Lush in a similar case and he should not be guilty of disrespect to the former learned Judge if he said he preferred the law as subsequently laid down by Mr. Justice Lush in a similar case, and not the less so because it was delivered with a full knowledge of the previous charge. Both charges could not be well founded. He would, however, recommend the House to wait before legislating. In both cases the men were acquitted of this particular charge, and there was therefore no opportunity of carrying the case before the Court of Criminal Appeal. That Court could give an authoritative decision upon the two conflicting charges, and if it turned out that the Law Officers of the Crown were mistaken, it would then be time enough to amend the law. [Mr. HARCOURT: But meanwhile the men will remain in prison.] He did not know that that would necessarily be the case. The Commission on Trades Unions had recommended the Legislature that no alteration should be made in the existing law respecting combinations to do acts which involved breaches of contract. It was intended by the recent Act, that the first proposition laid down by Mr. Justice Brett in his charge should no longer be the law of the land, and if there had been an accident or miscarriage it would be time enough to amend the law when an authoritative decision had been obtained upon appeal. If his hon. and learned Friend felt inclined to try so difficult a task as to define and amend the law of conspiracy in general, no one was better fitted for the task by his ability and the extent of leisure at his command. In that case, he could only wish him the success he would so well deserve.

MR. JAMES said, he had no sympathy with those who had the General Election in view in expressing their opinions on this subject. The matter was legitimately brought under the notice of the House as a grievance on the question of going into Committee of Supply, and he would remind the House that no censure was cast upon any Judge, but that it was the law itself which was being criticized. Working men complained that the law of conspiracy pressed peculiarly in its uncertainty upon them. In punishing what the law called conspiracy, we were punishing what working men called combination. They were bound to combine, and their experience was, that without combination all attempts to improve their condition were hopeless. The gas stokers were punished because, admitting their right to combine, they had combined to break a contract, and because, under Section 14 of the Master and Servant Act, that was a criminal offence. It would not have been criminal on the part of any other subject of the realm; but it was criminal in them. Was there not good ground for complaint on that score? If they took the Master and Servant Act, and applied it to the law of conspiracy they would raise upon it a superstructure of great and manifest injustice. In the same way, if they took the Criminal Law Amendment Act and applied to it the law of conspiracy, they would find that even greater injustice would be done than by its application to the Master and Servant Act. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) maintained that the Master and Servant Act gave the working men exactly what they asked for and what they wanted. Now, everybody recognized the noble Lord's sincere desire to act charitably towards the working classes. [Lord Elcho: Justly.] But he thought the working classes would like a little more justice. There was a little too much of the odi profanum vulgus about the noble Lord; he did not quite appreciate the position of the working classes, and some of them would perhaps say to him—

"Add not unto your cruel hate
Your still more cruel love."

It was said that the Act applied to masters as well as workmen, and that the former might be imprisoned as well as the latter; in words, no doubt, it did apply, but in effect it did not, and could never do so. The Home Secretary was in possession of Returns on this subject. Had any masters suffered imprisonment under the Act, and how many workmen? It was admitted by the Attorney General that an inequality existed with reference to this Act. Ought not something then to be done? With regard to the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), the noble Lord had complained of its terms; but he (Mr. James) did not see in what other way it could be framed. Whether a General Election was pending or not, it was better to be wise in time, and to do justice where it was imperatively demanded. [Laughter.] He had himself no sympathy with itinerant agitators; but if hon. Members treated with contempt a demand for redress of a serious grievance of this kind, they would place in the hands of that class a power which they might have cause to deeply regret. He could not help thinking that if hon. Members combined to refuse the alteration of a law which had proved to be unequal and unjust, they would be guilty of a worse combination than that which had been charged against these men under the Act in question.

MR. BRUCE said, he would admit, if the law laid down by Mr. Justice Brett were correct, it would be the duty of the Government to introduce an amending Act. But it was because they were satisfied, after full examination, that that was not the case, that they did not think it necessary to bring in a Bill to amend the Act of 1871. Another reason why Government did not introduce an amending Bill was that they wished to give the Act a further trial. If, however, it should prove that the intention of the Government had been defeated, it would be their duty to deal with the matter. As to the 14th section of the Master and Servant Act, he understood that an objection was made to the amount of punishment. The question was not whether the law was improper, but whether the punishment was excessive. On the main question, all he say was that it was the desire of Government that the workmen should every facility of combining together for promoting what they believed their own interest, provided they not resort to threats and intimidation to prevent others from working, as were prohibited by the Act. It is wrong to suppose that these breaches of contract only injured the masters, as, in truth, the interests of the men were just as often injuriously affected by them. With respect to the Master and Servant Act, although he was not one of its authors, he remembered that he worked with the noble Member for Haddingtonshire (Elcho), by whom it was introduced, in passing it through the House, in belief that its provisions were demanded by the workmen themselves. In many cases, the remedy supplied by the Act would be plainly insufficient, they were, therefore, prepared to punish such breaches of contract severely; and he held in his hand a copy of an address which had been presented to the noble Lord by the executive committee of the working classes, in support of their approval of the Act and of his Lordship's exertions in the matter. The Master and Servant Act was in fact, as much meant for the protection of workmen as of employers. It was, for instance, a colliery. It was in the power of a few men to stop the workmen from working, and to throw others out of employment, by which they lost their livelihood. If a man in charge of an engine refused to work without notice, all the workmen depended upon that engine being at work were thrown idle. Again, in the case of the Fire Brigade, if the men were called on to proceed to a fire and they said they would not go till their wages were raised, would not such a breach of contract warrant severe punishment? His hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Auberon Herbert) had said that although a beneficial change had been wrought by the Master and Servant Act, inasmuch as the vast majority of breaches of contract would be merely technical offences, yet the tendency of the Act was to bring slight cases under the operation of the 14th section. Now, he had been laid that day on the floor of the House, showing the number of persons who had been proceeded against, convicted, and imprisoned under the Act.

L. CCXVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

the Master and Servant Act of 1867. In 1866 the number of persons proceeded against under the previous Act was 12,345, of whom 7,557 were convicted and 1,658 imprisoned. In 1871 the number of persons proceeded against was 10,810, and of these 6,390 were convicted and only 494 imprisoned. In 1872, a year of extraordinary agitation, the number of persons proceeded against was 17,082; 10,359 were convicted, and 742 imprisoned. Thus, in 1866, the year before the existing Act passed, one in seven of the persons proceeded against was imprisoned; whereas in 1872, the proportion was only one in 27. If anything could demonstrate the beneficial results of that Act, he thought those figures did, and he indignantly repudiated the allegation that the present Government had treated the working classes with contempt. If any cases of hardship, or of harshness in the administration of the law occurred, the public attention should be called to them, and the Government would be ready to consider them, and he trusted that the offences against which these statutes were directed would become less and less frequent, till the statutes themselves should become unnecessary.

MR. EYKYN said, he wished to express his conviction that the Judge acted perfectly right, and his regret that the gas stokers had received a commutation of their sentence from the Home Office.

LAW AGENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

[BILL 150.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Adam.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 5th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 6 (Apprentices before admission to make affidavit of having served) agreed to.

Clause 7 (Admission and enrolment of applicants as Law Agents).

MR. GORDON, in proposing as an Amendment, in page 3, line 26, to leave out from "any," to "agents," in line 40, and insert—

"Any person qualified as hereinbefore provided, may make application to the board of examiners under this Act to verify his qualifications, and take trial of his fitness to practise as a law agent, and on passing an examination as hereinafter provided, and obtaining from the board a certificate of qualification and fitness, shall be at liberty to present to the court a petition praying to be admitted a law agent under this Act, and the court may thereupon remit him accordingly, and an extract of such admission, written or printed, or partly written and partly printed on paper or parchment, stamped with the duty exigible by law, shall be good and sufficient warrant to the registrar to enrol him as a law agent accordingly."

said, the course he proposed was similar in effect to the recommendation of the Committee of last year, based upon the view taken by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate. The Society of Writers to the Signet and the Solicitors practising before the Supreme Court had always taken a great interest in the examination of persons desiring to practise as agents, and had adopted regulations for the study of such persons, he therefore thought it advisable that they should be represented on the Examining Board. Other bodies had also taken great interest in the matter, and had established Professorships in the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen for the studies necessary to law agents, therefore he thought those also should be represented on the Examining Board. The proposition of the right hon. and learned Gentleman last Session was the same in effect to that he (Mr. Gordon) now made, except that he thought Aberdeen ought to be included.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the question between his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon) and himself was whether the Examiners of the law agents or attorneys of the future should be simply nominated by the Judges of the Supreme Court in Scotland, as in England, or whether they should be nominated in the manner proposed by his hon. and learned Friend—namely, two by one society, two by another society, or by a third being a society elected by various other societies throughout the country; two by a fourth; and two by a fifth. He quite admitted that last year he favourably considered the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend; but upon full consideration, he strongly resisted that proposal altogether, and suggested for the adoption of Parliament with reference to Scotland the same system which had for a very long period been used with perfect success in England. With respect to the clause before the House, it provided that applicants for admission should present their applications to the Board, which should take proceedings to ascertain their qualifications analogous to those pursued in England, and which had given such entire satisfaction.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he concurred with the Bill as it stood. No doubt the effect of the measure was ultimately to separate the examination entirely from those who had sought to institute the system of examinations; if that was so, he would oppose it, but he did not think it would have that effect. To keep up those different persons as qualified for Examiners, would be to establish an invidious distinction, when the object was to make an Examining Board that would represent the whole country. A general examination for the country could only be effected by one body formed of the different bodies uniting in one profession.

MR. GOLDNEY said, there did not seem to be any provision for allowing an attorney who was qualified to practise in England to become a practitioner in Scotland so long as this proposed qualification should exist, making it compulsory that three years should be served with a law agent of Scotland. He should propose, therefore, to insert words, so that a properly qualified English practitioner should practise in Scotland.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that he should at all times be glad to advocate the extension to English solicitors the privilege of practising in Scotland, whenever a similar privilege should be extended to Scotch practitioners in England. He was most anxious to give every facility to the agents, and should have no objection to shorten the period of service in Scotland for those gentlemen who had certificates entitling them to practise in England.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that after that expression of opinion, he should move on the Report that the words "three years" should be omitted.

MR. LEITH said, he was of opinion that it would be necessary to retain the period of three years, because, otherwise, there would be a number of English solicitors introduced who knew nothing of the Scotch law. He did not think three years an unreasonable time to serve, but it might be reduced on examination.

MR. M'LAREN asked, whether the privileges of the different bodies in Scotland would be retained, or whether the Board of Examiners was to examine everything?

MR. CRAUFURD thought that after the Act passed there would be a united Society of Law Agents in Scotland who would stand in the same position as the Law Society in England, and they would, in point of fact, form the examining body.

MR. M'LAREN thought the hon. and learned Member for Ayr was in error, and wished to press the Lord Advocate for an explanation.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the point in question was dealt with in a subsequent clause. He referred to the 19th, which provided that the Judges, provided they thought the examination of the societies referred to satisfactory as a guarantee of the qualifications of applicants, should have power to accept it as equivalent to an examination by their own Examiners. The clauses were entirely consistent, and he felt bound to decline to say what he would do in regard to Clause 19 until they came to it.

MR. GORDON said, he did not propose that candidates should be bound to apply to any of the existing societies—on the contrary, he wished to make it open to them to apply to the Courts, but he simply desired to provide an optional mode. The procedure he proposed was a Court for the special purpose of relieving the applicants from the necessity of applying to an existing society. Therefore, so far as expense was concerned, one system would not differ in the least from the other. However, as the Committee did not seem to support his proposition, he should not press it to a division.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (The Court empowered to appoint Examiners).

MR. CRAUFURD said, he had certain Amendments to propose, the object of which was to put the law on all-fours with the English Act. He thought if the Court of Session was to have power to appoint the Examiners, it should also have power to say what they should be; and his first proposal was to leave out the words in page 4, line 14 "being enrolled law agents and in practice as such." He would afterwards propose that the Judges should have power to prescribe the subjects of examination in law and general knowledge. He thought the Committee would see the necessity of altering the clause, so that Professors might be appointed, as well as those who were merely practitioners.

MR. MILLER said, he did not find the law in England to be as stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman. In The Law Journal, it was stated that the examiners were the Masters of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with sixteen attorneys or solicitors. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to pointedly strike out the same class of persons in Scotland. MR. CRAUFURD: No, no.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had no objection to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. CRAUFURD, another Amendment made, in page 4, line 15, by leaving out after "Act" to "applicant" in line 20, inclusive.

MR. CRAUFURD, in proposing as an Amendment, in line 21, after "time to time," to insert the words "to prescribe the subjects of examination in law and general knowledge and," said, it would simply give the Judges power to prescribe the examination, leaving it to the candidates to choose where they should acquire their information.

MR. M'LAREN said, he thought it necessary to go further, and prescribe the curriculum. He would therefore propose, instead of the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend, the addition of the words, "a curriculum of education for apprentices and for candidates for admission and examination thereon." That had been suggested by the Society of Solicitors. They themselves had obtained an Act some years ago to improve the education of their young men, and they were anxious to guard against any interference that would have the effect of lowering the standard of education. They thought it desirable that the Court should have the power to say what curmittee. He should certainly move his Amendment again on the Report.

Clauses 20 to 24, inclusive, agreed to.

On the Motion of the LORD ADVOCATE, new clauses—(The Court may, within one year after the passing of the Act, admit notaries public to be enrolled, if they see fit); and (Repealing clause) were added to the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday next, and to be printed. [Bill 184.]

IRELAND—RIOT IN DUBLIN.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary what information Her Majesty's Government had received relative to the disturbance that had occurred at the fire at Dublin last evening?

EARL GRANVILLE said, the latest news received by the Government relative to the recent riot in Dublin was contained in the following telegram from the Under Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant, which was received by the Marquess of Hartington this afternoon—

"Riot caused by mob of worst roughs taking advantage of fire to break through roof of large whisky stores next to fire. They entered roof and were expelled by the police. They pelted police and military with stones from corners of adjoining streets, and endeavoured to obstruct Fire Brigade. Troops and police had to clear space to get room to work, and had to charge several times; mob retiring and returning throwing stones. About 30 soldiers hurt, most of them slightly. Eighteen police hurt, also slightly. Thirty-six prisoners taken; young roughs of the worst class."

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(The Earl Russell.)

[NO. 147.] PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

EARL RUSSELL, who was imperfectly heard, in rising according to Notice to lay on the Table a Bill for the better government of Ireland said, he thought that both their Lordships and the other House of Parliament must participate in the interest with which he viewed the subject which he was about to bring before the House, and the anxiety with which he viewed the existing state of things in Ireland. He regarded the state of that country as anything but satisfactory. He had no wish to cast any blame on the present Government for the measures which they induced Parliament to adopt four or five years ago on the subject of the Church and on the subject of the land tenure in Ireland. In his opinion those measures were wise and beneficial enactments. Experience had, it appeared to him, shewn that the time had arrived when it was absolutely impossible to carry on the Government of that country in conformity with the rules and maxims which were observed in England and Scotland. But before he entered further into this subject, he thought it right to endeavour to show that with respect to the causes of the condition of Ireland there had been mistakes both in this country and in Ireland, the result of which was to present facts from different points of view. From the English point of view, it was alleged that Ireland was so steeped in barbarism that it was impossible to expect improvement on the part of her people. The other view, which he might call the completely Irish view, was that England, by her laws and her system of government, had always prevented the improvement and welfare of Ireland. He believed that both these were entirely mistaken views. With regard to the first, we must admit that owing to the cruelty and injustice of the penal laws passed by this country in former times, and systematically put in force, it had been made impossible for the Irish people to advance in material improvement. Remarkable testimony was borne to this by a writer in all of whose opinions he (Earl Russell) did not share, but whose statement on this historical point might be accepted by their Lordships. They were told on the authority of Mr. Froude that—

"The price of fleece wool in Ireland in 1730 was 5*d.* a pound; of combed wool 12*d.* a pound. In France Irish fleece wool was sold for 2*s.* 6*d.* a pound, combed wool from 4*s.* 6*d.* to 6*s.* The profits of the contraband trade were thus so enormous that the temptations to embark in it were irresistible."

How did England behave under such circumstances? Instead of encouraging the people of Ireland to develop a trade in this commodity and increase it to the utmost, she showed the greatest jealousy, and forbade the Irish to sell their wool to any people but the English. They were prohibited from exporting it to France, and heavy penalties were imposed for disobedience to the prohibition. How unjust, then, was it to charge the Irish with not having endeavoured to promote their own commercial prosperity, when at the time to which he referred it was the policy of England to prevent them from doing so and to inflict penalties upon them if they did it—how absurd to allege that the Irish people were so barbarous and so given to discontent that they were incapable of improving themselves or of being amenable to the effects of good government! Mr. Burke, who as Member for Bristol, did great honour to that constituency, was displaced from the representation owing to the jealousy which prevailed in this country with respect to the trade of Ireland. And now for the Irish point of view. Notwithstanding the statement of a gentleman who was formerly an Irish agitator, but who had recently received the honour of Knighthood (Sir Charles Gavan Duffy) that the misery and poverty of Ireland were entirely owing to the policy which England had so long persisted in adopting towards Ireland, they had the authority of all persons who had practical acquaintance with Ireland, that they had not only shown a disposition to turn to good account the improved laws under which they lived, but that they had done it in the most effectual manner. Among the best evidences of the advance Ireland had made and was making in material prosperity, let them look at the greatly increased value of land property, and the large employment of labour at largely increased wages. In 1868 the late Lord Mayo—a man who conferred much honour on his country—pointed out in the House of Commons the contrast between the Ireland of 1779 as described by Arthur Young and the Ireland of the present time. He showed that while in 1779 the rental of the county of Cork was estimated by Arthur Young at £256,000; in 1818 it was £808,698; in 1848 £1,284,140; and in 1867 £1,351,208. In 1860 the deposits in the Irish Joint-Stock Banks were £15,609,000; in 1865 £17,000,000; and in 1867, £19,200,000. In 1841 the rate of wages in the agricultural districts of Kildare, Armagh, and Kerry was, in the first-named county, from 4*s.* to 5*s.* a week, for the second 6*s.*, and for the third 5*s.* In 1868 it was for Kildare 8*s.*, for Armagh from 9*s.* to 10*s.*, and for Kerry from 7*s.* to 10*s.* In 1841 the value of the live stock in Ireland was £21,000,000, in 1866 it was £50,500,000. In his speech to the House of Commons, Lord Mayo said—

"Let the House now consider what has taken place since the commencement of the new policy which this country has pursued towards Ireland since 1824-5, the date of the first educational inquiry. In 1829 the Roman Catholic Relief Bill was passed. A short time afterwards a system of national education was adopted. A system of police which had been found excellent and useful was created. The constitution of juries was altered and greatly improved. The fiscal powers of grand juries were regulated. Municipalities were reformed and placed upon a different footing. The Poor-Law was established. The Landed Estates Court was created for the sale of incumbered properties. In this, it is beyond a doubt that a greater number of beneficial measures were never carried in any country within so short a period of time. Professor Ingram has truly remarked that changes so great, and made within so short a period, constitute the largest peaceful revolution in the history of the world."—[3 Hanuard, etc. 1368.]

He trusted, then, their Lordships would agree with him in thinking that both the extreme views to which he had referred were equally unfounded, and that those interested in the advancement of Ireland ought to look for some other reasons for her present condition. This brought him to what had been going on in Ireland within the last year. He found one of the ablest of the Irish Judges (Mr. Justice Lawson) while presiding over the Criminal Court at Belfast, at the last Assizes, stating that an illegal and riotous meeting had taken place in that city a short time before, and that the authorities suffered that meeting to go on; and what was the consequence? It resulted in the excitement of the most violent passions—houses were wrecked, lives were lost, and many were threatened:—and such was the rioting in that flourishing place during four days that the town was described as having all the appearance of one taken by storm in which one party were acting as the assailants and the other as the defenders—and all this was allowed to go on without interference by the authorities. Complaints had been made of the course taken by Mr. Justice Lawson in reference to these riots; but he concurred with the learned Judge in thinking it most improper that the local authorities should have acted in such a way as to expose them to the suspicion of favouring these disorders; and he entirely approved the promptness and vigour of that learned Judge in repressing the attempt to interrupt the course of justice by clamour and riotous behaviour. The Judge who endeavoured to put an end to such scenes deserved the thanks of the country. It would appear impossible that such scenes of tumult and disorder could occur in any other part of the United Kingdom. Let him ask their Lordships what would have been done if similar disorder had occurred in Renfrewshire, which was now represented by a right hon. Friend of his the Secretary for the Home Department? It would have been quite impossible that such disorders could have prevailed in the town of Paisley without the attention of the Home Secretary being called to it. On the contrary, the Secretary would have consulted the Law Officers and have taken the most decisive measures to restore peace and order. But in Belfast the affair was apparently unnoticed at the time by the Executive Government, and it was only at the ordinary Assizes that an explanation of the law was given by the Judge presiding in the Criminal Court. Another of the evils of Ireland was one which instead of diminishing seemed to become more aggravated from time to time—he meant the organized system of murder and assassination that existed in the rural districts, these were generally in connection with the possession of land.

For instance, if a man ventured to take land from which the previous tenant had been ejected, he was denounced by a secret society, and his life taken by some of its members; and if the assassin was discovered—which was seldom the case—no jury dared to convict him. Thus this description of crime was committed with impunity. That was an evil which had existed for a long time, and which seemed to him to be as great a danger now as ever it had been, and surely it was full time that, within the limits of law and justice, some remedy should be devised for putting down such a system. Another question which had disturbed the people of Ireland was that of education. For many years grants to the amount of over £400,000 a-year had been made from the Consolidated Fund for national education in Ireland. It so happened that in the parish of Callan there was a parish priest to whom the Irish Board of National Education had intrusted the management of the schools in that parish. The parish priest conducted the schools exceedingly well, devoting much time to them, and attending personally for some hours every day during the giving of instruction. In fact, no one appeared to have had any reason to complain of the priest's conduct as manager of the schools. But suddenly he was deprived of the management of the schools, which was given to another clergyman in whom the parishioners of Callan had no confidence. Mr. O'Keeffe was removed, in the first instance, by his Bishop and Cardinal Cullen—he appealed to the Commissioners of the Board of National Education—but they confirmed the authority of the Bishop and the Cardinal. Why was it that this clergyman had been allowed to be thus summarily dismissed, when the evidence was clear that he had managed his schools admirably and enjoyed the trust and confidence of his parishioners? Their Lordships knew that in foreign countries where the great mass of the population professed the Roman Catholic religion the State had reserved to itself the direction of the education of the people. On the subjects of education and marriage these Roman Catholic States did not allow their secular ministers to be put out by any ecclesiastical or sacerdotal influence. This was the case in Austria, in Germany, and in Italy; and not long ago, when a complaint was made that the German Government were retaining in an educational office a Catholic priest who had not accepted the decree of the Vatican Council on the Infallibility of the Pope; the great majority of the German Parliament approved the explanation given by the Minister when he said that as the office was not one of public worship but one of education the priest could not be displaced. In like manner, he held that Mr. O'Keeffe had conducted the Callan Schools well, and if he had possessed the confidence of the people of that parish he ought to have been maintained in his post of manager. But he had not been maintained in it. His case had been brought under the notice of the National Board, and one would have supposed that the first inquiry of the Board would be as to whether he had conducted the schools properly and whether he was unfit for the place. But nothing of that kind was done. In his (Earl Russell's) opinion, the question for the Board of Education was whether this priest had discharged his duty as manager of the schools. That, however, was not the question the Board went into. They acted upon Cardinal Cullen's sentence suspending him as parish priest of Callan. Against that not a word of argument was heard from the priest. He did not wish to interfere with the particular questions of religion between Mr. O'Keeffe and Cardinal Cullen and the Church of Rome—it might be that he had been properly discharging his duty as a priest of that Church, and was a victim of slander; or it might be that he was not fit to remain the Roman Catholic parish priest of Callan—these were questions into which he did not want to enter;—but it was for the Courts of Law and the Imperial Parliament to decide whether the Pope's rescripts were in force in this country. In his opinion the only thing the Board of Education had had to consider was whether Mr. O'Keeffe had conducted himself properly as the manager of the schools, and they should have considered all the facts before them and decided irrespective of the religious element or the Papal authority. In his opinion it was a gross abuse of power and a violation of the principles of truth and justice to dismiss Mr. O'Keeffe if the propriety of his conduct in the management of the schools was answered in the affirmative. He was aware that precedents were alleged for the course adopted by the Board in this instance; nor did he deny that there were occasions on which a body exercising control might justly deprive a clergyman of office. Recently in Scotland the General Assembly had deprived of office a clergyman against whom there had been a charge of continual drunkenness; but nothing of this kind had been alleged—nor he believed could be alleged—in the case of Mr. O'Keeffe. Precedents were valuable as guides, but that species of knowledge was subject to close limitation. Of the knowledge acquired in office he would read to their Lordships a passage from Mr. Burke's speech on American Taxation. Mr. Burke said—

"Much knowledge is to be had undoubtedly in that line, and there is no knowledge which is not valuable. But it may be truly said that men too much conversant in office are rarely minds of remarkable enlargement. Their habits of office are apt to give them a turn to think the substance of business not to be much more important than the forms in which it is conducted. These forms are adapted to ordinary occasions, and therefore persons who are nurtured in office do admirably well as long as things go on in their common order; but when the high roads are broken up and the waters out, when a new and troubled scene is opened, and the file affords no precedent, then it is that a greater knowledge of mankind, and a far more extensive comprehension of things, is requisite than ever office gave or than office can ever give."

He thought that extract was applicable to the course adopted by the Irish Board of Education. There was at the present moment a great conflict going on between the Pope and the priestly power on one side, and the Governments on the other. In Ireland the question was, whether Ireland was to be governed by Pius IX. and Cardinal Cullen, his viceroy, or by Queen Victoria and the Lord Lieutenant, her viceroy. He remembered that at one time he felt it his duty to allude to the Protestant party in Ireland as "a miserable monopolizing minority;" but he now asked were they going to exchange that for "an arrogant monopolizing majority." They must make a stand against such a power as that. The Pope had lost his temporal power in Rome; he had lost much of his influence in Germany, France, and Italy; but his spiritual power was still very great, because many millions of people still followed the dictates of the Pope and his Cardinals. The power of the

Pope might, therefore, become dangerous to the peace of Ireland, and it was the duty of the Crown and Parliament of this country to make a stand against it. He had now placed before their Lordships under three heads the evils which in his opinion were hostile to the peace and progress of Ireland. There were, in the first place, unlawful meetings, by which lives and property were placed in jeopardy, and no immediate authority seemed to exist capable of dealing with an emergency. In the next place, the existence in Ireland of secret and unlawful societies, which organized plans for the assassination of obnoxious individuals. And in the third place, by the policy pursued by the Pope's Legate and the Roman Catholic Prelates, the confidence of the people in the administration of national education was destroyed. Their Lordships would now naturally expect to hear what were the remedies he proposed to apply to these evils. It seemed to him that there was great wisdom in the declaration made by Lord Somers in the early part of the last century, when, the year after the union between Scotland and this country, he proposed that the Privy Council of Scotland should be deprived of all power. Lord Somers said that he was prompted to that proposition by a true concern for preserving the public peace; and that while he was heartily desirous of the Union, and no less desirous to make it entire and complete, he considered that it could not be at all perfect while two political administrations subsisted; and that Scotland would be in a worse state after the Union if a distinct administration continued, because while there would be no Parliament to resort to in Scotland, the marks of distinction would continue. The same argument he (Earl Russell) contended, was applicable to Ireland. What had been our mistake in regard to that country? We effected a Union with Ireland, but preserved two distinct administrations. The consequence was that a marked distinction still remained. What he had to propose was what he proposed so long ago as 1850 in the House of Commons, when he introduced a Bill for the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy and the appointment of a Secretary of State for Ireland. He had no better remedy to propose now. When his Bill came on for second reading on the 17th of June,

1850, he was followed into the division lobby by 295 Members against 70. In the majority were Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Goulbourn, Sir George Grey, Mr. Sidney Herbert, the Marquess of Kildare, Mr. Monsell, Mr. Morgan John O'Connell, Lord Naas, Mr. Ricardo, Mr. Sheil, Mr. Walpole, and Sir Charles Wood, and other distinguished statesmen; while the only eminent politician in the minority was Mr. Disraeli. When in this country serious disturbances occurred anywhere, the Home Secretary brought it under the notice of the Cabinet, and proposed measures: the Cabinet listened to his reasons, considered the matter, and came to a decision. Suppose the First Lord of the Admiralty wished to build a vessel of the tonnage and form of the Decastation, he stated directly to the Cabinet what he proposed, and what was the expense to be incurred: the matter was then and there considered and settled. But what was the course with regard to Ireland? When the Lord Lieutenant received a deputation with some important propositions, his only answer to their representations—and a very proper one it was under the circumstances—was that he would represent to the Government in England the proposals which had been made to him. After this the Cabinet might or might not take the matter into consideration; but the Lord Lieutenant had no power to bring it personally before the Cabinet. Now, that was not a satisfactory mode of conducting Irish business, and he believed that it would be much better to have Irish affairs brought directly under the notice of the Cabinet by a Secretary of State for Ireland who should be a Cabinet Minister. His next proposal was that, in the case of criminal trials, except where conviction might be followed by sentence of death, the verdict of 8 out of 12 of the jury should be sufficient. Then with regard to education he would give an appeal to the Committee of Council in England, which Committee if wrong were committed or alleged, should have power to investigate and to redress any proved grievance. There were a great number of details which he had re-introduced in his present Bill from his Bill of 1850. The question was whether in Ireland, in accordance with our prayer, our councils were so ordered that truth and justice could be established among us for all generations. In his opinion, under our present system of dealing with Ireland this could not be: neither did he think they could be attained by allowing Cardinal Cullen unrestricted and complete control over the education of the people of that country. Having thus stated his views to their Lordships, he begged to lay his Bill on the Table, and to move that it be read a first time.

Bill for the better government of Ireland presented (The Earl Russell.)

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 1st."
—(The Earl Russell.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that when he first saw the Notice of the noble Earl, that he proposed to lay on their Lordships' Table a measure for the better government of Ireland, he had awaited with anxiety and interest the proposal which his noble Friend was about to bring forward. His noble Friend's great experience, and his knowledge of Irish matters especially, must enforce attention to any opinion he might express, and he had accordingly listened with great interest and attention to the address of his noble Friend. As to the scheme for the administration of the Government of Ireland by means of a Secretary of State having a seat in the Cabinet, instead of by a Lord Lieutenant residing in Dublin, it was quite impossible that he should express an opinion on a plan he had not yet seen; and it would be equally out of place for him to express, or attempt to express, the opinion of the Cabinet on a scheme which they had not had an opportunity of considering. As to the topics referred to by his noble Friend, he (the Earl of Kimberley) agreed in the main with the historical view with which his noble Friend commenced his address. No doubt the laws which formerly prevented the progress and prosperity of Ireland no longer existed, and it was universally admitted that since 1847—the close of the famine—there had been a general revival. As regarded the condition of the country, no doubt there was still much to be desired; but unquestionably since the time to which he had referred there had been a very considerable advance in the general prosperity of the country. As to the riots at Belfast, and as to which he complained that the Government had not acted with sufficient vigour—there was no doubt that those disturbances were very serious; and he regretted to say the occasion alluded to by his noble Friend was not the first one on which there had been riots at Belfast. Just before he had the honour of going over to Ireland as Lord Lieutenant there were riots there, and during the period of his Vice-royalty attempts were made to renew them. He knew therefore from experience the exceeding difficulty the Executive had to encounter in dealing with such outbreaks, where parties were so strongly opposed to each other as was the case in Belfast. He was afraid that it was too much the case that the local authorities did not act with the vigour that was desirable at the commencement of these riots; but unless the Executive resolved on taking the administration into their own hands and allowing the local authorities to have no voice in the management of their own town, it was difficult to see how the Government could be held responsible for not having taken the initiative in repressing the rioters. He was far from complaining of the course taken by Mr. Justice Lawson in dealing with the rioters, or with the persons guilty of contempt of Court. On the contrary, he believed that the determination shown by the learned Judge must be matter of satisfaction to all who were interested in the peace and the welfare of Ireland. As regarded agrarian crime—a malady under which Ireland had long suffered—he concurred with his noble Friend in lamenting its existence; but he thought it was a subject that need hardly have been brought forward, because at the present time there was a considerable decrease in the number of agrarian crimes as compared with what it had been of late years. For the last year it had been, as far as he could remember, about 250, as against more than 1,000 two years back. It was not so low as in 1867 and 1868; but it was not much higher. He attributed the cessation of agrarian crime in a great measure to the Act enabling the Lord Lieutenant to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, which had recently been renewed, and however painful the resort to such a measure was, it was satisfactory to find that, unlike many former attempts at the repression of crime, it had been efficient. That Act had enabled the Government to seize the men who were the mainspring of these crimes, and had given time to the Church and Land Acts to operate calmly, free from the constant recurrence of serious crimes. His noble Friend, therefore, had no ground for dissatisfaction with the action of the Government and Parliament on this head. As to the Callan Schools, the matter having been referred to a Select Committee of the House of Commons, before which the Education Commissioners were allowed to state the facts, he did not think he ought to enter upon any discussion of the subject;—he would only say that he fully agreed with his noble Friend, that nothing could be more disastrous than that having freed Ireland from the domination of the minority they should allow it to pass under the domination of the majority. The abolition of an unjust ascendancy on the part of Parliament was no reason for allowing the Roman Catholic population more than their just rights as subjects of the Crown. This would be contrary to the interests both of England and Ireland, and to the policy which this country had steadily pursued. It must not be forgotten, however, that a very large part of the population belonging to the Roman Catholic Church, the heads of that Church necessarily possessed great influence over the different communities. In deciding upon the O'Keeffe case, it seemed to him necessary to consider two things—whether the Board had acted in accordance with precedents, and what was the proper policy to be pursued by the Government and Parliament as regarded national education in Ireland. The question was, whether the present system should be maintained, or whether—which he was far from admitting—it was so defective that, as his noble Friend thought, it was practically in the hands of Cardinal Cullen? The Government and Parliament would certainly not place Irish education in the hands of Cardinal Cullen or of any hierarchy, Protestant or Roman Catholic; but they would proceed with great caution, in interfering with a system which, whatever its defects, had been, on the whole, one of the most successful institutions in Ireland, and had conferred great benefits. There had been extreme difficulty in establishing and carrying on a sound system of education in Ireland; while, therefore, maintaining fair play among all classes, and seeing that the lay element had its full weight, he hoped Parliament would not lightly destroy a structure erected with great care, and which had now existed so many years. The abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy had often been considered, but the Government would await the noble Earl's Bill before expressing any opinion upon it; and admitting, as all must do, that improvements in the Government of Ireland had never hitherto succeeded to the full satisfaction of their authors, any remedies suggested by so high an authority were sure to deserve and to receive patient consideration at the hands of the Cabinet and of Parliament.

LORD GRANMORE and BROWNE remarked that the noble Earl who had just sat down had given no answer to Mr. Justice Lawson's charge against the Government of neglect of duty in connection with the Belfast riots. It was seldom that such an indictment for neglect of duty had ever been uttered by a Judge against the Government of the country; it was this the noble Earl Earl Russell, called attention to, and as no answer could be given, it showed at least prudence not to attempt, but left Her Majesty's Government under a serious imputation. He also complained that though the Irish Secretary had in "another place" acknowledged the prevalence of crime in Mayo, yet Government refused the peaceable people of Mayo the same protection that the Peace Preservation Act extended to Westmeath.

VISCOUNT MONCK said, it was a very strong thing to state that Irish education had been handed over to Cardinal Cullen and the priests, and as a Member of the Board of National Education in Ireland, he challenged the noble Earl for proof of his assertion. The system founded in 1832 by the late Lord Derby of united secular and separate religious instruction had not been departed from; and though in a country where Roman Catholics were in a vast majority—forming in some districts almost the entire population—many schools were necessarily under the management of Roman Catholic clergy and laity, every school receiving grants was bound to admit every child to the benefit of secular instruction without any interference with its religious opinions; and so long as this system was maintained he did not see how it could be said that education in Ireland had been handed over to Cardinal Cullen. Many schools were very naturally under the management of Roman Catholic priests; but the question was whether they were or were not managed according to the principles originally laid down by the Board. The Callan case had been looked at too much from the manager's point of view, and too little with regard to its effect on the education of the country. It seemed to be thought that Mr. O'Keeffe had been deprived of a position of great honour and emolument, and the noble Earl had stated in his recent book that the Board had deprived Mr. O'Keeffe of £300 a-year; but he himself (Viscount Monck) having for some years been manager of schools, had found the office a source of expenditure, and never of emolument, managers being simply the agents of the Board for the administration of the system and for paying the salaries of the masters. By the rules of the Board the idea of such a thing as an ex officio right of appointment was expressly negatived. Rule No. 9 was to the effect that in all cases the Commissioners reserved to themselves power to determine whether the person nominated by the patron as local manager could be recognized by them as a fit person to be manager. Every one who had had any connection with popular education knew that one of the great obstacles to be overcome was the difficulty of securing the regular attendance of children at the schools. One, therefore, of the principal elements for consideration in the selection of a manager was the necessity of obtaining a person who from his local connection with the people and his moral influence was most likely to bring the children to school and to keep them there. No one, he thought, fulfilled those conditions so completely as the clergyman, no matter to what persuasion those belonged, of whom he had pastoral charge. On that ground, and on that ground only—not ex officio as clergyman, but because his position as a clergyman gave him the sort of influence which the Commissioners were desirous of seeing exercised—he was, as a general rule, selected as manager of the school in his district. But if his moral influence with the people was the principal ground of his selection, it followed that the loss of that moral influence would be a sufficient and a proper ground for his removal; and he could not help saying that the clergyman, who from whatever cause had incurred the displeasure of his ecclesiastical superiors to such an extent as to induce them to suspend him from the exercise of his clerical functions, came within the rule to which he had referred; because it was inconceivable that such a state of things could exist in any parish without dividing the district into two parties and so depriving the suspended clergyman of his influence with one portion of the people. This subject had been treated as if Cardinal Cullen and the Roman Catholics were the only parties treated in that way. The fact was that the same rule was applied indiscriminately to Protestants of the lately Disestablished Church, to Presbyterians, and to Roman Catholics and all other Communions with which the Board had to deal. He conceived that what he had stated was incontrovertible—namely, that a dispute having arisen between his ecclesiastical superiors and a clergyman must divide the district into two parties, one of which would take part with and the other against the clergyman, and that that pro tanto deprived him of the influence which the Commissioners desired he should bring to bear upon the school. He went further perhaps than his Colleagues in the matter, for he held that if a clergyman of any persuasion quarrelled, not with his ecclesiastical superiors, but even with any member of his flock, he would be equally deprived of that moral influence of which the Board wished to avail themselves, and ought to be deprived of the management of the schools of his district. These were the grounds on which he had acted. He might be egotistical on the subject, but he confessed that until some good reason was given to the contrary he would remain of opinion that the majority of the Board had acted rightly in removing Mr. O'Keeffe from the management of the Callan Schools, not because he was deprived of his office as a priest—just as he was not appointed ex officio as a priest—but because he had lost that influence which the Commissioners considered it indispensable that a manager of schools should possess, his suspension from sacerdotal functions having divided his flock into two parties, by one of which he was opposed.

EARL RUSSELL observed that what he had contended was, that had the Commissioners confined themselves to their proper duty they would have inquired whether Mr. O'Keeffe was fit to be manager of the schools, and not whether he was fit to be a priest of the Roman Catholic Church.

THE MARQUESS OF KILDARE was understood to say that the noble Earl (Earl Russell) was wrong in supposing that the Commissioners had appointed the manager of the Callan Schools. What they had done was to confirm the appointment of the School Committee. The noble Earl had also made a mistake in stating, as he had done in his recent pamphlet, that gross superstition was taught in many of the national schools in Ireland; that could not be, because no religious education was given to the children during school hours.

LORD CAIRNS said, he did not rise to enter into a discussion of the case of Mr. O'Keeffe, as he had not anticipated that it would on that occasion be made the subject of conversation or comment; but after what had fallen from the noble Viscount (Viscount Monck) he desired to make one remark. He understood the noble Viscount to say that, so far as he was concerned, the decision of the Board of Education removing Mr. O'Keeffe from the management of the schools was founded on the principle, not that Mr. O'Keeffe had ceased ex officio to be a priest of the parish, but that he had by his conduct divided his flock into two parties, and had thereby lessened his ecclesiastical influence.

VISCOUNT MONCK explained—What he desired to convey was, that the removal had occurred, not because of the suspension of the priest by ecclesiastical authority, but because he had divided his flock into two parties, and had thereby diminished his moral influence in the parish.

LORD CAIRNS said, he felt a difficulty in knowing what the ground really was on which the noble Viscount had acted. He understood him to repudiate the idea of an ex officio removal. It was not, therefore, the ground of removal that he had been deprived of his office of parish priest—there must have been something more—something in the conduct of the manager—which justified the action of the Board. If that were so, he thought their Lordships would be of opinion with him, that the first principle of justice required that, in that view of the case, the Commissioners ought at least to have heard what Mr. O'Keeffe had to say for himself.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it was obvious that the subject was one in the discussion of which on that occasion no Member of the Government ought to take a part. It was sufficient to say that a Select Committee of the other House was considering the whole matter. It was quite natural, however, that his two noble Friends who were members of the Board of National Education should think it necessary to make the statements they had done. He could not help, in common fairness to his noble Friend (Viscount Monck), saying that he entirely differed from the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns) in the construction which he had put upon what his noble Friend had said. He did not understand his noble Friend to make any attack whatever upon the personal character of Mr. O'Keeffe. His argument—whether good or bad—was this—that they thought it desirable to have as manager one who had influence in bringing the children to his school, and that they thought that influence was more likely to be possessed by the clergy of the different denominations than by other persons. His noble Friend added that where a clergyman was incapacitated from acting as a clergyman, his usefulness was diminished for the purposes for which the Commissioners had appointed him. He was not saying whether that argument of his noble Friend was good or bad, but he thought it would be very injurious to him if the impression were to go to Ireland that he had made any attack upon the character of Mr. O'Keeffe.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 1st accordingly; to be printed; and to be read 2nd on Monday, the 30th instant (No. 147).

Third Reading—Juries (Ireland) * [166]; Mariages Legalization, Saint John's Chapel, Eton * [179], and passed.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS —DAVID HUGHES'S CHARITY.

QUESTION.

MR. DAVIES asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is intended to reintroduce the scheme of the Endowed School Commissioners for David Hughes's Charity at Beaumaris, presented to Parliament last year but withdrawn in consequence of an Address being presented to Her Majesty from the House of Lords objecting to the scheme, because the bishop of the diocese was not named an ex officio governor?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the other House had agreed to a Motion for an Address to the Queen, objecting to the scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners for the school in question, on the ground that the Commissioners had found themselves obliged, in deference to the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, not to name the Bishop of the diocese or the incumbent of the parish as an ex officio governor. The whole question was now being considered by the Select Committee upstairs, and would have to be considered by the House; and he did not, therefore, think it would be wise for the Commissioners to bring forward a scheme affecting it, until that consideration had been given.

NAVY—THE "ROWENA"—SHIPPING AGENTS.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will lay upon the Table Copies of the Papers on the subject of Transport "Rowena;" and, of any Reports by the Director of Transports on the employment of Shipping Agents?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that the case to which the Question of the hon. and gallant Baronet referred was one of sea damage to a small cargo of naval stores, which were consigned to the Cape in October, 1870. On account of the length of time which had elapsed, and of certain questions of liability which were involved, he thought it would not be desirable to furnish the Papers asked for. In answer to the second part of the Question, no Reports had been made. The system had worked satisfactorily during the last two years, and no Government Stores had suffered damage, notwithstanding that many accidents of the nature had happened to the Mercantile Marine.

METROPOLIS WATER ACT (1871).

QUESTION.

MR. AGAR-ELLIS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What steps he has taken, or is about to take, to remedy the defects of the Metropolis Water Act of 1871, as the constant supply Clause has proved to be altogether inoperative for ensuring a constant high-pressure service of water for fires in the metropolis?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, he had taken no steps in the matter. The state of the law was, that it rested with the Metropolitan Board of Works, in the first instance, to require a constant supply of water, and if they refused to make the request, or there was any unreasonable delay in making it, the Local Government Board might require the thing to be done. He was not aware that any action had been taken by the Metropolitan Board in the case referred to in the Question; but if there were any unreasonable delay in the matter, the Local Government Board would have to consider what course it was desirable to pursue.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.—QUESTION.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is in a position to fix a day for the consideration of the Indian Budget; and, whether he will be able to carry out the recommendation of the Committee on East Indian Finance that the Budget should be brought forward in future in February?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that he did not think the time had yet come for fixing a day for the consideration of the Indian Budget. He should, however, endeavour to secure the object which the hon. Gentleman, no doubt, had in view, by giving a day for it before the greater portion of hon. Members had dispersed. As to the second part of the Question, he had to state that as the recommendation of the Committee did not relate to the Budget, properly speaking, so much as to an audit of accounts up to the financial year ending the 31st of March preceding, he saw no good reason why it should not be acted on. The Government certainly would be very much disposed to give it effect.

ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES—
VOLUNTEER BANDS.—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been drawn to the statement in the newspapers that a volunteer band appeared in uniform in the recent trades procession on Whit Monday; and, whether he approves of volunteers or volunteer bands taking part in political demonstrations; and, if not, whether he will cause an order to be issued forbidding it in future?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, by the existing Regulations no portion of the Auxiliary Forces is permitted to take part in any public procession or ceremony without the special authority of the General Officer commanding the district. I need scarcely say that no such authority was applied for in the present instance. By another Regulation, no band of Volunteers is permitted to appear in uniform without the authority of its commanding officer.

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA.

QUESTIONS.

MR. DENISON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will communicate to the House any detailed programme of the proposed reception and entertainment of the Shah of Persia and his Ministers? His Question, he might add, had reference only to those greater occasions in which the general public might be supposed to be more especially interested, and not to any Royal hospitalities within the precincts of the Palace.

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that taking the Question as it stood on the Paper, it had been replied to on more than one previous occasion. He could, therefore, only repeat what had been said before, and what probably the hon. Member expected—namely, that it was impossible to give any detailed programme of the proceedings during the Shah's visit. Some discretion must be left to those who were responsible for those proceedings, and it was not even desirable that the Foreign Sovereign, in whose honour there was to be a manifestation of any kind, should be made to view everything as if he were being put on drill.

MR. RYLANDS, referring to a recent statement of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India, to the effect that the hon. Member for Penryn (Mr. Eastwick) possessed great influence in the councils of Teheran, wished to know whether the hon. Gentleman would, by the desire of the Government, be one of the Gentlemen in attendance on the Shah?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, as the hon. Gentleman had not given him Notice of the Question, he would, perhaps, be kind enough to repeat it to-morrow, when he should be happy to give him an answer.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, a rumour had reached him that the House should adjourn over some day next week in honour of the festivities on the occasion of the Shah's visit; he wished to know whether the rumour was correct?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have heard nothing of the rumour alluded to by the hon. Baronet.

CRIMINAL LAW—CHIPPING NORTON
MAGISTRATES.—EXPLANATION.

MR. BRUCE: Sir, I have received a Report from the clerk to the visiting justices of the county gaol at Oxford on the complaints of Mary and Elizabeth Pratley as to the insufficiency of food for themselves and children, and general neglect and ill-treatment during their imprisonment, and the absence of inquiry by the visiting justices and other prison authorities as to the sufficiency of their food. I am informed that Mr. Hammersley, the Chairman of quarter sessions, and two other visiting justices visited the gaol on the 24th of May, two days after the admission of the prisoners, and they state that all the women were asked by the Chairman in the presence of the governor and the matron, whether they had any complaint to make, and that they answered they had not. Two surgeons who attended the prison saw these women, and state that they were healthy, received sufficient food, and although asked if they had any complaint to make, made none. The matron of the prison states—

"Both the mothers and children were healthy on their admission, and also on their discharge. They were furnished with the same diet as all other prisoners with babies have been during the 12 years I have been in the prison, where I have had many such under my charge, and according to the rule and dietary table which has been always found to be sufficient, and has never occasioned any complaint. Each child was supplied every morning and every evening with a full half-pint of new milk, and also with six ounces of bread each day, usually allowed for babies. In addition to the above diet, I made some sop with sugar for Elizabeth Pratley's child each day, as she told me her child had been accustomed to have sugar. I asked each prisoner every night at supper, whether they had got all they required for the children, and they always answered in a satisfactory and contented manner that they had. The prisoners did not on arrival complain of any cold or damp, and during their imprisonment did not complain to me of anything, excepting that Mary Pratley, two days after admission, complained of rheumatism, when I asked her if she would see the doctor, but she did not think it was necessary to do so. Each prisoner slept on a wooden bedstead and straw mattress, and was supplied with a rug, a sheet, and two blankets. I was present when the three visiting justices saw the prisoners, and I heard the Chairman inquire whether they had any complaint to make, and they answered they had not. I never noticed that Mary Pratley's child had a cough, and I must have observed or heard it if it had been so; and certainly I never found or saw her child suffering on Sunday from a cough, as she has stated."

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK—THE REGULATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. COLLINS, (for Mr. J. LOWTHER,) asked, What are the Regulations relating to the admission of persons on horseback into the central enclosure of Hyde Park; and, whether such regulations were carried into effect on Monday, June 2nd?

MR. BRUCE in reply, said, that the police on duty in the Park on the day mentioned by the hon. Member were not at first aware that the procession was headed by a certain number of mounted men, and that when they found that it was so headed, believing that if they interfered they would cause confusion, and exercising the best of their judgment at the moment, they allowed the mounted men to enter the enclosure. It was, however, against the rules that horsemen should be allowed to enter that enclosure, and strict orders had been given to prevent such an infraction of the rules in future.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day subsequent to the Order for the Second Reading of the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill be postponed until after the Notice of Motion of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer relative to the Mail Contracts for the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar Mails.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL (Lords)—[BILL 154.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it would be his duty to state as shortly and as clearly as possible the general principles of the measure to which he was about to ask the House to give its assent. So far as the drafting of the measure was concerned, his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor—taking, in some degree, the Law Officers of the Crown into his counsel—was responsible; but the noble and learned Lord would, no doubt, admit that the Bill itself was, to a large extent, an embodiment of the recommendations of the Judicature Commission, which was itself the result of a considerable amount of Parliamentary discussion which had been had on the subject, and which had created an opinion out-of-doors on the question. No doubt, the matter had first taken tangible form in the memorable speech which had been delivered by the noble and learned Lord in that House in 1867, and the influence and authority of the noble and learned Lord had doubtless given to the question an impulse which it might otherwise have wanted. The subject was fortunately one entirely removed from the ordinary regions of party politics; but while labouring under that disadvantage, every candid person must admit, at the same time, that it was one on which it was necessary that a competent opinion should be created out-of-doors before the attention of Parliament could be successfully directed towards it. He hoped that by that time there had been sufficient discussion in and out of that House to enable them to deal with it once for all, and that the Bill would be found, he would not say so perfect as to shut out all future legislation, but a large and valuable contribution to that portion of law reform. Without entering into a lengthened history of the subject, or a defence of the law of England as at present administered, or of the tribunals which administered that law, he might say, as one who had passed a large portion of his life in its study, that he had formed a strong opinion that, whatever might be the defects in the law, they were to be attributed, not to the learned Judges who administered it, but to the fact that the system on which it was founded, having grown up during the Middle Ages, was incapable of being adapted to the requirements of modern times. While saying, on the whole, that whatever might be its defects, it was founded on substantial justice and common sense, yet it was beyond controversy, that in many instances our procedure was impracticable and inconvenient, for no one practically conversant with its details could deny that there were certain great defects in them which ought to be remedied. First of all, there was the broad distinction which had become inveterate between what was called in this country Law and Equity. In other countries, the distinction existed, and must always exist; but in this country alone, Law and

Equity were made the subject of separate and even conflicting jurisdiction. A second defect of their system had been a great waste of judicial power. Many questions which came before the Common Law Courts were questions rather for the determination of a single Judge than a Court of four persons, highly paid, and generally men of first-rate ability. It was no answer to the statement that there had been a great waste of judicial power, to say that as the business of the country had increased more Judges had been made, because so long as we went on making more Judges and occupied them in the same Courts, we really only intensified the mischief, and did not to any appreciable extent diminish the evil of a waste of judicial power. Another great defect of the present system had been the Terms and Vacations of the legal year. The Terms had been altered in some respects, that was to say the beginning and the end of Terms had been fixed by Act of Parliament, but, practically speaking, and without going into antiquarian discussion, the Terms and the Vacations remained what they were in the Middle Ages. Many things could be done in Term only, and the singular practical inconvenience which arose from that cause must have struck everyone having any knowledge of the subject. An example of that had occurred recently. His noble and learned Friend had stated in the other House, that a question arising on a summons which was issued by a magistrate in November last, with reference to an alleged breach of the Parks Regulation Act, could not be decided, owing to the present system of Vacations, by a Common Law Court before the latter part of January last, although many other similar cases were depending on the decision with reference to that summons. Another great defect of our present system had been the exceedingly imperfect constitution, and the still more imperfect working, at any rate, on the Common Law side, of our Courts of Appeal. The operation of their intermediate Court of Appeal was bad and intermittent; and no man, whatever might be his view of the constitutional position of the House of Lords, who had had any knowledge of its practical working, could deny, that a more indefensible institution as a judicial institution it was hardly possible to con-also, was one of the most powerful among those who now practised in those Courts, and no one would suppose he would willingly impair a system he so thoroughly understood, and of which he was so great an ornament. Being himself a representative of what Lord Westbury had been pleased to describe as the degraded and baser parts of the law—a description which gave evidence of a not very accurate acquaintance with the subject with which the noble and learned Lord dealt—he could not hope that his professions of tenderness for Equity would have as much weight as the fact that the sympathies of the Lord Chancellor and the Solicitor General were distinctly in favour of it. The Judges, his hon. and learned Friend perhaps knew, had loudly called for help. In effect they had said—"If we are to be turned into Courts of Equity, for God's sake send us some men who understand Equity, and do not leave us a prey to distinguished Equity counsel"—such, perhaps, as my hon. and learned Friend. It was manifest, therefore, that in both the Equity and Common Law Courts there should be persons competent to give information on points respecting which the Judges, having been brought up under a different system, were naturally wanting. It would not do for the Bench to be inferior to the Bar. Of course, it must always be that some distinguished members of the Bar should be superior to some upon the Bench; but those were exceptional cases, and it could not be tolerated that the Bar as a body should be superior in knowledge to the Bench. It was, therefore, obvious that it would be impossible to work this Bill properly, unless some such thing as his hon. and learned Friend suggested was done. If the Fates were kind, and permitted the continuance of his noble and learned Friend in office, it was his intention that everything necessary and proper for the administration of the law under the Bill should be done. He was not authorized to speak in the name of hon. Gentlemen opposite, but he believed that what he had said of the Lord Chancellor could be said with equal truth of Lord Cairns, should he again fill the office he so worthily filled some years ago. In fact, it would be impossible to administer the Bill satisfactorily, except in the sense suggested by his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment. Still, that was a very different thing from enacting that such a course should be pursued; because to enact what his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment pointed to would be to stereotype on the face of an Act of Parliament that distinction between Law and Equity which it was the object of the Bill to destroy. Henceforth, if this Bill came into operation, all men practising in the Courts would soon be sufficiently accomplished to deal with the law on either side. Of course, a period of transition would occur, during which some difficulty would be experienced, but the transitional period would not be of long duration. Under the circumstances, therefore, he thought his hon. and learned Friend would see that it was most inexpedient to press his Amendment, and that he would be content with an assurance that his object should be carried out. So much for the High Court of Justice, but the Bill would be imperfect without the creation also of a Court of Appeal. What could be more anomalous than the present state of the Courts of Appeal? As far as Common Law cases were concerned, there were two Courts of Appeal—first, the Exchequer Chamber, and then the House of Lords. In the Court of Chancery, speaking under correction, he would say there was not always a reference to an intermediate Court of Appeal; in certain cases there might be an appeal to the House of Lords, without the intermediate appeal to the Lords Justices. Then there was the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for appeals from the Colonies, Ecclesiastical and Admiralty cases. The Exchequer Chamber had almost every fault that a Court of Appeal could have. It was uncertain—he would speak tremblingly of the Judges in the presence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Dr. Ball); but they were men who had feelings, and he had known cases when a judgment of a particular Court, if there were any means of overruling it, was pretty sure to be overruled in the Exchequer Chamber. Then, there was no absolute necessity that the Exchequer Chamber should have a larger number of Judges than the Court which it overruled, and it had often happened that where the two Courts were divided, it was the opinion held by the minority of Judges which had prevailed. The Court sat, too, but for a very limited time, and that time was uncertain. The Lords Justices formed a much better Court of Appeal, and for a very long time had given satisfaction. The Privy Council, too, for something like 25 or 26 years was about as good a Court as this Empire contained; but it became exceedingly difficult to maintain it in that high state of efficiency, because, as it was until lately an entirely unpaid Court, it was almost entirely dependent on the services of unpaid Judges. At last it became almost impossible for it to continue its sittings. The Judicial Committee still remained an absolutely good Court; but that had happened which some predicted when the Bill for its improvement was before Parliament. It would be said that if we were to have paid and unpaid Judges on the tribunal, in a short time it would be the paid Judges only that would attend. It had not quite come to that, but very nearly so, and he could not help thinking that the sort of august character which the Privy Council possessed was in peril of being lowered and the Court brought to the condition simply of a well-officered and well-filled tribunal. As for the House of Lords, it was his duty, whatever hon. Gentlemen opposite might think, to say what he thought of it as a judicial institution. For his part, he would say that if this Bill did nothing else but get rid of the House of Lords as a judicial tribunal it would be worth while to pass it. He could not believe that if suitors had any power of combination the House of Lords would have lasted as a judicial institution to the present time, such were the expenses and delays of it. He was himself in a case which had been pending in the House of Lords for six or seven years. The utter irresponsibility of the Judges who composed it made it a perfectly indefensible institution. He did not know what would be said now of Chancery Appeals, but he did know that some time ago they used to be decided by a single Peer, and a caustic Lord Justice used to say that the way they were decided made him hold up his hands in respectful amazement. Practically, at present the Common Law Appeals were decided by a single Judge, for there was not a single Common Law Lord but one who attended the sittings of the House of Lords. Lord Penzance was too ill at present to attend, and before he generally was too busy. He recollected cases in which the unanimous opinion of the Court of Common Pleas and of the Court of Exchequer was overruled by this single Common Law Lord, the Judges not being summoned. Besides, the House of Lords now was not what it used to be in former times. Everyone knew that it was to the House of Lords, as a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, and to the whole Peerage that the Constitution wisely, or unwisely, intrusted the declaration upon appeal of what was the law of England; the Judges were in those days habitually summoned as their advisers, and the House of Lords, in 99 cases out of 100, or even in a still larger proportion, followed the advice given by the Judges. It was perfectly true that Lord Eldon said he had the right to overrule all the Judges in England, but that was a right which neither that noble and learned Lord nor the House of Lords itself had ever yet exercised. The House of Lords was at that time a convenient medium through which to ascertain the judgment of all the Judges; but that was not the case now. The whole character of the House of Lords was definitely changed in the famous cases of The Queen v. O'Connell. The lay Members of the House attended in large numbers on that occasion, as they had done in former days; but the Duke of Wellington earnestly advised them to take no part in the decision. They acted upon his advice and abstained from voting, and the Law Lords divided according to their political sentiments. He had no doubt that they were perfectly honest in what they did, but the fact was that the noble and learned Lords who were opposed in opinion to O'Connell voted against him, and those who were in favour of his views voted for him. From that day to this an appeal to the House of Lords had really been an appeal to two or three Law Lords who happened to attend, for the rule of the House now was, that the Judges were not summoned unless both parties desired it. [Dissent.] He might be wrong about the rule, but, at all events, the Judges were very seldom summoned. Practically the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords was in different hands from what it used to be, and from what the constitution intended it should be, and he saw no reason for maintaining the new state of things for which there was no precedent, and which was found extremely inconvenient. That, indeed, might be said to be the opinion of the House of Lords itself, which had passed that Bill and sent it down to them with those provisions. Now, the Court of Appeal which it was proposed to create would consist of 12 or 14 persons. There would be five ex officio Members—the Lord Chancellor, the three Chief Judges of the Common Law Courts, the Master of the Rolls; the four paid Judges of the Privy Council—who took office with the understanding that they should be available for any reconstruction of the Court of Supreme Appeal—and three others—an ex-Lord Chancellor or Judge, and certain Scotch and Irish Judges, if they thought fit to come. The Court of Appeal would sit in two divisions all the year round, according to rules to be drawn up, and the present unintelligible and inconvenient distinction between Terms and Vacations would be abolished. Except an increase to the salary of the Judges of the Admiralty Court, as proposed by the House of Lords, and an increase of £1,000 a-year to the salaries of the paid Members of the Court of Appeal other than the ex officio Members, the Bill did not create any additional charge to the country—or, at least, certainly no permanent additional charge. Speaking on these matters on the second reading, it would be understood that he spoke with entire reserve; that the whole of those matters were absolutely open, and that he was merely describing the Bill as it came from the other House. The Judges of the High Court would be reduced to the old standard at which they stood before the House of Commons transferred the Election Petition business to them, and made that a reason for adding three members to the Judicial Bench. Experience had shown that the Election Judges—those at least who had been added—had not their time fully occupied, and it was desirable that highly-paid persons should be fully employed. To the new Court of Appeal it was proposed to transfer the whole of the English appeals to the House of Lords, and also the whole judicial business of the Privy Council, excepting the ecclesiastical appeals. The jurisdiction of the House of Lords would be kept alive for the hearing of Scotch and Irish appeals. If the Scotch and Irish people preferred that that should be so, they were entitled to have their preference, and as an Englishman he had no right to meddle with it. He had always thought the defect of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, if it had a defect, was in ecclesiastical matters, and that the presence of Bishops on that tribunal contributed nothing whatever to the weight of its decisions as legal decisions, while it affected to give them a sort of factitious spiritual influence which three Bishops who happened to be Privy Councillors could not possibly confer. He thought that questions of property and law, even as far as the interests of the Church herself were concerned, ought to be decided by lawyers. However, they had to deal with questions which were not strictly legal questions, and therefore the Judicial Committee would remain for the purpose of ecclesiastical appeals. As he had stated, there would be two Divisions of the Supreme Court, to one of which would be entrusted the cases now dealt with by the Judicial Committee. In that case, the whole jurisdiction and process being thus transferred to the Supreme Court, the decisions would still remain as the decisions of the Queen herself, Her Majesty being advised by the Judges of that Court, as she was now advised by the Judicial Committee. They would sit continuously all the year round, and as he had said before, the present inconvenient distinction between Terms and Vacations would be abolished. There would also be sittings in London and Middlesex. Another important provision in the Bill was the power of appointing official and regularly constituted referees. It was proposed that the Judge in Chambers or the Court should be able at any stage of the case, if it clearly appeared not to be a case fit for trial in Court or for adjudication by a Judge and jury, to refer it by an Order. There would be attached to the Courts certain official referees, who would take those references as part of their regular duty. He hoped that portion of the Bill would be found satisfactory, and get rid, in working, of one of the justest causes of complaint that existed, at all events, on the Common Law side of the question. He did not mean to go at length into the Schedule of Procedure, which would be found exceedingly important. That was matter rather of discussion clause by clause in Committee than one which could usefully occupy the attention of the House at the present stage. In general, it was an attempt to initiate a more sensible and intelligible mode of procedure—to get rid, if possible, of the defects both of Chancery and Common Law procedure, and to produce something in the shape not of pleading, but procedure, that should be at once sensible and satisfactory. Such in outline was this measure which he had introduced—he knew how imperfectly—to the attention of the House. There were two subjects connected with the question of Law Reform—the Reform of the Law itself and the reform of the procedure by which the Law was administered; and they were very distinct. In some respects this Bill, in different portions of it, dealt with both these subjects; and he trusted it would be found to deal with them satisfactorily. At any rate, such as it was, he begged leave to recommend it to the attention of the House of Commons. So far as the Government were concerned, they did not aspire or pretend to any greater responsibility or merit in the question than having recognized the position of public opinion, and striven, as far as they could, to give effect to it. He asked the House to recollect that the Bill came to them with the sanction of the House of Lords—it came to them from the House of Lords, which had shown both great wisdom and patriotism in declining any longer to stand in the way of a great public advantage, for which there was a great public demand. The Government proposed to do no more than accept the will of Parliament, to become, in this respect, the ministers of its will and interpreters, as far as they understood them, of the wishes of the people—perfectly content, if they could conduct the Bill to a successful issue, to give credit when they found it was due to others for having by intelligent discussion brought about that state of public opinion and feeling which rendered that or any other measure possible. With regard to the Notice of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) to send the Bill to a Select Committee, that was a Motion contingent on the second reading, and could not come before them unless the second reading was carried. He would, therefore, say no more than this—Here was a large, important, and valuable contribution to Law Reform; they had waited for it long enough, too long—and he would be no party to any proceeding that had any tendency to imperil its success, or even, in any appreciable manner to delay its progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Mr. CHARLEY, in rising to propose the Amendment, of which he had given Notice, said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had pronounced a sweeping condemnation on the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, and affirmed that it was utterly indefensible. He (Mr. Charley) begged to move—

“That it is inexpedient to abolish the jurisdiction of the House of Lords as an English Court of Final Appeal.”

The Attorney General said that the present Bill was founded on the Report of the Judicature Commission. That Commission had recommended that there should be a new Court of Appeal created in substitution for the Court of Exchequer Chamber and the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and that there should be an appeal to the House of Lords both from the new Court of Appeal and also directly, subject to the consent of the respondent, from the High Court of Justice. By its 17th clause, the present measure swept away the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords in England altogether. The Commissioners were anxious that an opportunity should be afforded of testing the efficiency of the new Court of Appeal before touching the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, and that in any case a second appeal should be retained. The Bill, therefore ignored the recommendations of the Judicature Commission. To the first Report were attached the names of the present Lord Chancellor and the Attorney General. The hon. and learned Gentleman further said, that the House of Lords had voluntarily abandoned their appellate jurisdiction; but, in 1836, a Select Committee of the House of Lords considered the question of their appellate jurisdiction; on that Committee sat, not merely distinguished laymen like Lords Derby and Laundowne—but the greatest lawyers of the day—Lords Lyndhurst, Brougham, Cranworth, Campbell, and St. Leonards, and they unanimously recommended that the appellate jurisdiction should be retained. Last year also a Select Committee sat on the same subject, and recommended not the abolition, but rather the extension of the appellate jurisdiction. The House of Lords itself, though it had passed the present Bill, had not been unanimous in its support. Lord Cairns had pointed out that it would be highly impolitic in their Lordships to abolish altogether a second Court of Appeal. Lord Redesdale — no mean authority — had stoutly opposed the Bill throughout. As to the new Court of Appeal created by the Bill itself, it was a great defect, he thought, that several of the Judges who were to be members of the Court of Appeal would have to sit in the High Court of Justice. He (Mr. Charley) mainly objected to the abolition of the appellate jurisdiction of the Lords on constitutional but also on legal grounds. A decision of the House of Lords had an air of authority about it which the decision of an ordinary Judge did not possess; it was severed off sharply from the decisions of the Courts below by a barrier of prestige and traditional respect, and therefore the existence of the appellate jurisdiction of that House tended to give fixity to our law. The ordinary Judges cited it with a respect which they did not show to the decisions of one another. It was said, however, that the abolition of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was a very pressing law reform; but a Return obtained by his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. G. Gregory), showed that while in 1870-71, there were no fewer than 428 appeals from one Court of Chancery to another, there were, during the same period, only 35 appeals from the Court of Chancery to the House of Lords. That, he thought, furnished a conclusive answer to the argument that the abolition of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was a very pressing law reform. To begin the work of law reform with the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords seemed to him like commencing to build a house at the roof. Again the Bill did not touch Scotch or Irish appeals. A Peer of the realm only would do for Scotland and Ireland, a Commoner was quite good enough for England. The Scotch were proverbially a shrewd people, and not over given to sentimentality, and yet they were susceptible to the traditional influence and authority of the House of Lords. Sir James Moncrieff had said that the dignity of the final Court of Appeal was the reason why the people of Scotland were reluctant to part with it. Mr. Hope, Lord Justice Clerk said, that if a single person, other than a Peer of the realm, were placed upon the final Court of Appeal, it would lose all its authority in Scotland. The Scotch law differed from the English, the English and Irish law were very similar. Under this Bill the similarity between the English and Irish law would exist no longer; it would, in consequence, introduce confusion where union now existed. They knew how admirably the Judges performed the duty of giving their advice on legal questions in the House of Lords, and it always had great weight; but if this Bill passed, the occupation of the Judges as the constitutional assistants of the House of Lords would be gone, and the new Court of Appeal would have no power whatever to summon them to give advice. But it was on constitutional grounds that he mainly objected to the measure. The balance of power between the two Houses of Parliament was essential to our liberties; but this Bill would rudely shake that balance, which had already been sufficiently disturbed. The leading distinction between the two Houses had always been the enjoyment by the House of Lords of judicial authority which was denied to the House of Commons. The exclusive right of the House of Lords to exercise the judicial powers of the High Court of Parliament was as well ascertained as the exclusive right of the House of Commons to originate money Bills. In the reign of Henry IV. the House of Commons solemnly affirmed that the right of judgments in Parliament appertained to the Lords and not to the Commons; and although, in 1675, the House of Commons denied that the Lords had the right to hear appeals from the Court of Chancery, that right had now for two centuries passed unchallenged. Addressing in 1675, the assembled Peers, the then Earl of Shaftesbury said—

“This matter is no less than your whole judicature; and your judicature is the life and soul of the dignity of the peerage in England; you will quickly grow burthensome, if you grow useless; you have now the greatest and most useful end of Parliaments principally in you, which is not to make new laws, but to redress grievances, and to maintain the old land marks.

Mr. Charley

"If it be possible," he added, "to establish a satisfactory Court of final appeal in the House of Lords, consistently with constitutional principle and the interests of the country, would it not be as well—would it not be better—to do so, rather than to annihilate all the prestige of centuries and all the traditional respect which the country had been accustomed to feel for the jurisdiction so exercised, for the sake of attempting some new experiment, the success of which no one could foretell?"—[3 Hansard, cxlii. 458-9.]

The present Bill swarmed with provisions, that, after all this grand agglomeration of Courts of Justice had taken place, powers should be exercised and rights enforced just as if the Bill had not passed. One was almost tempted to quote the saying of the witty and hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne), and say that after all this fuss and confusion it was to be a case of "as you were!" But however inoperative the Bill might be in other respects, it would cause a great change in the position of the House of Lords as an integral part of the Constitution. The House of Lords would cease to exercise the judicial powers of the High Court of Parliament. Parliament would no doubt continue to be as hitherto a deliberative and legislative assembly, but it would cease to be what our ancestors intended it to be—the last resort of the suitor who complained that the law had been misinterpreted by the Judges, who wield the equitable jurisdiction or by the Judges of the land.

Mr. BOURKE, in seconding the Amendment, complained that the Bill had received as bare an amount of discussion as had ever been accorded to a Bill, and the high authority by which it had been recommended to the House had not only been sufficient to bear down all opposition, however well founded it might be, but it had had the effect of stifling all discussion. If the object to be obtained was the fusion of Law and Equity, the first step must be the joining together of all the Courts of Law into one great Court of Judicature. He could not help regretting that there was no immediate prospect of the new Law Courts being completed, because that fact would be the greatest obstacle to the carrying out of the measure. The distance between the present Courts of Equity and Law would act as an antagonistic power to the fusion of Law and Equity; and although, in theory, the Bill did abolish the different Courts, yet when they came to look at the details of it, they would find that it re-established the old Courts. That being so, he very much feared the state of matters would revert to what it was at present. Modern efforts had been made to bring what was good in Courts of Equity into the Common Law Courts, and to transport what was good in the Common Law Courts into the Courts of Equity, and these efforts had been conspicuous failures. The reason had been that the Legislature had not perceived the difficulties which arose in practice, and from endeavouring to give power to the Courts of Law and Equity to administer both systems, when these Courts respectively had power to administer only one. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, however, in reference to the subject, had given so correct a definition of the phrase "Fusion of Law and Equity" that it would be impossible hereafter to mistake what was meant by that phrase. He believed there could be no doubt that when the House came to examine the Bill it would be found to be a mere skeleton. If they looked into it they would find it altogether vague in most of the essential provisions with regard to procedure, and the truth was that it left to be decided by Rules hereafter nearly the whole of the procedure with which it dealt. The 20th clause laid down that the jurisdiction was to be exercised in the manner defined in the Act, that was one way; 2nd, by Rules and Orders named in the Act; and 3rd, by Rules and Orders which were to be made from time to time hereafter. The Rules and Orders really related to the most important subjects which procedure could deal with, such as the Courts of Justice and Appeal, and the regulations of the circuits, so that it would be possible for the Judges to make any rules they pleased with regard, for example, to circuits, though these were arranged at present by Act of Parliament. The Judges were also to have power to determine all matters not named in the Schedule. As those matters were of a most important character, he thought the Bill ought to contain specific provisions with regard to them. There was also a clause in the Bill on which he thought a great deal more information ought to be given to the House before they passed it, and that was the clause relating to the appointment of a referee.

Mr. Charley

That clause provided that any matter which should require any preliminary investigation, and any matter of accounts that should require a scientific or local inquiry, should be referred to a referee. Now, there were a vast number of cases on every circuit and at every Assize which might be classed under those heads, and there was nothing to be found in the Bill as to the position or qualifications of these referees; they might be barristers, or attorneys, or gentlemen at large. Under those circumstances, he hoped that they would have the fullest possible information with regard to the business qualifications and the remuneration of these referees. The Bill certainly made important changes in the law which required the greatest possible consideration. With regard to the district registries, that was a part of the Bill about which he had great doubt. These district registries looked very convenient things; but when they came to see how they worked they would prove the reverse. The Bill also made important changes in law, especially with regard to the administration of the assets of insolvent estates, and those changes would require the greatest possible consideration. With regard to the abolition of the right of appeal to the House of Lords, it was asked how it happened that the House of Lords seemed to have so easily abandoned a jurisdiction which they had held for many centuries? It was urged that as that House had itself consented to abandon its jurisdiction, it was not for the House of Commons to object. But when they remembered the way in which the case had been put to the House of Lords, it was no wonder they had consented to part with their jurisdiction. The case was put before them as if the House of Lords were endeavouring to retain a jurisdiction prejudicial to the public, and only retained by them to support their own dignity and importance. Under those circumstances, it was not surprising that the House of Lords did not for a moment allow any consideration connected with their order to obstruct a reform recommended to them on high authority. The jurisdiction in cases of appeal was not, however, within the sole control of the House of Lords. It had been conferred upon the House by the Constitution, sanctioned by many Acts of Parliament, and it concerned that House as much as the House of Lords, nay, even more, carefully to examine whether the appellate jurisdiction which the Upper House had so long exercised on behalf of the people of England could be so advantageously exercised by any other body of men existing or to be constituted hereafter. The opinion of the Lord Chief Justice had been quoted in justification of this proposal. He would yield to none in admiration of the Lord Chief Justice, who, in addition to the high qualifications which he daily exhibited in the administration of justice, had earned the lasting gratitude of his fellow-countrymen in the part he sustained in the Arbitration of Geneva. He (Mr. Bourke) was, however, obliged to dissent from the opinion that the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was a "shadowy authority." He believed it was the most popular Court in the kingdom, and that though the Appellate Court consisted of a limited number of Law Lords, yet the tribunal possessed from its peculiar construction an authority which could not be conferred upon any other Court of Appeal. When authority was cited on one side it was only to be met by citing authority on the other side, and Sir Richard Bethell (now Lord Westbury), told a Committee of the House of Lords in 1856, on the constitution of the Court of Appeal, that he by no means desired that this jurisdiction should be taken away from the House of Lords. Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Sir Roundell Palmer, Mr. Rolt, Mr. Napier, Mr. Inglis, and the right hon. John Hope, the Lord Justice Clerk of Scotland, also expressed opinions in favour of retaining the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, with certain improvements and alterations. The present measure moreover proposed to do away with that jurisdiction as far as English cases were concerned, but to retain it with regard to Irish and Scotch cases. Now, if the House of Lords were as strong a Court as the Scotch and Irish had a right to demand, it was certainly good enough for the English people. If, on the other hand, it were a weak Court, the grossest scandal would be brought on the administration in this country of Scotch and Irish business, and we should be putting an affront on that portion of Her Majesty's subjects which we ought for political reasons least to offend in these days of Home Rule. Indeed, he knew of nothing more likely to encourage the Home Rulers than by doing away with the appellate jurisdiction to degrade that House in the opinion of this country. Again, he knew of nothing more likely to weaken the legislative authority of the Second Chamber than to take out of it all judicial power, and the authority of all those who had devoted their lives to the study of the law, for he thought it unlikely that any Law Lord would be appointed except the Lord Chancellor. Further, he objected to the proposed scheme, because it broke up the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, inasmuch as the salaried Judges of the Judicial Committee would be taken away and put into the new Appeal Court. The Judicial Committee, as at present constituted, thoroughly possessed the confidence of the suitors, and the House should be very careful not to transfer the jurisdiction from a Court which they approved to one which they knew nothing about. The great bulk of the business transacted by the Privy Council came to it from India and the Colonies. Moreover, it was substantially sui generis, and different from that which would come before an Appeal Court. Now, as the Privy Council was regarded with respect and confidence by our various colonists, he thought it highly inexpedient, impolitic, and dangerous to transfer its jurisdiction to another tribunal, the bulk of whose business would be totally different from that which occupied its attention. Another objection to the new Court of Appeal was that many of the Judges were connected with a Court of First Instance, and this was a condition which had been condemned over and over again by competent authorities, including Lord Campbell and Lord Westbury. In conclusion, he hoped the House would seriously consider the operation of the Bill before they consented to give it a second reading, because he was sure the result of such consideration would be that they would entertain favourably the proposition of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) to refer it to a Select Committee, which was the only practical way of dealing with the subject.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is inexpedient to abolish the jurisdiction of the House of Lords as an English Court of Final Appeal,"—(Mr. Charley),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN contended that the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley), and those who opposed the Bill on the ground that the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was an integral part of the Constitution were bound to go further and to insist not only that it was not competent to abolish it, but that it was not competent to remodel it. It was a strange thing that the constitutional objection had not occurred to the noble and learned Lords who voted for the Bill, and it was a conclusive answer to that objection that the Bill had come from the other House. In the case of the hon. and learned Member, who he suspected had not had much experience of the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal, it must have been that "distance lent enchantment to the view." The Court consisted entirely of volunteers; there was no obligation on any noble and learned Lord, except the Lord Chancellor, to attend; and many of the appeals were from judgments of the Lord Chancellor, so that it was questionable whether he ought to sit in such appeals. The Court was available only four months of the year; and many of the Law Lords had attained to such an age in the public service that we had no right to expect much more work out of them. When Solicitor General, Lord Westbury described the tribunal as one, the members of which, except the Lord Chancellor, felt at liberty to attend or not, as they pleased, and the judicial sittings of which they attended as they did a debate, so that its decisions, instead of being, as they ought to be, as unchangeable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, were unsatisfactory in character, and the Court was inferior to the lowest tribunals in what ought to be the accompaniments of a Court of Justice. Another objection to this tribunal was that men were raised to it on principles different from those on which they were raised to the Judicial Bench. The House of Lords was primarily a political body. He did not mean to insinuate for a moment that the noble and learned Lords were actuated in their judgments by political considerations; still no one could deny that the road to the House of Lords lay through a political gate. Besides, the House of Lords was an hereditary body; and a large family or a limited private means therefore frequently proved an insuperable bar to entering it. In this way many of the most distinguished Judges on the Bench were excluded from the House by personal or political considerations; and as a matter of fact, of 18 Common Law Judges and six Equity Judges, not one was in the House of Lords. In fact, the only Judge at present in the Upper House was the Lord Chancellor himself. However, the re-constitution of the appellate jurisdiction was not the main feature of this Bill. The main object of the Bill was that it should effect a fusion of Law and Equity; and if it did that it would be worth all the judicial reforms ever introduced into this country put together. But the question was, did it effect that fusion? From the 17th century to the present day they had had to witness the monstrous spectacle of Law in Westminster and Equity in Lincoln's-Inn, in a chronic state of opposition; or to use Lord Westbury's words, "we set up two Courts, one Court to do an injustice and the other to redress it when done." But while as anxious as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to promote the main object of the Bill, he believed that object was only to be attained in one way—namely, by attaching at least one Equity Judge to each of the Common Law Divisions of the High Court of Justice, and, to elicit a discussion, on the subject, had put an Amendment on the Paper. He felt inclined to withdraw it on hearing the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, than which nothing could be more charming; but the speech was one thing and the Bill another, and he preferred to have the assurances given in the speech embodied in the Bill, for neither the hon. and learned Gentleman nor the Government was immortal. He was sorry there was a disposition on the part of the public to regard this as a lawyer's and not as a suitor's question because the public had a great stake in it. The mode in which suitors were now driven from pillar to post—from Law to Equity, or from Equity to Law—was perfectly monstrous, and all lawyers were agreed as to the necessity of abolishing the existing line of demarcation between the two jurisdictions. There was a certain confusion in the minds of those who discussed the questions of Law and Equity. It should be borne in mind that there were two distinctions between Courts of Law and Equity—the one substantial and the other accidental; a difference of principle and a difference of process. The Courts of Law not only administered different kinds of justice, but they administered it in different modes, and it was necessary to keep both distinctions in view. It would be impossible effectually to fuse Law and Equity until all the Courts were provided with the same machinery. The attempts that had been already made in that direction had failed for this reason. Now, this Bill, though it gave equitable jurisdiction to Common Law Courts, provided them with no equitable machinery. It provided that where the rules of Equity and Law conflicted the rules of Equity should prevail; but it did little more. The Act providing for trial by jury in the Chancery Court had become almost a dead letter, scarcely more than half-a-dozen such cases had been tried, and the Vice Chancellor's Court had at length been relieved from the incumbrance of a jury box. Another Act giving to the Courts of Common Law jurisdiction in cases of Equity, had become absolutely a dead letter, the reason in each case being that the Judges in each case felt unequal to the novel task imposed on them. The hon. and learned Gentleman, having referred to the letters addressed to the Lord Chancellor by the whole of the Outer Equity Bar, and by the Inner Equity Bar with one distinguished exception—the Solicitor General, who was not, however, a free agent—proceeded to say, that the Bill proposed to effect that fusion of Law and Equity which was so much to be desired, by providing that Law and Equity should be concurrently administered. But the sections which dealt with the subject, standing alone, really did nothing; they effected nothing but a paper fusion, faultless no doubt in theory, but utterly unworkable in practice. He looked at the subsequent sections of the Bill, and the first thing he saw was that the old Courts were to be perpetuated under different names. The Vice Chancellors were to be called Her Majesty's Judges; but they were to sit by themselves in a Division which was to be called the First or Chancery Division. All the Judges of the Common Law Courts were to sit by themselves. The Court of Queen's Bench was to become the Division of Queen's Bench of the High Court of Justice. The Court of Exchequer was to become the Exchequer Division, and the Court of Common Pleas the Common Pleas Division of the High Court of Justice. The Common Law Judges admitted, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General himself also admitted, that they would sit to administer a kind of justice to which they had not been trained. They would sit by themselves, and would not be able to deal with the various equitable questions which would constantly arise. The 31st section, indeed, said that it should be lawful to transfer a Judge from one Division to another, with this proviso, however, that no existing Judge should be transferred unless with his own consent. That being so, it would be impossible to work the Act as it stood unless they could find Chancery Judges willing to be transferred to Common Law Courts. But the arrears in Chancery already had become so great that the Judges, though working night and day, could not keep them down. He held in his hand an extract from the judicial statistics of the years 1860-1 and 1870-1 published last year by Order of the House, and he found that the proceedings in Chambers had risen from 28,083 in 1861, to 42,726 in 1870-71, showing an increase of 14,643 in 10 years, and that the total number of proceedings of all kinds in Equity had risen from 69,008 in 1861 to 84,730 in 1870, showing an increase of 15,722. It would be a long time, therefore, before the Judges in Chancery could find leisure to assist the Common Law Judges even if they were willing to do so. Under the Bill, moreover, they might have an Appeal Court composed exclusively of three Common Law Judges reversing the decision of the whole Chancery Division put together. But then it was said, there would always be a strong Bar to keep the Judges right—that was, incompetent Judges were to be set right by competent Counsel. For his own part he held it to be a first principle that the Bench should be stronger than the Bar. He might be asked what remedy he would propose. It always seemed to him that the true method of fusion would be to make every Court competent to deal with every case which could come before it. The scheme, however, would involve a complete remodelling of the Bill, for which he was not prepared. Perhaps the best course would be to transfer to each Common Law Division one of the present Equity Judges; but that could not be done without the sanction of the Equity Judges themselves. The alternative was the creation of new Judges; and to that the only real objection was a financial one. The Government had actually thrown away £300,000 by allowing the space purchased for the Law Courts nine years ago to remain vacant all that time, and yet they grudged the small sum necessary for the creation of a sufficient number of Judges to administer Equity properly, and that only for a limited time. If ever there was a case of "spoiling the ship for a ha'penny's worth of tar" it was the present. What with concessions to sentiment and concessions to economy, they were throwing away one of the grandest opportunities of reconstructing the whole of our judicial system. They felt themselves bound to build up their edifice with the old materials; let them take care they did not build it up on the old lines. If the Bill was left as it now stood the result would be that the Courts of Equity would be Courts of Equity still in everything but the name; the Courts of Law would be Courts of Law still in everything but name, with this distinction, that the old remedy by injunction—awkward, clumsy, and unsatisfactory, no doubt but which yet in the end secured justice—would be done away, so that their last state would be worse than the first, and this boasted fusion of Law and Equity which was to inaugurate a new era in the history of our jurisprudence would turn out to be a mere hocus-pocus transformation scene effected by a vague section in an Act of Parliament.

MR. GREGORY, who had on the Notice Paper a Motion for referring the Bill to a Select Committee, in the event of its being read a second time, said, he concurred in the main principles of the measure, and was anxious that it should receive the assent of Parliament; but, at the same time, he wished its objects properly carried out, and particularly that the Bill should contain nothing to militate against them. He looked at the Bill under three aspects—first, as establishing a great tribunal of First Instance; secondly, as establishing a Court of Appeal for that tribunal; and, thirdly, as laying down a code of procedure. With respect to the constitution of the Higher Court, he regretted that the author of the Bill had not taken somewhat higher ground in constituting that Court, and that he had not broken up the Court into more Divisions, allotting a smaller number of Judges to each, and mixing Equity and Common Law Judges together. It had been said that each of the Courts would have the power of administering the principles of Law and Equity; but a distinction was drawn between the business assigned to these Courts, and there would be three Divisions of the Court of First Instance sitting almost entirely distinct from the other, and without any communication between them. With respect to the procedure of these Courts, he thought some explanation was required of the Law Officers of the Crown. A Common Law Judge sitting at Nisi Prius was in the habit of postponing, to a certain extent, his decisions on questions of law and referring them to the decision of the full Court, and thus practically rendering two trials necessary; while the Equity Judges had been accustomed, single-handed to determine satisfactorily questions both of law and fact as they arose. Now, he saw nothing in the Bill to alter the former practice, while it contained a provision calculated to extend it to the Court of Chancery, which had hitherto performed its functions in a satisfactory manner, for the Bill gave an invitation to the Judges to call for the assistance of a Divisional Court in the decision of cases, instead of relying on their own judgment. The effect would be to perpetuate a practice which now prevailed at law and to extend it to the Court of Chancery. That was a part of the Bill which would require much consideration. Another matter which, he hoped, would not be hastily adopted, was the power given by the Bill to the Judges to refer cases to referees without the assent of the parties. The terms of reference were of the widest character, and would apply to some of the heaviest and most important cases which were now decided by the Courts of Law. They were not told who the referees were to be, how they were to be paid, or whether the appointment was to be temporary or permanent. These were matters as to which the House ought to have further information. It was a very large power, and in many cases it would materially increase the expenses of the suitors; and beyond that, there was no more general complaint at present in the Courts of Common Law than the sending of cases to reference. It was often a very great hardship to parties, as after they had gone to all the expense of preparing for trial they found themselves compelled to incur all the expense over again. No doubt much of the business of the Court of Chancery was conducted in Chambers, and with regard to these proceedings it appeared that during the last year no less than 75,000 appointments were made; but without meaning to cast any imputation upon the officials who sat there, and who performed their duties in an admirable manner, he must say that it was the feeling of the profession that the Judges should exercise more superintendence over the business at Chambers than they did at present. This was a totally different matter, however, from the references now proposed, as under the Bill as it stood, the Courts were to have power to refer cases to the functionaries to be appointed, and whether temporarily or permanently did not appear, upon what terms they thought fit, with or without the consent of the parties. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL: Such a power exists at present.] No doubt, that was so; but only in matters of account, and the reference was to officers of the Court. If the parties were aggrieved by the decision of the Masters of the Court or the clerks of the Judges, there was an instant resort to the Judges themselves for a revision of the order. One other provision of the Bill was of such importance that it ought not to be passed over without notice—namely, that which would enact that where two vessels were in collision and each was found to be in fault, the Common Law rule, and not the rule of the Court of Admiralty, should prevail. The Common Law rule was, that no damages could be recovered by either vessel in such a case; whereas, in the Court of Admiralty, when two vessels were in collision, and both were found to be in fault, the damages were divided, the owners of one ship paying to the owners of the other one-half the amount of the damages sustained. The rule of the Admiralty Court was the common law of Europe, and was also the rule of the Admiralty Court of America; but that would be set aside by the Bill, and that was a matter which deserved the serious consideration of all persons connected with the shipping interest, for the effect of the alteration would be to tempt the stronger ship to run any risk of avoiding injury to itself, even to the extent of sending the weaker vessel to the bottom. He now came to the Court of Appeal. He should be glad if the jurisdiction of the House of Lords as the highest Court of Appeal could be preserved; but inasmuch as the House of Lords themselves had given that point up, he did not see how it could be maintained. And even if that jurisdiction were to be maintained, great alterations would be required in the tribunal itself. It was necessary for the formation of an efficient Court of Appeal not only that it should consist of a number of the most eminent Judges, but that those Judges should be always available. He had some doubts, however, as to the operation of the Court of Appeal which the Bill would provide. The tendency of the ex officio Judges would be, he was afraid, not to sit upon it. Now, a final Court of Appeal had not only to decide the cases which came before it, but to lay down great principles, and establish landmarks, and he was of opinion that there should be one such great Court, to which everybody might ultimately resort. It might be contended that it would be overwhelmed by business; but that would not be so if there were an intermediate Court of Appeal, and he did not think that a final Court of Appeal should have the power of subdividing itself. A short time ago he had moved for a Return of the appeals which had gone to the House of Lords, and out of 425 appeals to the Lord Justices and Lord Chancellor only 35 went ultimately to the House of Lords, showing that a very small number of cases would go to the ultimate tribunal if there was an intermediate Court of Appeal. If provision could be made for the establishment of such an intermediate

Court of Appeal—though, as the Bill was drawn, that would be a matter of some difficulty—it should be introduced before proceeding further with the measure. Again, the objection might be urged that a system of that kind was likely to result in great hardship, by leading people to prolong their resistance; but from his experience in the matter of appeals, he could say that it was not the wealthy who had good professional advice, and who had a reputation to lose, who carried their cases to the ultimate Court without sufficient cause, but rather those desperate litigants who had nothing to lose. Coming next to the proposed code of procedure, he thought it would require very considerable attention before it was passed. He could not help thinking that the trace of the Common Law hand was too plainly written in the Schedule of procedure, because the tendency was to substitute that which prevailed in the Common Law Courts for that which prevailed in the Court of Chancery. The Chancery procedure gave great satisfaction to suitors and practitioners, the statements being eminently precise and clear; and he could not understand whether the pleadings in the new Court were to be such as were required in Common Law, or such as were required in the Court of Chancery. Nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the pleadings in the Courts of Common Law, and it would be a most unfortunate thing if this Bill were to extend them to the Court of Chancery. He next came to the question of referring the Bill to a Select Committee, and in advocating that course he could assure the House he was not at all anxious to delay its passing. He maintained that it was not a Bill for a Committee of the Whole House, but for a Select Committee. Many Amendments would no doubt appear on the Paper, but others might be proposed without notice or due consideration; and if they were adopted hastily great injury would be done to the promoters of the Bill, and an irreparable injury might be inflicted upon the suitors. A Committee upstairs, on the other hand, might have the assistance of the Government draftsman, in carrying out its views and in framing the Amendments required to carry out their views, and the Amendments could be submitted for the revision and consideration of the Lord Chancellor himself.

Mr. Gregory

MR. JAMES said, that those who had to frame and introduce a measure of legal reform had sometimes to contend with the personal jealousy of Law Reformers, and sometimes with members of the legal profession, who might think that their interests would be affected by any change in the existing system; but the public, which often wanted Law Reform, seldom demanded it, and it was the duty of the House to see what the public would require, if they had the knowledge and the means of expressing an opinion. The first ground of complaint which the Bill was designed to remedy was the uncertainty of the law. The next was the delay which existed in obtaining justice from the tribunals. The third, which resulted from the joint operation of the former, was the expense to which the suitor was subjected. The present Bill did little to cure the first of these evils, and, with the exception of the legislation contained in the 22nd clause, the countless precedents with which the law abounded would remain, until the day arrived when they might hope to see the work of codification accomplished. With regard, however, to the second and third causes of complaint, the Bill went straight to the principal sources of delay and expense, and provided a remedy. In deciding whether the Bill ought not to be read a second time, let the House see what it proposed to do. It proposed that they should diminish the number of appellate tribunals, and that, instead of having two bad appellate Courts, they should unite the strength of both to make a good one. With regard to the retention of its appellate jurisdiction the House of Lords had judged itself. With men in that House who were naturally prone to defend its privileges and ancient traditions, the House of Lords had decided, almost without any difference of opinion, that the time had come when it had ceased adequately to discharge the duty of an appellate tribunal in the last resort. Nor was it surprising that such should be the case, when they considered how the tribunal was constituted during the hearing of appeals. When English appeals from the Common Law Judges came before it, the Law Lords had the assistance of only one English Peer, who had practised at Common Law, yet who had never himself been a Common Law Judge. The consequence was, that the Peers had to summon to their assistance the very Judges from whom the appeal was brought. These Judges had already expressed their opinions, and counsel calculated how they would decide, just as the hon. Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Glyn) reckoned up the numbers on each side when a Select Committee was appointed. The present Bill, however, declared that every Judge who sat in an appellate tribunal should be free from bias of this kind. At present it rested with the Members of the appellate tribunal in the House of Lords to attend or not at their pleasure or convenience. One Peer might wish to spend the winter abroad, and another might prefer yachting to sitting on appeals in the House of Lords. The Bill had, therefore, passed without much discussion on the part of those who did not wish to retain their present power. The Bill was formed so as to secure a saving in point of time to suitors. There would not be three steps, but two, to be taken before arriving at a decision. One of the causes of delay and expense was the want of judicial strength. It would be found, however, that, by economizing the existing strength, the object could be obtained without adding to the number of the Judicial Bench. There could be no doubt that the delay was caused by the want of judicial power. A merchant in the City of London might have a cause which in a month would be ready for trial. The probability was that 12 months would elapse before it was reached, another year before the appeal to the Exchequer Chamber could be disposed of, and one, two, or three years before a decision could be obtained in the House of Lords. An interval of four or five years might thus elapse before a cause was determined in the Final Court of Appeal. Contrast this delay with the proceedings in the Admiralty Court. A collision between two vessels occurred either in the river or the Channel on the 19th of February last. There was an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and before the end of April—namely, in less than three months—the cause had been heard and finally determined. The contrast was owing to the fact that the cause had to go before one appellate Court instead of two, that there was sufficient judicial strength in both Courts, and that the Judges were not overworked. The object of the Bill was to economize the judicial power, so that the suitor could at once proceed to obtain a decision. One objection might be made—that this would involve extra judicial power. Inasmuch, however, as “thrift was great revenue,” so an economy of judicial power really meant an increase of judicial strength. Therefore, while he gave his hearty support to the Bill, he thought that by a stroke of the pen they could add to the judicial power by a better economy of it. The 15 Common Law Judges were now divided into three sections—the Queen’s Bench, the Common Pleas, and the Exchequer—the existence of which Courts was an anomaly except in their very origin. Instead of putting these 15 Judges into one Court, the Bill proposed to maintain the three Divisions, and a loss of judicial power would be the result. At present a motion for a new trial was argued, and being unfinished it was put off to allow of the intervention of other business; and in that way delay and expense were unnecessarily caused. The maintenance of the existing three Courts was a concession to sentiment only, so as to preserve the dignity of the Chief Justices and the Chief Baron—an object which he should be perfectly ready to attain in some other way; but still in re-arranging the Temple of Justice he thought some regard ought to be paid to the convenience and interests of the worshippers as well as of the priests. If the divisions between these Courts were done away with, they could have one Court sitting for new trials, another for the Crown Paper, and so on, so that there would be no break in the hearing of individual cases. In that way, he believed that without having additional Judges, they would obtain an increase by one-third of their judicial strength. The Bill had also, in his opinion, a tendency to go a little too far in the way of abolishing trial by jury, for under the 30th rule in the Schedule it depended solely on the will of the Judge whether he would remit a case to a jury or try it himself. Of course, that was only a point of detail; but he hoped it would hereafter receive the careful consideration it deserved. Although, at first, he had thought the better course would be to refer this measure to a Select Committee, he had since altered that opinion. At that time of the year some legal

Members of the House would, perhaps, be unwilling to give up their time and relinquish professional engagements in order to sit on the Committee; and even if they did, the Bill would be sent back to the House at a period when every Member of the Common Law Bar would be absent on circuit. Under the circumstances, therefore, he thought the House ought now to make an attempt to carry the measure in its entirety, subject to alterations in Committee. Without regarding the Bill as a complete one, he accepted it, because it went in the right direction. Any omissions in the Bill might be to a great extent supplied by the rules and regulations to be framed by the Judges, who would be subject to the vigilant criticism of the profession, the Press, and the public; moreover, these rules would not come into effect until they had been sanctioned by Parliament. He should support the Bill, not because it entirely remedied the defects in our judicial system, but because it marked out a path that would lead us eventually to the fountain of justice, which, when the impurities were removed from it, would allow the pure stream of justice to flow for the benefit of all classes in the community.

Mr. MATTHEWS said, the fact of the debate having been carried on in a very thin House was not encouraging to the friends of Law Reform, for though the Bill was one which vitally affected the interest of every subject of the Queen who had to go into a Court of Law, the debate upon it had been addressed to only 12 or 20 hon. Members. They were, however, all agreed that the Bill should be read a second time, and the only question was, what Amendments should be introduced into it, and whether its provisions should be referred to the consideration of a Select Committee. His own impression was, that such a measure could be much better discussed and amended in a Select Committee of lawyers, than in a mixed Assembly like the House itself, for it wanted that minute and acute criticism which members of the legal profession alone could give, and which, however eminent the noble and learned Lords (the Lord Chancellor and Lord Cairns) might be, neither of them unaided could possibly supply. In point of fact, the Bill ought to be submitted to the criticism of the whole profession, both barristers and solicitors, for months before it came to be finally dealt with by Parliament. From such examination as he had been able to give to the Bill, he could not gather that any essential change was made in the Court of Chancery. The principles and jurisdiction of that Court appeared to be left untouched. Why, in the world, then, did the Bill deal with the Court of Chancery at all? What he feared it would do, would be to make Courts of Common Law bad Courts of Equity. No doubt, if you were to have the principles of Law and Equity concurrently and jointly administered by all our Courts, as everybody desired, there must for a time be bad Courts of Equity. He was prepared to face that danger; but could not the object desired be attained by striking the Court of Chancery out of the Bill? It would then have been a less ambitious, but a more prudent and a safer measure. The advantage of throwing all the Courts into one crucible might be to obtain an easy interchange of judicial force. But you might secure that advantage equally by a single clause in the Bill, providing where necessary for the presence of an Equity Judge as Assessor. There was one great disadvantage in the arrangement proposed—that the whole body of Judges would be placed in one Court under the presidency of a Member of the Executive Government and a Minister, the Lord Chancellor for the time being, instead of under the Lord Chief Justice. He had not attempted to follow out the consequences of that step, but feared it might seriously compromise the independence of our Judges. As to the proposed abolition of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, he had never heard a great constitutional change proposed with such extraordinary levity. No responsible Commission or Committee had recommended the abolition of those functions, and in his opinion it was unwise to commit the whole appellate jurisdiction of the country to a new tribunal of the working of which we had no experience, doing away with an old landmark of the Constitution. No doubt, theoretical objections might be made to the appellate jurisdiction of the other House, and some practical objections on the score of delay and expense might also be urged; but some of these objections might be removed by a Standing Order. Not only had there been no recommendation that the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords should be abolished, but the very last Committee which sat on the subject in 1872 had reported that the present state of its appellate business was satisfactory. Scotch Law Officers from both sides gave evidence before that very Committee, that in Scotland the suitors were perfectly satisfied with the justice administered by the House of Lords, and preferred that appeal to any other, while similar testimony came from Ireland. Any attempt, therefore, to send appeals from Ireland to a Court in Westminster Hall would, he thought, supply fresh fuel to the Home Rule agitation. Were they going to have three different and equally irresponsible Courts of Ultimate Appeal in the United Kingdom—the House of Lords laying down one law for Scotland and Ireland; the new Court laying down a second law for England; and the Privy Council, in ecclesiastical causes, laying down a third law? Besides, the constitution of the new Final Court of Appeal, as contained in the Bill, was otherwise mischievous. It constituted a Court of Final Appeal from the ex officio Judges, ordinary Judges, and additional Judges, and as the ex officio Judges would receive no additional pay for the extra work thrown upon them, it would follow that they would be driven away by the paid Judges, for the Bill did not compel their attendance. In that Court of Appeal, they were putting ex officio unpaid Members alongside paid Members. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL: The ex officio Judges are to be paid.] Where, in the Bill, was it stated that the Lord Chief Justice of England was to be paid extra for attending the Court of Appeal? [The SOLICITOR GENERAL: Not extra.] But the work was extra. The Lord Chief Justice presiding over his own Court at a certain salary would still be continued at the head of his own Court or Division at that salary, and he might if he liked—there were no compulsory words—and when he had leisure, attend the Court of Appeal. Therefore, he was an unpaid Judge as far as related to the Court of Appeal. The Solicitor General, therefore, did not appear to have devoted any special attention to the provisions of the Bill. Those who had been, as he thought, disparagingly described by the hon. Member for Denbighshire, as inmates of the Greenwich Hospital of the law, were the additional Members, and they were also to go without salaries. For his part, he had always thought the House of Lords, in the persons of Lord Selborne, Lord Hatherley, Lord Cairns, and Lord Westbury, had not represented the invalids of the profession, but rather the most eminent members of it. But such as they were, these "invalids" were put into the Court of Appeal. Now, it was proposed that any three might form a quorum. The inevitable effect of that would be that they would have three distinct Courts of Appeal, an Equity Court of Appeal, a Common Law Court of Appeal, and a Colonial Court of Appeal. They would not get an united Court of Appeal, but three co-ordinate systems of law would ultimately be decided in the last resort each by a Court of three. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had made merry over the House of Lords, where there happened to be only one Common Law Lord; but that might be easily remedied by the Prime Minister removing that hon. and learned Gentleman from those (the Ministerial) benches to a position where he could render even greater services to the country than he did now. Let the ready critics tell them, if they could, into what quagmire the House of Lords, with its so-called "Greenwich Hospital Judges," had carried the law, and point out where it had led the law astray. The House of Lords appeared to him to bring to the decision of those questions just what was wanted to correct the technicalities of the law; a statesmanlike wisdom and the larger-mindedness of men of the world. Then they had been able to lead the law into a direction in which it was beneficial and desirable it should go, and before they cut away its judicial power, they should see their way clearly to establish a more satisfactory tribunal. The proposed system of official referees he looked upon with the greatest dread and dislike. That system came in effect to this—that they were creating a subordinate order of Judges, to be paid by salary, to be part of the patronage of the Lord Chancellor—a matter of grave consideration—whose number and qualifications were left absolutely open by the Bill, against whose decision there was to be no appeal, who were to be judges of both law and fact, to whom there was hardly any case which might not be referred by a Judge, whether from indolence or some of the many other motives that actuated even serene judicial minds; and who were to have power to sit in town or country; so that an official referee might take a journey in the hot weather to Brighton, whither the witnesses would have to follow him. They took no security except appointment by the Lord Chancellor that they would be fit for the discharge of their functions. Thus, too, by a side wind they were sweeping away the whole system of arbitrations by order at Nisi Prius, and substituting that fresh class of officials at great cost to the country—an arrangement which, he believed, would not be satisfactory to the public. The Bill would also give the control of all the interlocutory steps up to notice of trial to 50 or 60 district registrars, some of whom were not lawyers. That was as bad a scheme as could be devised, for it was localizing that which was best done in London by agents who conducted the business in the cheapest and promptest way, and the remission of nice questions of law to the registrars would lead to diversity of judgment and failure of justice. From them, moreover, as far as he could understand the sketchy drawing of the Bill—for it was a skeleton with clothes on—there would be no appeal. He was sure the Lord Chancellor, though he had drawn the Bill, had not drawn the Schedule, for it made the most momentous changes in a flighty way without saying what statutes it repealed. It laid down, for instance, that costs should in all cases be in the discretion of the Court—a bungling way of setting aside a dozen statutes which deprived the Court of discretion over costs, and awarded or withheld costs according to the issue of the case, and the amount of the verdict—and that all existing rules as to pleading should be superseded by the not very intelligible ones contained in the Bill. On another point, moreover, as to the question of costs, which, though an unromantic one, was of vital interest to suitors, the clauses and the Schedule were in actual conflict, for the former provided that a section of the County Courts Act of 1867 as to costs in certain cases should apply to all proceedings, whereas the latter laid down the absolute rule he had mentioned. It was impossible for the House at that time to give the Bill the careful revision it required. One course would be to take the Bill on the responsibility of Lord Selborne and Lord Cairns, but unless the House were thus to abdicate its functions, the best plan would be to let the Bill lie fallow for the winter, so that the opinions of the profession might be collected. The solicitors, for instance, might throw more light on the measure than a Chancellor, ex-Chancellor, or Greenwich pensioner could do, and if that course were adopted, they might, next Session, be in a position to pass a Bill which would do credit to the House and be of advantage to the country.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he would not take the trouble to contradict the assertion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Matthews)—who always showed such confidence in addressing either the House or the Courts—that he had not made himself acquainted with the provisions of the Bill. He must, however, correct the hon. and learned Gentleman's statement that the Judicature Commission recommended the continuance of the House of Lords as an appellate tribunal. [Mr. MATTHEWS: Pro tempore.] The reason why the Commission did not recommend the abolition of the House of Lords [Laughter]—he meant its abolition as a judicial tribunal, for the subject under discussion was limited to this—was that they regarded the question as beyond the scope of their reference, and they therefore simply mentioned that the efficiency of the Court of Chancery was impaired by the withdrawal therefrom of the Lord Chancellor for appeals in the House of Lords. They were told that, if they withdrew from the House of Lords the judicial appeals they would injure its dignity and standing. Was the House of Lords so weak that it could not stand as a Legislative Assembly, if they did not allow three respectable retired Lord Chancellors to adjudicate on appeals? Was not the House of Lords the best judge of its own dignity, and had it not sent down the Bill to that House? Were his hon. and learned Friends opposite the conservators and protectors of the dignity of the House of Lords? Then it was said that the House of Lords was wonderfully efficient as a Court of Appeal. It was true that some persons whose opinions were entitled to considerable weight had said so in 1856, but that was a very long time ago. We had grown wiser since then, and some of those who had held that opinion then had come to look at the matter in a different light now. Since that time we had discovered that the main object of a legal tribunal was to do justice, not by fits and starts, and by means of Judges who were continually changing, but by Judges sitting regularly, who were paid for their services by the State, and who would attend the whole year round with the exception of during the needful vacations. At the present moment, we had no absolute claim upon the attendance of any Law Lord except the Lord Chancellor. It had happened of late years that there had been a fair attendance of Law Lords; but within the present century no Law Lords whatever had attended, and appeals had been heard and decided by three lay Lords, assisted by a subordinate Judge acting in the capacity of Assessor, while for a considerable time only one Law Lord had attended on such occasions. Although, for the present, such a state of things no longer existed, it might recur to-morrow. Most of our present Law Lords were very aged men—one was over 80 years of age, and two were in their 80th year. It was impossible to calculate upon the continued attendance of octogenarians. They had done good service to their country, but there was no reason for our counting upon their continued attendance; and when these Law Lords were cleared away—when these aged individuals retired, what guarantee had we that fresh Judges would take their place, and that there would be more than one or two Law Lords to assist the Lord Chancellor. People talked of the House of Lords as if it were a permanent legal tribunal; but the fact was, that it was not a law tribunal at all, and it was a mere accident that it had a sufficient number of Peers competent to act as Judges in it at the present moment. It was also quite possible that some of the Law Lords might receive offers from Insurance Companies in course of liquidation to act as private arbitrators, and that they might think it consistent with their dignity to accept the office and not to attend any more as Judges in the High Court of Appeal. Such things had occurred and might occur again, and then what would become of the House of Lords as the highest Court of Appeal in the country? In his opinion, that was not the proper appellate tribunal for a great country like this. The question before the House, then, was how were they to create a good fixed appeal tribunal in place of the chance tribunal that at present existed? If the Bill did no more than create such a tribunal the country ought to be grateful to Parliament for passing it into law, and it would prove to be a very large measure of reform indeed. The Bill proposed to establish such a tribunal and to get rid of the Court of intermediate appeal. Moreover, the strongest proof of the desirability, necessity, and utility of the abolition of the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal consisted in the simple fact, that every lawyer in that House had assented to that provision in the Bill; and that the only noble Lord who opposed it, though he inherited a legal name, whatever his other titles to distinction, was not distinguished by legal eminence. In reference to the portion of the Bill which dealt with the fusion of Law and Equity, it provided that wherever the mode in which justice was administered substantially differed as between the Courts of Law and the Courts of Equity, the principles which governed the Courts of Equity should prevail. The hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Matthews) had pointed to the 63rd section of the Bill relating to the County Courts as being inconsistent with the provisions in the schedule as to costs, and as an instance of bungling legislation; but if he had carefully studied the details of the measure, he would have found that the provisions in the 63rd section relating to those Courts were not inconsistent, but according to the general rules of interpretation would be read as exceptions to the general provision as to costs in the schedule. The next thing to which his hon. and learned Friend referred was the official referees. He was entirely mistaken on the subject. He said there was no appeal against their report. If he had referred to the Bill he would have found that the referee was to report to the Judge, who would thereupon make any order he might think fit, and that until the Court adopted the report the report was nothing. The present Bill required that matters requiring special knowledge should be specially referred; accounts, for instance, to accountants; matters of science to scientific men, so that the Judge might obtain the assistance of the referees, and the Court could then adopt the report or any part of it. Another objection was, that it would create a judicial tribunal to be presided over by the Lord Chancellor, who was a Cabinet Minister; but the Lord Chancellor presided over a judicial tribunal already, and no objection had ever been made to his doing so on account of his holding a Cabinet office. They were also told that the Court of Chancery was not in the Bill at all, and that all the Bill did, was to make the Common Law Courts bad Chancery Courts. Did the hon. and learned Gentleman know that appeals to the Lord Chancellor were taken away by this Bill? Besides, the Bill made important alterations in the whole course of legal proceedings. A certain portion of the substantive law was altered by the Bill, and, amongst others, the case referred to by the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Bourke)—namely, the case of insolvent estates. As to that matter, it was thought, after the best consideration, that the Rules which were acted upon in the Court of Bankruptcy with reference to the administration of insolvents' estates should be acted upon in the Court of Chancery. With regard to the district registrars, it had been found by experience gained in Lancashire, that a very large quantity of work might be done cheaply and quickly on the spot in the country by persons who understood the subject, instead of having it inquired into in London at great expense and with great delay. Many of the points that had been mentioned could be better discussed in Committee, and as to the expediency of referring the Bill to a Select Committee, he doubted whether anything would be gained by such a course. His own opinion was that if it were so referred, the minority would not acquiesce in the opinion of the majority, and would fight over again in a Committee of the Whole House, all the points on which they had been at issue. Beyond that, every lawyer who had not been put on the Committee would feel himself almost personally insulted, and would feel it to be his duty to give Notice of a great number of Amendments, and to make a great number of speeches on the Bill, and in that way the Bill would be thrown over for the Session. It was also doubtful whether the Report of the Committee would come down in time for any effectual legislation that Session; but even if it came down at the middle of July, it would be said that all the Common Law Members were on Circuit, and that in their absence the Bill could not be discussed. He did not pretend that the measure was perfect; but if it even presented a fair basis for our future legal procedure and judicial organization, it was a great pity that the Session should pass without this great legal reform. If a very much longer time could be given to elaborate the details, the Bill might have been made more perfect and workable to a greater extent without the aid of general rules to be hereafter made; but he hoped the House would take it with such modifications as might be made in Committee, and pass it into law without further loss of time.

DR. BALL rose to address the House, but

MR. GLADSTONE, interposing, said, that as it would be impossible to finish the discussion that night (it being half-past 11 o'clock), he would move the adjournment of the debate, to enable the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring forward his Motion relative to the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar Mail Contracts.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. DISRAELI asked when the debate would be resumed.

MR. GLADSTONE said, tomorrow, at 10 o'clock.

MR. DISRAELI said he asked the question for the convenience of some Members, whose last votes upon the subject were given in the affirmative.

MR. GLADSTONE WILLIAMS said that the Government were of opinion that the Bill would be passed in the affirmative.

portunity to legal Members of the House to discuss the measure.

MR. HOLKER said, it would prevent many hon. Members of the Common Law Bar speaking on the Bill if the debate was resumed so early. It would be impossible to discuss the Bill so fully and so satisfactorily if legal gentlemen had not an opportunity of hearing the discussion.

MR. LOPES also urged that the discussion should not be resumed to-morrow.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that all hon. Members of the House who were members of the legal profession would not necessarily be absent till four o'clock, or be engaged up to that hour elsewhere.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he thought the Rating Bills were fixed for to-morrow.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, so they are.

MR. SPENCER WALFORD said, that was the most important Bill of the Session. The Bill proposed to make great changes, which he was disposed, as at present advised, to support. It was necessary it should be thoroughly discussed, and he ventured to submit that time would not be lost by adjourning the debate till Thursday next.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday next.

THE CHIEF CLERK OF THE POST OFFICE.

with the House of Commons, who had power to reject them. The effect of the matter coming into the hands of the House, instead of those of the Government, would raise a tendency to produce that, which was condemned in other countries—the personal solicitation of Members in the lobbies, which he should be sorry to see adopted in this country; and, further, the fact of the Government not having power to make a binding contract would tend to increase very much the expense, because persons who entered into contracts with the Government, not knowing whether the House of Commons would accept them or not, would naturally exact higher terms than if left in the hands of the Government. The House were, therefore, now asked to come to an important decision. Of course, if the Government were guilty of misconduct, or acted with unfairness, or from a sinister motive, a contract should be set aside; but the House should not stop there, but should set aside the Government as well as the contract. Having made these prefatory remarks, he would now pass to the facts of the case. During 1870-1 the attention of the Government was much drawn to the question of the East African Slave Trade, which was then in a flourishing and not decreasing condition, and the Government came to the conclusion, that the best way to put down that traffic was not by armed force, but by more pacific means. Accordingly, they had been at considerable expense in putting it down, and had spent within five years upwards of £250,000 in the attempt to do so. As cruisers were the only available means of putting it down, a Committee of the House had recommended a large increase of our armed force; but the Government were of opinion that it would be better to adopt more simple measures; that the great antidote to the slave trade was to let in light upon the transaction, and that a still more effectual rival to the slave trade was the introduction of trade and commerce. With that view, the Government considered it desirable to establish a line of steamers from Aden to Zanzibar, and another from Zanzibar to the Cape of Good Hope. In the latter part of 1871, he made inquiries as to the terms on which that could be done, and was informed that two Companies would be willing to undertake the service. The enterprise was one of considerable hazard, the route having been badly surveyed; and he thought the survey of this line was likely to give more benefit than that by any expedition to the North Pole. The Government took time to consider the matter, and to ascertain what contributions could be obtained from India and other parties interested in the matter. They eventually received proposals from the British India Steam Packet Company and the Union Steam Packet Company, which offered to reduce the number of days' passage from 37 to 30, on consideration of their contract being extended by the term of three and a half years. Eventually, the Government agreed to give the British India Steam Company £10,000 for the service from Aden to Zanzibar, instead of their original proposal of £11,000; while, with regard to the Union Company it was agreed that if they reduced the length of the journey between England and the Cape from 37 to 30 days they would have an extension of their contract for three and a-half years in addition to the four and a-half years it had to run at £26,000 a-year instead of £29,000 and £15,000, for carrying the mails between Zanzibar and the Cape. The request that the service should be fortnightly and only 30 days in length had been complied with, and the wishes of the Cape Colony had been so far satisfied. But the Government had been charged with favouring monopolies and refusing to put the contract up to open competition. That, however, could not be done, because the Cape Company's contract was unexpired, and he held in his hand a letter from Mr. Hamilton, one of the directors of the Company, detailing an interview with Mr. Donald Currie, representing the competing line, in the course of which he proposed a combination to raise the freights and fares on the plea of the rise in the price of coal, and divide the traffic. Failing in that endeavour, an agitation was commenced against the Cape Line. The House had been deluged with letters from the agent of Mr. Currie, a Mr. Soper, and he held in his hand one, dated the 7th of June, to which he wished to call particular attention, as it showed the kind of statements which were made on this subject. That gentleman stated, among other things, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had extended the contract for eight years, although it had three and a-half years to run; but the fact was, as he had shown, the contract was extended only for three and a-half years, and it had been made professedly and avowedly to put down the slave trade. Well, in the beginning of the year, in accordance with that contract, the Union Steamship Company had gone to considerable expense in laying down several large ships, and they actually commenced running on the Line between Aden and Zanzibar. It was urged that that Line should not have been brought into operation until the opinion of the House had been taken on the subject. As to the Cape line, no harm had been done, because the House would not be asked to confirm the contract; but as to the line between the Cape and Zanzibar, it appeared very desirable for the suppression of the slave trade, judging from the disclosures made on the subject, by Dr. Livingstone, Mr. Stanley, and the expedition of Sir Bartle Frere, to bring the contract into operation at once; and he had no doubt that the House would agree with the view which the Government took of this matter. Though the Government felt obliged to abandon the line to the Cape they had not the least intention of abandoning the Zanzibar contract. The Company had acted with a great deal of public spirit in undertaking an enterprise exceedingly difficult and perfectly novel, in which nothing was certain except that their loss must be heavy in consequence of the absence of passengers and commerce. The House would not have approved the action of the Government, if it fell back on the technical defence, and said that these two contracts were contained in two different pieces of paper; and, therefore, though they did not choose to ask the House to confirm the contract between England and the Cape, they require still the Company to adhere to the very low terms they had accepted for the contract between the Cape and Zanzibar. No Government could do such a thing, and they re-opened the contract with the full consent of the Post Office. On the 22nd of November, 1871, before any proposal was made of the service between England and the Cape, the Company offered to perform the service between the Cape and Zanzibar for £29,000. The Government obtained a reduction to £26,000, which was about

8s. a-mile, or nearly the same rate as the Peninsular and Oriental ran at where there was a large commerce and many passengers. If the Government pressed the matter, they might perhaps have got the Company to accept lower terms; but the House would see that in acting as they had done, the Government were only supporting the honour and good faith of the country. The question remained for the House whether they would confirm the contract or not, and he could not allow himself to doubt, after the full statement which he had made, that every consideration of justice and policy would lead them to do it. In conclusion, he would beg to move that the contract be approved.

Motion made and Question proposed,
 "That the Contract for the conveyance of Mails between the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar with the Union Steam Ship Company be approved."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. HOLMS*: I should have been glad, Sir, if it had not fallen to my lot to oppose the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman. I have done all that lay in my power to warn the right hon. Gentleman against the presentation to this House of the contract now under discussion in its present form. There are occasions, Sir, in the life of every right thinking man when a great conflict arises within him between charity and duty, and this to me is one of those occasions. I have had such a conflict with respect to the course which I should pursue as to this Motion, and I have decided that it is my duty, not only to the public, but also to this House and to myself, knowing the facts of this case as I do, unhesitatingly to place them before you. I may perhaps require to ask some indulgence from the House, because apart from the remarkable circumstances connected with the negotiations which have taken place in relation to this contract, it involves two important principles. Should the House of Commons affirm this contract, then it will sanction the principle that such contracts may be concluded by private arrangement, and without being submitted to public competition. It will also approve this other principle—namely, that such contracts may be made without consultation with our Colonies, who are even more immediately and directly interested in such a bargain than the Home Government. I wish here to say that, as I must, when relating in detail the facts connected with this contract, refer frequently to the Union Steamship Company, which for a long series of years has carried the mails between Southampton and the Cape of Good Hope, I desire at once to state that that Company, I believe has fulfilled its duties in relation to past and existing contracts in a most satisfactory manner, and I believe also that it is a Company which is very much respected in the Cape Colony; and for myself I would add that having carefully investigated their various transactions with the Government, I can come to no other conclusion than that its directors are worthy of great praise for their business-like capacity. Indeed, I only wish that something more of this quality had been exhibited on the part of those who have negotiated these several bargains with them on the part of the State. I also desire at this point to say that I cannot, and do not, regard the blunder of a Department in a matter of this kind as an error to be charged against Her Majesty's Government generally, nor do I think that when one undertakes to make statements such as I shall have to make before I sit down, they should be made otherwise than in the most frank and direct manner, so that those who ought really to bear the blame may have it fairly brought home to them, and have an opportunity of pointing out any errors—should any such appear in these statements.

Now, Sir, the reason I have for opposing this contract, apart from the fact that it has been entered into by private arrangement and not by public competition, is that it proposes to increase the subsidy by £11,000 a-year beyond the sum agreed upon to be paid for the same services under the contract, dated the 19th of December last, which it has displaced, and by which the Union Steamship Company were to have had £15,000 a-year for carrying the mails between Zanzibar and the Cape of Good Hope. By the one now under discussion, it is proposed to give them a subsidy of £26,000. The reason assigned for this addition is that owing to the dissatisfaction expressed by the Cape merchants and Cape colonists against the proposed extension of the existing contract with the Union Steamship Company, for conveying the mails between the United Kingdom and the Cape—a proposed extension from 1876 to 1881, which was embodied in a contract also dated the 19th of December last, and which was withdrawn from the Table of the House on the 5th of May. Now, Sir, the negotiation of that contract, the life and death of which is urged as a plea for this increased payment of £11,000 a-year, was a great blunder—a blunder for which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was directly responsible—and the plain question now before us is this, is the House of Commons prepared to consent to the payment of £11,000 a-year for eight years, that is to say, of a gross sum of £88,000 sterling, in order to cover the retreat of the right hon. Gentleman from a bargain which he ought never to have made? Having made this strong statement, I feel I am bound to show that this proposed payment of £88,000 is to be given for this object, and for this object alone. To establish this assertion, the House may very reasonably ask me to prove that the payment of £15,000, as proposed by the first contract agreed upon for conveying the mails between Zanzibar and the Cape was in itself sufficient. I propose to do this in several ways. First, I would point out to the House that these mail contracts have all had their origin in the proposed establishment of a mail service for the purpose of aiding in suppressing the slave trade on the east coast of Africa. To this end it was thought wise to arrange that steamers should be run from Aden to Zanzibar, and from Zanzibar to the Cape of Good Hope. Some time before the suppression of the slave trade was spoken of, Her Majesty's Government had had applications from two Companies in relation to the conveyance of these mails. One dated the 22nd of November, 1871, from the Union Steamship Company—and here I would beg the close attention of the House for a few minutes, as the facts I am now about to state have an important bearing on the case—offering to carry mails from Zanzibar to the Cape, once each alternate month, for the sum of £18,000 a-year, or once a month for £29,000 a-year for a period of seven years. The other offer was from the British Indian Steam Navigation Company, who proposed to carry the mails from Zanzibar to the Cape, not for £29,000 a-year, but for £16,315, or a little more than half the sum proposed by the Union Steamship Company. But, besides, the British Indian Company offered to carry the mails from Zanzibar and Aden for £11,050, and their combined offer was evidently in the opinion of the Government the only one at that time worthy of consideration, for on the 10th of January, 1872, Lord Kimberley wrote a despatch to the Governor of the Cape, giving the particulars of this offer of the British Indian Company, and asking the colony if it was inclined to give a subsidy of £4,500 in aid of the contract. How brought about the House will judge now from the following extract from a letter to me from the British Indian Steam Navigation Company, June 2, 1873:—

"We put our proposal before the Post Office authorities in London prior to December, 1871; and we also had a favourable reply before December, 1871. The Post Office, London, no doubt sent on the proposal to Lord Kimberley, and thereupon he sent his despatch to the Cape. The conditions of this service as to speed, size of vessel, &c., were the same as have been arranged under contracts now made, and our offer was based on a rate of 5s. per nautical mile. It was subsequent to this that a director of the Union Steamship Company came to us and said that he had heard of our correspondence, and that they would be glad to meet us at the Cape or Natal—indifferent which. We agreed. Subsequently he suggested that they might do the part between the Cape, and either Delagoa Bay or Mozambique or Zanzibar. Finally we agreed on Zanzibar, and on hearing that another firm had sent in an offer to do the service from Aden to the Cape for £25,000, we agreed to modify our joint tender to that amount, he at £10,000 from Aden to Zanzibar, the Union Company thence to the Cape at £15,000."

Then, subsequently to this, on the 25th of June, 1872, these two Companies, the British Indian and the Union, entered into an arrangement for a joint contract for carrying the mails from Aden to the Cape for £25,000 per annum. The British Indian made some slight reduction from their original proposal of £11,500 for the voyage between Aden and Zanzibar, and proposed to take instead £10,000. The Union Steamship Company also made a slight reduction from the offer of the British Indian Company for carrying the mails from Zanzibar to the Cape, and agreed to take £15,000 instead of £16,315. This joint tender was offered to Her Majesty's Government, as will be seen from the printed Papers which I moved for, and which are now in the hands of hon. Members. There was no stipulation in it whatever in relation to an extension of the contract held by the Union Steamship Company, for carrying the mails between the United Kingdom and the Cape. To the surprise of the British Indian Steam Navigation Company, they were asked, however, in the month of August, to have their contract drawn up separately, which was done, and for a period of 10 years. These discussions have revealed to them and to the public that the object of this was to enable the Union Steamship Company to go and have some private bargaining on their own account, which they did, by giving off two years from the 10 proposed under the Zanzibar and Cape contract—a new and untried service—to obtain the extension of their Cape and Southampton contract for three years and a-half. If the statement which I have thus made has been followed and understood by hon. Members, they will at once perceive that £15,000 was an ample payment to the Union Steamship Company for the services which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to give them—£26,000 a-year. But I go further. The distance between Zanzibar and the Cape is 2,500 miles; from Zanzibar to Natal is 1,660 miles, and from Natal to the Cape 840 miles. The British Indian Company offered to carry the mails from Zanzibar to Natal for £10,800, and from Natal to the Cape for £5,400. Now, inasmuch as the Union Steamship Company not only run steamships every month regularly between the Cape and Natal without any Post Office subsidy from Her Majesty's Treasury whatever, and as the trade between these places is growing so rapidly, that they propose to put on an additional steamer a month, they could clearly afford to perform this service at a lower rate than the British Indian Company, who have no steamers running on any portion of the line. To put this beyond a doubt, I will read to the House a short extract from the last report of the Directors of the Union Steamship Company, dated 8th October, 1872. They say—

"The Commercial prosperity of the Cape and Natal colonies continues to increase. To accommodate the growing commerce of Natal, the Directors have decided on placing a second steamer on the Coast station, which will give two sailings a month to that port instead of one."

This Company, moreover, receives a subsidy from the Government of Natal of £2,000 a-year, with the prospect of its being increased. Under these circumstances it is perfectly obvious that, without any subsidy whatever, the Union Steamship Company could carry the mails between these two ports, and it follows that they could easily have accepted the £10,800—the sum fixed upon by the British Indian Company for carrying the mails from Zanzibar to Natal—for the service for the whole distance between Zanzibar and the Cape of Good Hope. I am of opinion, therefore, that even by private arrangement the Union Steamship Company might have been induced to accept of the £10,800, instead even of the £15,000. In truth, Sir, this is the position—if we wished to see a line of omnibuses from the Mansion House to Hammersmith, surely that company which already had a successful line established from the Mansion House to Charing Cross would be able to undertake to run the whole distance for a lower subsidy than the company which had no connection with the line whatever. But, Sir, the Union Steamship Company profess themselves to be satisfied with the subsidy of £15,000 a-year, for in a letter dated the 20th of February last just one day after the contracts had been placed upon the Table of this House—that is, the contracts which have both been withdrawn—the Chairman of the Company, addressing the shareholders and friends of the Company, in the manner of an impartial father, desires that both contracts should receive their support, and thus speaks of the Zanzibar contract—

"It is not disputed that the Zanzibar service has been undertaken on very moderate terms—namely, £15,000 per annum. The Company is prepared to face a loss at the commencement, but this contract is based on the expectation that the facilities afforded would develop trade on the Eastern Coast of Africa, and render the latter part of the term remunerative. Moreover, it is expected that it will act as a feeder to the main line, and each tender was approved on its own merits."

Surely, Sir, this establishes beyond the shadow of a doubt the position I have assumed; that under this contract a subsidy of £15,000 a-year was an ample and sufficient payment. I claim that I have already proved my case; but I go further, and I say we cannot tell what the market price is for the service proposed from Zanzibar to the Cape, as until we have submitted the contract to public competition we have no idea at what price we can get it done. I hold in my hand at the present moment a letter from one leading shipping firm in the City, who are in every way capable of carrying out what they undertake, and in this letter they state that they are willing if invited by public advertisement, to tender to carry not only the Zanzibar mails for a less sum, but also that they are prepared to accept of a contract for a much shorter period, and this is a matter of even greater importance to the public than the saving of a few hundreds a-year on the first price. I ask the House to resist the proposed extra payment of £11,000 a-year, making in all £36,000 a-year for the same services which two companies have already most willingly offered to undertake for a payment of £25,000 a-year; because the £88,000 we have been asked to vote by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it must be distinctly understood, is to be paid away in instalments of £11,000 a-year in order to cover his own blunder.

But I have more to charge against the right hon. Gentleman. Along with the contract now being discussed here, Members will find a printed letter, dated the 7th May last—a letter which, if I were not speaking in this House, I would characterize by very strong language indeed; but while in my place here I will simply say of it that it appears to me to be a most disgraceful production. It cannot be excused on the plea of having been written in haste, because the right hon. Gentleman knows more, or ought to know more, than any other man about this question. Now, if hon. Members will look at this letter they will find that towards the end of it the Post Office authorities are instructed by the right hon. Gentleman to conclude a contract, with as little delay as possible—

"For a mail service similar to that already agreed upon, for a sum not exceeding £24,000 a-year, which my Lords understand the directors will be willing to accept, and which is £3,000 a-year less than the original offer to the Secretary of the Post Office for this service, which was for a sum of £29,000 for twelve trips a-year each way, whilst the Company now undertook for a less sum to make thirteen trips each way."

Now, if this statement means anything it means this, that the Company was going to get by the contract now on the Table of the House £3,000 less than it was likely to have before accepted, and to give 13 in place of 12 sailings in the 12 months. Now, this old offer had been dug up and trotted out for the purpose of giving some colour to the extraordinary proposal to pay £26,000 a-year, although I think I have made it clear to the House that when this offer was made by the Union Steamship Company it was at once dismissed and laid aside, and the tender made by the British Indian Steamship Company negotiated upon because it was so much lower. I ask, in the name of common honesty, if it is fair to the House of Commons—is it fair to the taxpayers of this country—to have a statement so calculated to mislead us stuck at the end of a letter dated from Her Majesty's Treasury Chambers, and issued under the sanction of the right hon. Gentleman himself, who must know so thoroughly the whole facts of the case, having studied them since 1870. The right hon. Gentleman has used a word which I hope never again to hear within these walls, and he has set a very bad example in introducing such a word, the word "lobbying." This would give the public to understand that hon. Members of this House had a personal interest in matters of this kind. For myself I know no companies; I only know the public. I throw back to the right hon. Gentleman, then, the word "lobbying," and I hope he will carry it out of the House, never to re-appear here again. But I have something more to say about this letter. At the beginning of the last paragraph the right hon. Gentleman seeks to make the House believe that these contracts were entered upon on the 1st of January last, because there was no reason to believe that the House of Commons would disapprove of them, for he says that this additional sum of £11,000 a-year is to be given because of the Company—

"Having commenced both services from the 1st of January last, in anticipation that both would receive the approval of Parliament."

I do not think it is possible to make a statement more likely to mislead the House than this. Upon what grounds the right hon. Gentleman based this confidence and self-complacency in respect to the approval of this contract I cannot understand. Let the House judge for itself. Immediately the Cape merchants in the City heard some rumours with respect to the proposed extension of the Cape Mail Contract, they at once called a public meeting. They were extremely anxious that the contract expiring in 1876 should not be extended, for they were in hopes that the rate of postage for letters, which had been raised in 1863 from sixpence to one shilling, would be again reduced at the end of the present contract. They held a meeting on the 19th of November; they prepared a memorial, which was signed by over 100 of the leading firms connected with the trade of the Cape colony, protesting against the proposed new arrangement, and which I will read:—

"Copy of the Memorial of the Cape Merchants to the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury.

"London, November 23, 1872.

"To the Right Honourable the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury.

"The Memorial of the undersigned Merchants and Others interested in the trade between the United Kingdom and the South African Colonies,

"Sheweth that your Memorialists have learnt with surprise that a new Contract with the Union Steamship Company, for the conveyance of Her Majesty's Mails between the United Kingdom and the South African Colonies has been authorised by your Lordships.

"Wherefore your Memorialists, believing that the said Contract is opposed to the interests of the Colony, appointed a Deputation, who sought an interview with the Postmaster General, for the purpose of ascertaining the facts of the case, and of representing the views and feelings of the meeting held in the City on the 19th instant; and your Memorialists being unable to obtain the interview they desired, in consequence of the absence from town of the Postmaster General, and having been informed that the proposed Contract had originated in your Lordships' recommendations, feel themselves compelled, by the urgency of the case, to appeal to your Lordships to withhold your sanction to the completion of the same.

"That your Memorialists have reason to believe that the extension of the Ocean Contract with the Union Steamship Company has been made in connection with a service between the Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar; and, while sympathizing in the efforts of Her Majesty's Government in taking measures for the suppression of the Slave Trade, they cannot recognize the justice of carrying out an Imperial policy at the expense of the interests of the South African Colonies, and this the more especially seeing that, so far as your Memorialists have been able to learn, no steps were taken, by public advertisements or otherwise, to invite competing offers for this new line between the Cape and Zanzibar.

"That, considering the recent and probable future improvements in steam navigation, it is undesirable to anticipate the termination, in due course, of the existing Contract.

"That, looking at the largely-increased correspondence between the United Kingdom and South Africa since the date at which the existing postage rates were instituted, the present state of charges is unduly high.

"That, in view of the growing importance of the South African Colonies, and the necessity for increased communication with Great Britain, it is in the interest of the Colonies that capital and enterprise should be attracted in that direction; and your Memorialists are satisfied that the proposed extension of the existing Contract with the Union Steamship Company, by giving them a virtual monopoly, will have the effect of repressing private enterprise, which, even under the disadvantages of the present system of postage charges, has supplied the Colonies for the past eleven months with an independent line of steamers, making an average passage to and from the Cape seven to eight days under the Mail Contract time of the Union Steamship Company.

"That the Cape Colonies having recently obtained responsible Government, it is deeply to be regretted that they should have had no voice in the consideration of the terms of a Contract in which the Colonial interests are so vitally involved.

"That, for the foregoing and other reasons, your Memorialists respectfully protest against the proposed extension and modifications of the existing postal Contract with the Union Steamship Company, and earnestly pray your Lordships may be pleased to postpone the ratification of the same until an opportunity has been afforded to the South African Colonies of making their opinions known.

"And your Memorialists will ever pray, &c."

They sought an interview with the Postmaster General, and, failing him, they applied to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself. That interview took place on the 5th of December, just a fortnight before the contract I am now speaking of was concluded. Now, Sir, this deputation I must confess—for I had the honour of introducing it—did approach the right hon. Gentleman in a most confiding and hopeful spirit, at which I was myself in some measure surprised, but I attributed it to two causes: the first was, that perhaps they felt they were approaching a Gentleman who—whatever he may have been in other walks of life—was, at least in their eyes, a most successful colonist, and therefore inclined to show some brotherly feeling towards them; and, in the second place, they recognized in the right hon. Gentleman the very apostle of open and public competition. They recollected, without doubt, that he was a warm friend of the system of competitive examination, and his replies to deputations seeking Government aid, say for a scientific expedition, must have been fresh in their minds. Public competition and private enterprise they knew the right hon. Gentleman relied upon as the plea for sending all such deputations away empty; and were they not there to urge and encourage him on this path in which he so heartily delights to travel? They concluded, doubtless, that the private bargaining and arrangements which they came to protest against would only require to be named to the right hon. Gentleman to induce him to disapprove and to condemn them; and they were animated with the feeling that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been imperfectly informed upon the facts of the case, and that once he was really made acquainted with them he would cordially accept of the opportunity which their visit afforded him of getting out of the dilemma in which the Treasury had placed itself, without loss either of time or of dignity. But every bridge over which the right hon. Gentleman might have thus escaped he recklessly kicked down, and he ended the interview by saying that whatever had been done in the matter had been done for the public good; that if the Cape Colonists had paid any portion of the postal subsidy they would have had a better title to be heard; and that as to the question of offering the contract to public competition, that was a fair question to raise, and one he would be prepared to discuss in the House of Commons. Now, after all these efforts of the most public character, and in spite of the most earnest protests against the conclusion of the contract made weeks before it was signed, what defence, I ask, has the right hon. Gentleman to make for sanctioning the extraordinary statement made in this Treasury letter to which I have referred, and which is to the effect that they assumed that both contracts would receive the approval of Parliament. But, Sir, apart from all this agitation against these contracts by those who were so directly interested in them, it appears to me to be a most dangerous and mischievous practice for a Public Department to enter upon contracts on the assumption that Parliament will subsequently approve of them. The case now under discussion affords conclusive evidence of the danger of taking such things for granted, and the sooner that Public Departments are disabused of the idea that they can enter upon such irregular transactions with impunity the better. I will give the House two instances of this—one in relation to each of these contracts. The first refers to the contract for conveying the mails between the United Kingdom and the Cape. In that proposed extended contract it was stipulated that there were to be three sailings a month. Now, that contract, which was signed on the 19th of December, only received the sanction of the Treasury on the 19th of February, and yet on the 23rd of December these three sailings were announced by the Postmaster General as to commence at the beginning of the year. A copy of this official announcement I now hold in my hand. Now, that contract has never even been submitted for the approval of this House, and never will, for it has been unconditionally withdrawn. I come to the second—to the Zanzibar and Cape contract, also dated the 19th of December. The right hon. Gentleman stated to this House on the 5th of May, when speaking of this contract, that not only had it been entered upon, but a payment had been made out of Her Majesty's Treasury on account of it. Let the House weigh the position. A payment has been made in relation to this new contract which Parliament has never sanctioned, and which it cannot now sanction, because it also has been withdrawn, and if the House to-night should accept of my Motion, as I am persuaded that it will, the Union Steamship Company will have had a payment made on account of a contract which has never even been submitted to this House for approval. The House, I am confident, will join with me in asking from the right hon. Gentleman a full explanation of these irregularities, and also in seeking from him a statement of the authority by which these extraordinary payments have been made which have never been sanctioned by this House. The question, indeed, comes simply to be this; Is the House of Commons prepared to admit that the control which it is supposed to exercise over the expenditure of the public money is a mere sham and not a reality? I have spoken of a great principle that will be sanctioned by this House if this contract be approved—namely, that of making such contracts by private arrangement instead of by open competition, grave evils are sure to ensue, and no better instance can I give than the arrangements with this Company. The Company first undertook to carry the mails from Southampton to the Cape in the year 1857, which contract they obtained by tender in open competition. This contract was for a period of five years; and the second they also obtained by tender, and it was for a period of seven years from 1863; the terms of this last were that they should convey the mails once a month in 38 days, and for this they were to receive a diminishing subsidy, beginning with £25,000 and ending at £15,000; and this latter sum, I understand, is that which was indicated as the amount to be paid for future years. Now began the series of objectionable private arrangements. The first was made 10 months after the last named contract was entered upon, when the Company sought and obtained a commutation of £19,700 a-year, instead of the diminishing sums from £25,000 to £15,000. This £19,700, I take it, was simply the average of the seven years with interest added for the larger amounts, and the advantages of such an arrangement to the Company and to the Government of the day are at once apparent; but its disadvantages, so far as the public interests are concerned, are equally obvious. As regards the Government of the day, it was by this new arrangement called upon to pay on entering upon the contract £19,700 a-year instead of £25,000 and proportionately less to the end. On the other hand, the Company had the advantage of ending with an annual payment of £19,700 instead of £15,000; and as this would extend to the year of notice, which is a year beyond the exact term of contract, they would obtain a payment of £4,700 more than if they had ended with the £15,000. The result of this has been to throw into the coffers of the Union Steamship Company many thousands of pounds which ought to have been saved to the public. The taxpayers of the United Kingdom paid these subsidies when the contract was a losing concern in the expectation that the days would come when it would be recouped to them; but these days, as I will try-and-by show, have been through mismanagement greatly postponed. The next private arrangement proposed by the Union Steamship Company was in the year 1868, just two years before their previous contract was to expire. They then suggested to the Government that as the exigencies of the Cape trade demanded it, they would be willing to send two mails a month if the Government would agree privately to give them a new contract for eight years based not upon the payment of a subsidy of £19,700 a-year, but upon the revenue derived from the Ocean and British inland postage—a steadily growing revenue. The Government of that day found that in the year preceding—that is, 1866-7—the amount received for the Cape letters was £16,600, and that if they accepted this offer of the Union Steamship Company they would effect an apparent and immediate saving of £3,100. They altogether failed, however, to look at the question from a business point of view, as the Union Steamship Company had done, and altogether ignored the rapid growth and extension of the Cape trade. They accepted this proposal of the Company in the year 1868, and it will be interesting to the House to know that for the three succeeding years the average receipts of the Union Steamship Company from the Ocean and British inland postage was £21,500; and this result indicates, I take it, that the Company at all events had a very shrewd conception of the nature of the bargain they were making.

Now we come to another private arrangement, which, however, has luckily been knocked on the head. This was the arrangement proposed to be carried out by the contract so wisely withdrawn by the right hon. Gentleman on the 5th of May. On the 10th of January, 1872, the Union Steamship Company made overtures to the Government for a private arrangement, by which their contract was to be again extended to the 1st of January, 1881; and they made this proposal—that the contract should be extended for the period I have named, and that the Company in return would give the following advantages:—First, that they would forego the British inland postage, which was equivalent to a sum of £1,900 per annum, or £6,650 for the unexpired period of three and a-half years which their contract had to run; second, that they would give three sailings a-month, and increase the speed of their ships so as to convey the mails in 30 days instead of 38. Let the House look at these three points—the money, the number of sailings, and the time. In the year 1872, at the beginning of which this proposal was made, the ocean and inland postage which the Company received amounted to £25,482, and showed an increase of £4,000 over the previous year. A revenue like this was certainly well worth keeping hold of for four years and a-half longer in itself by a private bargain; but it was also an important consideration for the Union Steamship Company to have the power of running three steamers a-month in place of two; for let the House note this fact—it was not the Union Steamship Company that was to give three sailings a-month to the Postmaster General, but it was the Postmaster General that was to give the Company power to run three steamers a-month or two as they thought proper. In a word, they were to be allowed three thongs instead of two to their whip, by which they might thrash off their competitors on this line; and the terms of the bargain were such that this Company would have been at liberty after they had succeeded in this in reducing their sailings to two in the month. The effect to the public of such an arrangement as this would have been that whereas now they enjoy four sailings a-month to the Cape, they would probably have had them reduced to two. Now, as to time, 30 days is put forward as a concession on the part of the Union Steamship Company, when the fact is their steamers have run and are now running in 30 days, simply because the ships of a competing line do it in the same time. I think I have made it clear to the House that in these negotiations the interests of the public and of the colonists have invariably been made subservient to the interests of private companies and of individuals, and I would earnestly beseech the House to condemn in an emphatic manner the practice of arranging such important public undertakings in a private manner. Here is a Company which undertakes in the year 1863 to do a certain service to the State by contract; but the conditions of that contract would not have been publicly revised or corrected by the wholesome influence of competition and enterprise until the year 1881 at the earliest, had it not been for the energy and determination of the Cape colonists and Cape merchants in London in opposing the proposed and one-sided private arrangement. Now, Sir, I cannot sit down without alluding shortly to the other principle which I spoke of as being involved in these transactions for the extension of this contract—that they ignore in the most flagrant manner the opinions of our fellow-subjects in the colonies. The people at the Cape of Good Hope throughout these negotiations were never consulted upon the terms of a bargain in which they are obviously so directly interested. We profess to administer the affairs of our colonies with a single eye to the promotion of their best interests, and in the face of this profession there is something positively ludicrous about the contents of a despatch from the Government House at Cape Town dated the 3rd of January, 1873, and which I will take the liberty of reading to this House—

“(Cape of Good Hope, No. 3.)

“Governor Sir H. Barkly to Lord Kimberley.

“Government House, Cape Town,

“3rd January, 1873.

“My Lord.—At the instance of my advisers I have the honour to transmit, for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, a memorandum representing strongly the injustice which it is considered will be done to the colony by the extension of the contract for carrying the English mails with the Union Steamship Company, at the present heavy rate of 1s. per half-ounce postage without tenders being called for in the usual way.

“2. It will be seen from the enclosures to this memorandum, that the action of the Cabinet is founded upon resolutions unanimously passed at special meetings of the Chambers of Commerce of Cape Town and Port Elizabeth, which in turn took their origin in a meeting held in London by merchants and others interested in the Cape trade.

“3. At that meeting it was stated that if the contract were thrown open to competition, there was good reason to believe that another company would be prepared to perform the service on the basis of a rate of only 6d., so that your lordship will not be surprised to learn that the rumour that the matter has been already settled by the Postmaster General has been received with universal dissatisfaction out here, for I have not been in a position either to confirm or deny the authenticity of this rumour; having as yet been favoured with no communication on the subject of the new contract.

“5. It is true that among the enclosures to your Lordship's despatch of the 19th August,

No. 240, respecting the proposed establishment of a line of mail steamers between Aden and the Cape of Good Hope, there is an allusion in a letter from Mr. Stange of the Treasury to a proposal from the Union Steamship Company, to make certain improvements upon condition of obtaining an extension of their contract by three and a-half years; but the nature of these improvements is not specified, and as no opinion from the Secretary of State for the Colonies was invited either by the Lords of the Treasury or by the Postmaster General, the late Executive Council, before whom that despatch and its enclosures was laid, considered with myself, that it was better to await some more formal notification upon the subject.

“6. Trusting that it may not even now be too late to pay attention to the reasonable wishes of Her Majesty's subjects in this colony in the matter.—I have, &c.,

“(Signed) HENRY BARKLY,

“Governor.”

Surely this is a most extraordinary position for the Governor of an important colony to be placed in. He is kept in the most absolute ignorance of a matter of vital importance to the welfare of the people over whose affairs he presides. A contract has not only been negotiated and concluded, but actually entered upon, in which the Cape colonists are more immediately interested than all the world besides, and yet the Governor of that colony, as he himself expresses, has, “as yet been favoured with no communication on the subject of the new contract.” And this treatment of the Cape colonists is all the more extraordinary and unaccountable when we recall the circumstance that in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne in August, 1872, when proroguing Parliament, the following sentence occurs:—“I have cheerfully given my assent to an Act of the Legislature of the Cape Colony for the establishment in that Colony of what is now generally known as responsible Government.” On the 28th of November last, a responsible Government was proclaimed and established at the Cape, and the inhabitants naturally looked forward to more freedom of action, not only with respect to affairs that were peculiarly colonial, but also with regard to interests affecting their relationship with the mother country. Little did they suppose that at that very time when they flattered themselves upon having so far thrown off the trammels of Downing Street, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was doing his best to bind them with the stoutest of red tape in respect to a matter which was of the very first importance in regard to their future welfare and advancement. This feeling, moreover, could not fail to be intensified by the fact that the very newspapers which announced the establishment of responsible government at the Cape also made this satisfactory statement with respect to the revenue of the colony—that the revenue for the year had reached over a million sterling, while the expenditure fell short of £700,000. How the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with the facts before him of the rapid progress of the Cape Colony and of its growing commerce and trade, could ever have dreamed of sanctioning the proposed extension of the Cape mail contract I cannot possibly conceive. When the deputation to which I have already referred waited upon him, one of the Cape merchants present offered to furnish the right hon. Gentleman with some information on this point; but he was at once curtly silenced by the remark from the right hon. Gentleman that he already knew all about it. It may be well, however, that the House should know it also, so that hon. Members may judge for themselves what kind of a bargain the Treasury has sanctioned on behalf of the public. It is for the loss of this bargain, let it also be clearly understood, that we are asked to give as compensation this additional £11,000 a-year under the contract now under discussion. The value of the exports and imports of the Cape Colony in the year 1868 was £4,099,000. That was the year when the contract with the Union Steamship Company was entered upon. In 1871 the total value had increased to £5,933,000; and last year—that is, 1872—of all our foreign customers the Cape had increased their purchases from us in a larger ratio than any of the rest. Moreover, the Customs' dues collected in the colony in 1868 were roundly £282,000; last year they amounted to £550,000. With such facts as these in our possession, it is our duty I think, most earnestly to protest against this contemptuous ignoring of the rights and opinions of our colonists as has been manifested in these transactions—transactions in which they have clearly the most direct and immediate interest. There is another point on which I would have liked to say something, and that is the mischief which arises from long contracts; but as this is a question which to discuss fully would occupy much of your time—and I feel that I have trespassed freely upon it—I do not now propose to enter upon it. I will only venture to make this remark, that the frequent alterations made in the Cape mail contracts by private arrangement go to prove the necessity of all such contracts being made for a brief term, if we desire to give the public full advantage of the rapid improvements which take place in steam conveyance, and the growing and extending influence of trade and commerce. I cannot conclude without adding this—that if the sum of £88,000 is to be paid for the blunder committed by the right hon. Gentleman in making this foolish bargain, the Cape colonists and Cape merchants repudiate most earnestly the idea that any of the blame or responsibility rests with them. They protested against the proposed contract as soon as they heard of it, and they protested so loudly and steadily, that they shouted it out of existence. Now I have stated my whole case—imperfectly, I fear—but I will leave the House to judge and decide upon the plain statement I have submitted. I am persuaded the House will feel that I have had to discharge an uncongenial duty. I have, nevertheless, felt it incumbent upon myself to discharge it as a Member of this House. As a Liberal I repudiate these private bargains and arrangements of the right hon. Gentleman when dealing with the money of the public, and I am persuaded also that the Liberals will for themselves repudiate any share in such discreditable doings.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER, in supporting the Amendment, said he would strongly urge the House not to agree to the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. SAMUDA said, the House would commit a grave error if it adopted the course urged by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms), and got rid of contractors who had served the Government faithfully, and at no exorbitant profit to themselves; in order to negotiate with other parties of whom they had no knowledge whatever.

Mr. EASTWICK took exception to some of the statements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer respecting Mr. Soper and Mr. Currie, and observed that a much more important question than the carrying of the mails was the want of candour and straightforwardness on the part of one of the leading Members of the Government. The question at issue was whether contracts should be thrown open to public competition, or dealt with by private arrangement.

MR. RATHBONE trusted the House would retain in its hands the power of reviewing mail contracts, by which, according to a Return presented in 1871, no less than £474,000 a-year was unnecessarily lost. This particular contract would, he hoped, not be confirmed. These costly contracts, instead of promoting, tended to cripple commerce.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, it might be inferred from the statement of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) that the community of Cape merchants were opposed to the contract, whereas some of the principal Cape merchants had expressed to him their entire approval of it. It should be remembered that there was hardly any commerce as yet between the Cape and Zanzibar. It was certainly desirable as a general rule that these contracts should be open to competition, and also that they should be submitted to the House. This however should be done before they were brought into operation; in the present case the Company had been working the contract since January, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had explained the reasons which induced him to depart from the usual course. To cancel the contract now would, he thought, be unfair to the Company, and would place the country at a disadvantage in future negotiations. Under the circumstances of the case therefore he should vote for the right hon. Gentleman's Resolution.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the two contracts stood on a different footing, and the question was why the Government were entering upon this Eastern contract upon which they might have had competition. He wished to point out that the Government had withdrawn from the contract for the west coast service, and had given this contract for the east coast as part of the price for the rescinding of the first contract. In doing that, they had annulled the original contract, which was supposed to be a good one. It was, therefore, fallacious to say that the contract now in dispute had been in operation for some time.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) produced a printed paper, which stated that an offer had been made by certain parties to perform this service, which had been described in a despatch from Lord Kimberley to the Governor of the Cape. The Postmaster General knew nothing about that offer, and the statement about Lord Kimberley's despatch had come upon the Treasury bench as a surprise. Under those circumstances, the proper course was to lay the despatch upon the Table, to make inquiry into any offer of this kind that might have been made, and to state the result of that inquiry to the House. If the hon. Member made out his case, he would be entitled to the benefit of it; and if not, then he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would be entitled to claim the vote of the House. He begged, therefore, to move the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. HOLMS said, he had quoted nothing without being sure that it was authoritative. He had quoted Lord Kimberley's despatch from a colonial newspaper, and he did not see what the House had to ask for more.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) had somewhat overstated the information given to the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had admitted that it would be his duty to produce an official document which had been referred to, and to ascertain all the circumstances connected with it. There was, however, an important gap waiting to be filled up. This despatch of Lord Kimberley's purported to state that a proposition had been made, but not from whom, or whether it was from a responsible party. There was therefore much which it was necessary for the House to understand, and the proper course was to adjourn the debate.

MR. DISRAELI said, it did seem most extraordinary that the Government should interfere to adjourn a debate, the paramount importance of which was acknowledged, because they were not provided with a necessary official document which they ought to have been prepared to produce. During his experience in the House he hardly remembered a case in which flimsier reasons had been alleged in favour of an Adjournment. The House was in possession of all the information which would justify a decision; and if not, the fault lay with the Government, who had chosen their own time and opportunity. There had been a full discussion of the whole subject; but because the Government could not give a satisfactory answer to the charge, they wanted to waste the time of the House, and arrest the Business of the country by adjourning the debate. He should take the opinion of the House against the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BOUVERIE said, he wished to remind the House that they had no evidence as to the existence of Lord Kimberley's despatch, except an extract from a colonial newspaper. The Government having declared that they had been taken by surprise by a despatch of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had no knowledge, but which altered the view he took of the case, the House ought not to refuse to adjourn the debate, or to insist upon pronouncing an opinion on this contract. The despatch must be laid on the Table, and to go to a division without it would not only be contrary to the practices and the rules of the House, but a most dangerous precedent. He should, therefore, vote for the adjournment.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, there was one Member of the Government on the Treasury bench—the Under Secretary for the Colonies—who could if he thought fit, give the House some information about that despatch. He saw that right hon. Gentleman in his place; perhaps he would inform them whether the quotation of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) was authentic.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 205; Noes 121: Majority 84.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

AGRICULTURAL CHILDREN BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(No. 102.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HENNIKER said, it was with diffidence he brought this Bill before their Lordships upon so important a subject, as a young Member of the House; but it was one in which he had taken great interest, and he believed the Bill would recommend itself on its own merits to their Lordships' consideration and approval. It was prepared and brought into the House of Commons by his hon. Friend Mr. Clare Read, who always dealt with any question he might take up in a practical and business-like manner, and who was fully conversant with the subject to which the Bill referred. The name of Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth was on the back of the House of Commons Bill, and was another guarantee of its having been carefully and ably prepared. Without going into the details of the Bill, he (Lord Henniker) would state very shortly its main provisions. It provided that no child should be employed in agriculture under the age of eight, that up to the age of ten no child should be employed who could not produce a certificate of having attended a school 250 times during the previous year, and that up to the age of 13 no child should be employed unless it could produce a certificate of 150 attendances in the previous year. The number of attendances would be found to correspond with the rules laid down in the new Education Code. These certificates would only hold good for one year from the date of issue. Penalties were imposed upon parents and others for infringement of the Act, and more heavily upon employers. These were the most important provisions of the Bill; the details would probably be fully discussed in Committee. The Bill brought into the House of Commons last year was the same as that of this Session, which was almost unanimously agreed to by that House, with the exception of a new clause to leave parents who employed their children in helping them in their allotments or gardens outside the Bill; and it came, with one or two good Amendments, pretty much in the same form to their Lordships' House, with one important exception—namely, that the limit of age was altered from 12 to 13. The Bill was one which had been required for some time past, and was brought in to meet a great and increasing difficulty which, perhaps, this was the first opportunity to remedy. They had schools nearly everywhere now—and soon he trusted they would have them everywhere—with certificated teachers, under Government inspection; the Education Department clearly intended this by the notices issued, for they called for full accommodation in the schools and insisted on certificated teachers. The difficulty was, however, to fill the schools when they were built, not alone with those children who would work, but even small children, who did nothing but play and run wild in the roads and lanes. No doubt, education was very much more appreciated than it had been, but still the apathy of some parents was very great; they had little or no education themselves in many instances, and although they were ready to admit the advantages a good school near them offered, if the subject was brought before them, they were only too apt to pay but little serious attention to it, or they would on the slightest possible pretext be only too glad to take their children from school. It might be said, why not have direct compulsion at once? One reason was, he could not believe it would be found possible to work such a system well—if at all—in a country district; and he had the authority of those who could claim to give an opinion, as well as the result of his own experience, to justify him in saying so, whatever might be done in a town with such a system. It could not, certainly, be worked without a great deal of interference—if not entire control—from some central authority. This he particularly objected to. Then with any system of direct compulsion they had the greatest difficulty of all to get over—the effect upon the earnings of the children; whereas the system proposed would act in a slight degree in this respect, but only to so small an extent as to create an incentive to comply with the Act. Direct compulsion was surely not required in this case, for where a constant interest was taken in a school now, it was pretty well filled. This showed that a slight pressure would, probably, do all that was necessary at the present time. If so, it must be better than driving children to school by direct compulsion; it would be a less interference between the parent and the child; and would act far less harshly in the case of a large and poor family, where sometimes a child's earnings were of very great importance. Education, too, was as much required in this as in any other branch of the subject; he meant, to lead on by degrees all who were concerned to a real, a sound, and a lasting appreciation of the advantages of education. He (Lord Henniker) wished to introduce one or two Amendments. One was to make the limit of age 12 instead of 13, once more. He thought it was going far enough. The limit of age at present in the Bill would act hardly, and unnecessarily so, in many cases, where the limit of 12 would not. A difficulty in arriving at a fixed limit of age appeared here, which did not appear in dealing with children employed in manufactories and workshops, for children were seldom employed at an age in agriculture where their health would be injured. There were no hardships in this respect except where children worked in a gang. However, the Bill altered the age laid down by the Gang's Act from 8 to 10, at which a child was allowed to work. Different circumstances in different localities make it difficult to decide upon the right limit as to age. In one place 7 or 10 was the lowest age at which children were employed; at another 11 or 12, while in others 12 or 13 was the earliest age at which children were useful—namely, where they were required for ploughing, and so on. Mr. Fraser—now a right rev. Prelate, a Member of the House—saw this difficulty in making his Report as a sub-Commissioner to inquire into this question. Then it was said children ought to be trained in the habits of work early, but here again they had the evidence of labourers before the same Commission, which proved that 12 or 13 was quite early enough to give ample time to learn all that was required. Mr. Treméheere, one of the principal Commissioners, said in his Report—

"The principle which I desire to keep in view in the consideration of this complicated and difficult question is that legislation should conform as nearly as possible to the existing habits of the country, and should interfere with those habits only to the extent indispensable to the objects to be attained."

This object was attained by this Bill, if it were put back to its original form, for it would take a middle course between the age laid down by the Factory Act, and that wished for by those who thought the Bill went too far, and with the indirect system proposed it would act fairly in most districts. Twelve was an age at which children could have learnt a great deal, and would be quite late enough to keep them at school in most cases, and particularly where a night school existed. It would be a great point, too, to be able to work the Act without paid Inspectors. This he believed to be possible if the age were not put too high. Employers, as a rule, and especially large employers of labour, had been extremely liberal in helping to build schools, and he believed they would do all they could, within reasonable limits, to try to fill them. However, if Inspectors were, after a time, required, the promoters of the Bill would willingly come to Parliament for power to appoint them.

Lord Henniker

A clause would be brought in, as an alternative, to meet the wishes of many who took an interest in the question, to provide for a certificate of proficiency, that any child who could pass the fourth standard of the Education Code should be exempt from the restriction imposed by the Act. He (Lord Henniker) thought regular attendance at school far more important, but he would bring the clause forward for the consideration of their Lordships. The clause would also suspend the operation of the Act whenever a school was closed for a holiday or for any temporary purpose. Many thought the Bill went too far—many not far enough. He would say to those who thought the Bill went too far, agricultural children were the only wage-earning children who were not subject to restrictions, and each day, when labour was becoming dearer and more scarce, they would require labourers better educated and more skilled. To those who thought the Bill did not go far enough, he would say, bring forward a more workable plan, and if they thought it did not go far enough, at all events they would admit it was a step in the right direction. He must thank their Lordships for listening to him so long—the importance of the subject must be his excuse. He had always wished for such a measure; he thought the opportunity had come, and he trusted the Bill would be read a second time. He believed it would create a great change for the better, without any real hardship or injury to any one; that it would be found to be all that was required, and that it would work well. He hoped most sincerely it might help to teach those who cared little now for education, how much it meant, and to show how little any small sacrifice either employer or employed might be called upon to make was, in comparison to the good effect a sound system of education must have, at a time when each day the class which this Bill particularly affected, required more and more to understand the questions which came nearly home to them, and when so many were ready to trade upon their ignorance.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Henniker).

VISCOUNT PORTMAN said, he did not object to the principle of the Bill, but he thought it was imperfect in a great many particulars, and on looking through the various clauses he found reasons for regretting that the Home Department did not exercise a more careful supervision over measures such as this. The noble Lord having criticized some of the provisions of the Bill, said, he thought it would be impossible to carry it out in its present shape, and, therefore, he hoped that the noble Lord who had charge of it would agree to refer it to a Select Committee.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he felt bound to say a few words on the subject—particularly after the observations of the noble Lord who had just sat down. There was no one in that House whose opinion he valued more on matters relating to the welfare of the agricultural classes; but he confessed he was extremely disappointed at hearing the conclusions to which his noble Friend had arrived. His noble Friend said he defied any one, on looking at this Bill as it stood, to carry it into operation. He (the Duke of Richmond), however, without being presumptuous, thought he could readily undertake to carry out its provisions without doing injustice to any one. As to what his noble Friend had said about the want of supervision on the part of the Home Office in respect of legislation such as was proposed by this Bill, he could not concur in thinking that it was needed in this instance. He was not the champion of the Government—he had something else to do—but he did not think the supervision of the Home Office would have done much to make this a better Bill. As for the principle of the Bill, he did not think that anybody would deny that it was just and wise that the Legislature should endeavour to secure a better education for the children of the agricultural classes; and he thought its general provisions excellent. But he was glad to hear his noble Friend (Lord Henniker) who had charge of the Bill intimate his intention of making some valuable alterations in it respecting the employment of children in gangs; and he thought this Bill would be an excellent one when the Amendments sketched out by his noble Friend were introduced, and some further provisions introduced to meet the exigencies of harvest time and hop-picking. Although there was no doubt that the children employed in the fields enjoyed much better health than those engaged in factories, nevertheless he did not think it right that they should be kept employed at all times and at all seasons, and for himself he made it a rule not to give employment to children under a certain age. He thought the alteration his noble Friend proposed that children who had attained a certain proficiency should not be subjected to the restrictions imposed on other children, but might continue to follow their agricultural employment without interruption, was a great improvement. In some districts the employment of children was absolutely necessary, and he had no desire that obstacles should be thrown in the way of their being so employed, but he thought the promoters of the Bill would do well to consent to such alterations and additions as would remove the possibility of such obstacles. He believed that with these alterations their Lordships might very well assent to the measure, which he thought with due consideration in Committee might be turned into a very useful one.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY hoped their Lordships would not refuse to give this Bill a second reading, seeing that it was almost identical with the one which he introduced in 1867, and to which their Lordships gave a second reading in the Session of that year. He did not press that Bill in Committee, because there was a prevailing opinion that it was one which the House of Commons would not pass. The fact that legislation on the subject was attempted in their Lordships' House in 1867 showed that the House of Commons had not a monopoly in originating measures for the amelioration of the condition of the working classes; but as the House of Commons had come round to their Lordships' view of the matter in 1873, he thought it would be most unbecoming if their Lordships were also to turn round and refuse to do in 1873 what they had done so long ago as 1867.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he should be sorry to be understood as pledging himself to every detail of the Bill, but he thought the House would do well to assent to the second reading of this measure, the objects of which every one must approve. He thought the Bill required a clause exempting children above the age of 10 years from attendance at school if they passed a satisfactory examination. As there was such a provision in the School Board Act, it would be an inconsistency on the part of the Legislature not to allow of it in this Bill. It was high time to take steps to secure a better education to children engaged in agriculture; and the present was a favourable time for taking measures in that direction, because the general rise in wages would obviate some of the difficulties that might arise from the loss of the children's wages.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY concurred with the noble Earl that there was no difference as to the principles of this Bill—the only question was as to the time and the manner of passing such a Bill as this; and he could not concur with the noble Earl in thinking the present, when the labour market was so much disturbed, was an opportune time for legislation which would increase the difficulty of the farmer in procuring the labour necessary for the cultivation of his land. Many farmers were depending very much on children to get them through their difficulties, and he was afraid that unless the provisions of the Bill were well guarded they would increase these difficulties in procuring the necessary labour at times when their most pressing work had to be done. Therefore Parliament, while making provision for the better education of children in the agricultural districts, ought to take care it did not still further hamper the farmer, and turn the labour-market still more against him than it was at present. He should have preferred to wait till the labour-market was more settled. Some of the clauses moreover would press hardly upon the poor, and their Lordships ought not to unnecessarily intensify the dislike of the farmers and labourers to national education. As the Bill stood, a boy could not be employed unless he had been at school so many times in the previous year. Suppose he had been ill, and a serious source of expense to his poor parents during the previous year, the effect of such a provision might be to prevent him from earning money when his parents most wanted it; when, in fact, every penny that any of the family could earn was of importance if the family was to be kept out of the workhouse.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND thought it would be unwise to delay the passing of some such measure as this the operation of which he believed would be very beneficial. He thought that Clause 8 required to be very much modified.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, it was of more importance that people should be fed than that they should be educated. If this Bill would not restrict agricultural labour it would be useless, while if it did restrict it the productiveness of the land would to that extent be diminished, affecting farmers in the first instance, but ultimately the whole community. He knew a village with a population of 1,000 where £150 was annually paid for the labour of boys under 13 years of age, their wages being 3s. or 4s. a week, and showing every tendency to rise; and while labourers often spent a large portion of their earnings at the public-house, children took theirs home to their mothers—so that on this 3s. or 4s. a week it might depend whether the family were well fed and clad or otherwise. Children were more healthy at work in the fields than shut up in school, and at a time when rates were high and labour was dear, it was undesirable to increase the difficulties of farmers. He thought the tendency of the Bill would be to deprive farmers of the labour they needed, and the poor of the wages necessary to their subsistence and comfort.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY pointed out that the indirect compulsion aimed at by the Bill would be less elastic than the direct compulsion enforced by school boards, whose bye-laws permitted the employment of children in cases where local circumstances rendered it expedient.

EARL NELSON considered that the Bill was not opposed to the interests of the farmers. He would refer their Lordships to the Petition he had that day presented from the Synod of the diocese of Salisbury praying that the Bill might pass. The Synod comprised lay representatives elected from the different parishes. Two principal tenant farmers, in supporting a Petition in favour of the Bill stated that they had no wish to employ children at a very early age. The parents would be compensated for the loss of their children's earnings if the Bill in its general application greatly checked the employment of children by the increased value of adult labour. But even if the parents did now receive a temporary benefit from the employment of their children at an early age, the children themselves must be injured by being debarred from high wages in after-life. For the intelligence gained from education was the surest means of obtaining a real and permanent rise of wages and position. In all cases where the Bill had been carefully discussed, the conclusion had been arrived at that it would prove a great boon to the children, and as it was very carefully guarded, to the parents and employers also.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, no doubt the Synod of the diocese of Salisbury had petitioned, as the noble Earl had stated, in favour of the Bill. Now, Synods were very well fitted to deal with matters within their own proper province, but he could not understand what interest they had in a question of this sort.

LORD DYNEVOR observed that a compulsory law might inflict serious injury upon poor parents in agricultural districts. It should be remembered that there was a great deal of difference between children working in the open air and in mines or factories.

LORD REDESDALE said, it was provided by the 2nd clause that the Bill should not extend to Scotland or Ireland. He could not see why, if it were good for this country, it should not apply to all parts of the United Kingdom.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, he did not think that the state of the labour market furnished any reason against passing the Bill at the present time; and it certainly was not likely that the wages of agricultural labourers would ever be less than they were at present. He thought, on the contrary, it was most desirable to pass the Bill now, for it would promote the interests of the children and the general spread of education, without so far as he could see producing any injurious effects whatever.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday the 19th instant.

The House met at Two of the clock.

REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS AND DEATHS BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the President of the Local Government Board, If any estimate has been made of the increased charge upon the local rates which will result from the provisions of the 26th and the 28th sections of the Registration of Births and Deaths Bill; and what that charge will be?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, Section 26 would involve an additional charge of £9,877. Section 28 was for the provision of Register Offices, and he found that they were almost universally provided already. He might add that he had received deputations with reference to the money clauses of the Bill, and that he was not prepared at present to say by what figures he would abide. He should make a short statement on the subject before going into Committee on the Bill.

LAW OF CONSPIRACY.—QUESTION.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government will be willing to afford such facilities in respect of time as may make it possible to pass a Bill, during the present Session, to remedy the defects of the Law of Conspiracy as applied to Trade Combinations, and the relations of Master and Servant?

MR. GLADSTONE: I can say on the part of the Government we shall look with favour and goodwill upon any attempt made by the hon. and learned Gentleman to remedy the Law of Conspiracy, whether it be in the present or in the coming Session of Parliament. If, however, my hon. and learned Friend should think it desirable to go forward with the subject during the present Session, I can further say we shall have every desire to afford him facilities; but these facilities must depend on the nature of the Bill, and the objects for which it is framed. Consequently, I cannot give a more positive answer until we see the Bill.

MERCANTILE MARINE—DANGER SIGNALS.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the "danger signals at sea" recommended by Admiral Sir William Hall; and, if so, whether he proposes to carry out any experiments with the view of seeing how far it might be advisable to adopt them generally in the Mercantile Marine?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, that his attention had been called to the signals in question, but he was bound to add that they were a form of signal of which it would be impossible to require the general and compulsory adoption. He had further to state that he was perfectly willing the signals should be tried among the experiments with respect to ship lights which the Board of Trade was now carrying on at Shoeburyness.

Mr. Stansfeld

CHINA—COOLIE TRADE, MACAO.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will lay upon the Table Copies of the Despatch of the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the Governor of Hong Kong directing measures to be taken to prevent the fitting-out of ships at Hong Kong for the Macao Coolie Trade, and of any other Papers on this subject?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, in reply, said, it had been found that the provisions of the Act of last year could not be entirely adopted in the case of Hong Kong, and some Correspondence was going on with regard to it. As soon as that Correspondence had closed there would be no objection to lay the whole of it on the Table.

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA.

QUESTION.

MR. BOWRING asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can furnish the House with the names of those gentlemen who have been selected by the Government to attend on the Shah of Persia during his approaching visit to this Country?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Major General Sir Henry Rawlinson, formerly Minister of this country in Persia; Colonel Sir Arnold Kemball, formerly Consul General at Bagdad; Major Byrne, Oriental Aide-de-Camp to the Secretary of State for India; and Captain Grey have been appointed by Her Majesty's Government to proceed to Brussels and accompany the Shah to England and attend on him during his stay in England. In England a Lord-in-Waiting, an Equerry-in-Waiting, and a Groom-in-Waiting will attend upon the Shah on behalf of the Queen. Moreover, Mr. Ronald Thomson, late Chargé d'Affaires at Teheran, and Dr. Dickson, Physician to the Legation at Teheran, have accompanied the Shah at his request from Persia.

PARLIAMENT—COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE—DIVISIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. HERMON said, he wished, as morning sittings had now commenced, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he cannot make some arrangement by which Members of Committees upstairs will be afforded a little more time to reach the House from the Committee Rooms, so as to be able to record their Votes on the Amendments on the Bills which may happen to be under discussion in the House?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said; that he had had no opportunity of looking into the subject. He was afraid the inconvenience referred to was due to the magnificent proportions of the building in which they were assembled, which appeared to him to have been devised with a regard to other purposes than the transaction of business. He was sorry to add that he could not suggest a remedy for the inconvenience; but if on any special occasion the matter were brought under his notice, he should, so far as he was able, endeavour to meet the hon. Gentleman's wishes.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE)

BILL.—[BILL 146.]

(Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Secretary Bruce,
Mr. Goschen, Mr. Hibbert.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. SCOURFIELD rose to move the Amendment which had been put upon the Paper by the hon. and gallant Member for South Wiltshire (Captain Grove)—namely, that the Order for the Committee be discharged, and that the Bill be committed to a Select Committee—but which had been yesterday withdrawn from the Notice Paper. He entertained so strong a feeling of the injustice done to the ratepayers of the country, and of the want of a fair interpretation by the Government of the Resolution of the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), that he would take every opportunity of obtaining the fullest discussion of the proposals of this Bill. The people of England were divided into two classes—those who paid rates, and those who did not pay them; and not only were those who paid rates unduly burdened, but those who did not pay rates lost no opportunity of accumulating upon those who did every possible amount of additional expense. Since the Resolution of last year, not a single step had been taken to diminish the amount of the rates, but they were threatened to be largely increased for educational and sanitary purposes. An increase in the rates of 3d., 4d., 5d., or even 6d. was thought nothing of by those who did not pay them, although, were the Chancellor of the Exchequer to attempt to raise 2d. in the pound in order to meet some financial exigency, it would be fatal to the Government. The inflation of the rates was due to the action of Commissioners and Inspectors of various kinds who were always ready to be charitable and benevolent with other people's money. He wished to know what prospect we had of our rates being diminished by the action of the present Government. The Prime Minister, on two separate occasions, in his memorable address at Liverpool and recently at the Literary Fund, had entered into elaborate calculations to show the vast increase that had occurred in our national wealth in the course of the last 80 or 90 years. But the ratepayers at large said that they had not participated in this prosperity, and they complained of the tendency there was at the present day to increase the rates. Neither the magistrates nor the Board of Guardians were open to the charge of extravagance in dealing with the rates, and every attempt on their part to exercise due economy was met by those who did not pay rates with an outcry against their parsimony. On the part of the ratepayers he objected to such an enormous mass of property being exempt from the payment of rates. The House had been told that it was intended by this Bill to abolish all invidious exemptions; but the first exemptions to be done away with were those of hospitals and ragged schools. Petitions had been presented from all parts of the country, showing that the general feeling was against the abolition of such exemptions as these, on the ground that either these institutions would suffer, or else that the deficiency in their income caused by their being subjected to rates, would have to be made up by the very few persons who supported them. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment.

COLONEL BARTELOT, in seconding the Amendment, said, he thought his hon. Friend had done good service in bringing the Amendment before the House, because the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government always taunted the Members on the Opposition benches if they did not take those legitimate opportunities which were at their disposal of discussing, and discussing fairly, any great question of this kind. But he was surprised at the course taken by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South Wiltshire (Captain Grove), who, he should have thought, would have taken warning by that speech of the Solicitor General the other night in which he asked what was the meaning of "gallant" or "learned." He (Colonel Barttelot) always thought that "gallant" at any rate meant sticking to a point, and that the word could not properly be applied to a deserter. The hon. and gallant Member for South Wiltshire, therefore, no longer deserved the name of "gallant," but his hon. Friend (Mr. Scourfield) was gallant because he had stood in the breach and was ready to perform the duties which the hon. and gallant Member for South Wiltshire had failed to perform. He should like to know what the constituents of the hon. and gallant Member for South Wiltshire thought of the conduct of their Member, who, after he had given Notice of an Amendment, suddenly disappeared from the scene, and who, so far as he (Colonel Barttelot) on looking round the House could ascertain, was not present even for the purpose of vindicating his abandonment of the Notice he had given. Although the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Local Government Board had told the House that he was beset with difficulties with reference to the mode in which mines, woodlands, shooting, and fishing were to be rated, it was his duty to have placed before the House what his notions were on those matters. There was scarcely a Bill introduced by the Government which did not propose some new charge on the local rates, and he did not know where they were going to lead to. Although the Local Government Board disavowed any wish for centralization, the fact was that in everything that was now done in local matters centralization was becoming more complete, and far heavier burdens in respect of union workhouses, gaols, lunatic asylums, &c., were put upon localities than those which would have been put upon them if the local authorities had been allowed to administer their own affairs. He (Colonel Barttelot) had never gone so far as some people in regard to the relief of local taxation; and if either the Premier or the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) would say these two Bills were simply the outwork of some great scheme which was to be for the general relief of the whole of this country, then he (Colonel Barttelot) would enter upon the discussion of these two Bills heart and soul. But if they declined to show what remained of, to adopt the phrase of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld), that garment of which these measures were the mere fringe, and which fringe might be torn away at any moment, he thought the Government were not entitled to ask the House to proceed to discuss these Bills.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,"—(Mr. Scourfield,)—instead thereof.

Mr. PEASE reminded the House that this was a Bill for bringing in property which was now exempted from rating. He thought it essentially an equitable Bill; but he hoped that before proceeding with it they should have a pledge from the Government that they would go on with the second Bill. The owners of mines were also entitled to know on what principle the rating of mines would be carried out. In consequence of his not knowing whether the Government intended if possible to proceed pari passu with the two Bills, he had experienced some difficulty in framing the Amendments of which he had given Notice. The Bill placed the House in an unfair position with regard to the rating of woodlands, game, and mines, Her Majesty's Government not having given a single indication of the course they intended to take. There was hardly a lead mine in Durham that was doing more than paying its working expenses, and numbers of the men were leaving them and going to the collieries. In Cornwall hundreds of fine young men were also leaving the country on account of the depressed condition of the mining interest. He believed that hospitals were rated to the poor; but now hospitals, private hospitals and convalescent homes did a great deal more good than ragged schools, and therefore he thought the Bill would operate beneficially in withdrawing this exemption. He wished to know, whether the Government would, so far as it was in their power, proceed with both of the Bills this Session?

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government intended to press forward both the Bills on this subject. They had, if not a vital, at all events a very close connection, and the Government thought it would be quite possible to pass both measures in a satisfactory shape during the present Session. With regard to the Motion that had been made, he thought it was a serious matter for the hon. and gallant Gentleman who seconded it (Colonel Barttelot) to criticize the personal conduct of the hon. and gallant Member who originally gave Notice of it (Captain Grove), and especially with regard to the question of bona fides. He fully admitted, however, that the hon. Member for Pembrokeshire (Mr. Scourfield) was perfectly justified in making the Motion without Notice when he found it was about to be withdrawn. The speech of the hon. Member was the best justification of the course taken by the hon. and gallant Member for South Wiltshire (Captain Grove); because, except at the close, it had no reference whatever to the Motion itself, because it was a speech founded entirely upon the objections which the hon. Member entertained to the general conduct of the Government. Such a speech, in strict consistency, should have been followed by a Motion censuring the Government or proposing the rejection of the Bill. If the Session were prolonged to one of considerable length, there might be time to dispose of the Bill after it came down from the Select Committee. But, in the case of such a measure, the labours of no Select Committee could dispense with the necessity of considerable discussion in Committee of the Whole House; and the result of the Motion—probably, indeed, its object—was to delay if not to defeat the Bill. Now, the question was whether a measure, removing exemptions and dealing with the rateability of Government property, was worth having or not. The Government, it was said, ought to have introduced a measure, giving direct effect to the Resolution of the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes); and they had been charged with disobedience or treason to the authority of the House in the introduction of these Bills. According to this contention, it was the duty of the Executive Government to obey absolutely and implicitly a Resolution of the House of Commons. Now, in his view that proposition could not be sustained, and it was not to the interest of the House of Commons itself that the proposition should be sustained; for its effect would be to carry the House of Commons beyond its legitimate province, making it the absolute and actual Director of the Executive in a way which would greatly injure the working of the Government. He admitted that when a Resolution had been passed by the House of Commons declaring that it was not the duty of the Government to impose such and such a charge, the Government were bound to obey. But such was not the case here; the question was one of policy, and the Government had gone as far as they could properly go in undertaking to deal with the entire question to which the Resolution related, in the order which appeared to them essential. Do not let it be said, therefore, that the Government had disobeyed the Resolution of the House of Commons. What they had done was to determine that in dealing with the Resolution of the hon. Member for South Devon the natural order of procedure was first to determine the amount and character of property which, according to the spirit and intention of the present law, was liable to bear the burden of local charges. Nor was this an unimportant matter, even in the view of the hon. Gentleman, because the question of Government rateability was itself involved, and financially that question was one of no small moment. He was not then prepared to state the number of millions of real property held by the Government, but it held tens of millions, and it was no small matter to determine in what degree Government property should become liable to charge. The Bill proposed to deal with a variety of questions of exemption; it was most desirable—in fact, there was a unanimous wish—to come to some settlement on the subject. Would not the proposal to send it to a Select Committee render its passing uncertain? It was plain that the proposal was adverse to the purposes of the Government. Was it favourable to the purposes of the hon. Gentleman himself? Decidedly not;

and even if the opposition to the Government's proposals were taken as a distinct intimation that the Resolution of last year should be acted on, it should be remembered that the Government had no means of doing so, because every shilling at their disposal in the current year had been voted away by the unanimous Resolution of the House, for, although there was a debate on the subject, there was no division. What, then, would be gained by obstructing the progress of the Bill? The object of the Government would be thwarted by so doing, and the proposals of the hon. Member for South Devon would not be forwarded. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Captain Grove) referred to a Bill before them the other night which contained a proposal likely to increase local charges. The hon. and gallant Gentleman would soon have an opportunity of determining whether the Government really wished to treat the Resolutions of the House with respect or not. The Government had considered the point raised the other night by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Magniac), and hoped to make a proposal which would be approved by the House to prevent them unfairly going to an issue which would complicate subjects already complicated sufficiently. He trusted that the House would consider that the best course to take was to go into Committee on the Bill.

Mr. HUNT said, that if he remembered rightly, the right hon. Gentleman, under similar circumstances to those which he now complained, talked of "running away from the gleam of his own arms." The expressions of the right hon. Gentleman had an abiding place in his mind. He (Mr. Hunt) would remind the House that the Government had shown a sense of the necessity for making some change between local and Imperial taxation in 1871, when the present First Lord of the Admiralty made an elaborate statement to the House on the subject. Now, the President of the Local Government Board brought in two measures which he admitted to be incomplete; but excused himself by the plea that he had touched only the fringe of the subject. His complaint, however, was that the proposals of the Government, so far as they touched the fringe of the subject, were incomplete, and that it was necessary to send the Bills to a Select Committee, that this incompleteness might be corrected. The House was not a fit body to fill in the details of the skeleton measures submitted by the Government. If the Government had laid before the House a proposition of their plan, if they had developed their scheme for the rating of mines, of timber, of game, of fishing, and of Government property, the House might have discussed these points in Committee. But these propositions were laid on the Table in blank. [No, no!] The Government had not laid down the rule on which metalliferous mines were to be assessed, or timber, or game, or fishing; but the whole subject was proposed to be left to the judgment of the assessment committees, who would find themselves totally unable to deal with the questions, and would each deal with them in a different way. This was a matter which Parliament ought to take upon itself, for it was certain uniformity would not be secured in any other way. The right hon. Gentleman had said that if they were to refer the Bill to a Select Committee they would run the risk of defeating it. Well, for his own part he did not think it possible that the Bill could assume so complete a shape this Session as to pass into law, and therefore he had no objection that the rest of the Session should be occupied in trying to improve it, and then let it form a portion of the complete scheme of the Government next year, so that the House might have before it not only the fringe but the whole garment. He believed that more progress would be made in a Select Committee than in a Committee of the Whole House, and he therefore trusted that the Government would agree to the adoption of that course.

Mr. GOLDSMID said, there was one good thing in this poor little Bill, and that was that it brought under rating Government property which had not hitherto been reached. This would relieve some districts from heavy local charges on account of the large agglomeration of Government property; but the method of rating it proposed was most unsatisfactory, for it was provided by the 7th clause, that the Treasury—the most parsimonious Department of the Government—should settle for itself how much it should contribute. If the locality was not satisfied with the amount of the contribution, what was the remedy? Why, it was to be put to the serious expense of coming before a Committee upstairs. But the locality might reasonably say that the expense was certain, and the result of an inquiry before a Committee uncertain, and therefore might think it better to put up with a wrong. The proposal in Clause 7 was therefore unfair, and he hoped the House of Commons would never adopt it. He was glad that mines, game, and underwood would now be rated; but the Government did not tell the House in what way this was to be done, nor did they appear to have formed any plan on the subject. On the contrary, as before in the case of the Education, the Government remitted the difficult part of the question to the local committees, the result of which would be that before long the House of Commons would be loudly called upon to provide a remedy for the evils which would be sure to arise. They ought, therefore, to call upon Her Majesty's Government to prepare some scheme by which the assessment might be regulated, which should meet with the general acceptance of the House. Nothing conferred a greater benefit on the poor or really relieved the rates more than a hospital, and therefore he would be glad to see all hospitals exempted from local rates. He was also opposed to the rating of ragged schools; and he should never be a party to any measures which should impose rates upon two such institutions. With respect to the proposition for referring the Bill to a Select Committee, if he thought that the Committee would prepare a good scheme he would assent to the Amendment; but looking at the way in which Committees were nominated, he doubted the wisdom of adopting such a proposition. If the Government would declare their readiness to prepare a scheme the necessity of sending this Bill to a Select Committee would be altogether avoided, and if they would adhere to their declaration not to throw any additional burden on the local rates they would avoid a good deal of the opposition which they would otherwise have to encounter.

MR. PELL observed, that scarcely a single word had been said in favour of the Bill, which was admitted on all hands to be a most imperfect scheme. He was not prepared to adopt the suggestion which had been thrown out with reference to the preparation of a scheme by the Government in preference to the Motion for sending the Bill to a Select Committee. He thought they ought to have some clearer enunciation from the Government of the principle on which mines were to be rated before proceeding further with the Bill. He did not conceive that the steps suggested by the Government would really lead them to the conclusion at which they ought to arrive in reference to the adjustment of local and Imperial taxation. In his opinion, the Valuation Bill should be considered before they came to the other branches of the subject; and many questions connected with the rating of Government property required to be examined. Many Members on the Ministerial side were dissatisfied with the way in which that Bill had been brought in and explained, and he saw no reason why they should not support the moderate proposal for referring it to a Select Committee.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, there was one question involved in the Bill which had not yet received the attention it deserved—namely, the effect of the clause introducing the rating of timber. In considering this question, it was necessary to ask whether the quantity of woodland was undesirably large or not? There could be no doubt that the effect of the Bill would be to encourage the removal of timber. Mr. Clutton, a very high authority, in a letter to him, said—

"If timber is rated it will certainly cause a large quantity to be removed; and so large a quantity has already been removed for cultivation that I think it most impolitic that a further impetus should be given to the present rate of destruction."

There could be no doubt that in other countries great changes of climate had followed the destruction of forests. Many long-civilized countries now suffered greatly from drought owing to that cause. Now, what was our position in that respect? Russia had 39 per cent of her surface underwood; Prussia, 28 per cent; France, 16 per cent; Switzerland, 13 per cent; Great Britain only 2 per cent. Dr. Hooker, who had had the opportunity of studying that question in the East, wrote to him that he "should regard any general measure that would interfere with the remaining woods of England as a very hazardous one." No doubt it was true that this country, from its insular character and from the neighbourhood of the ocean, was in a peculiar position; but had they any great advantage to gain from running that risk? The difficulties of rating timber were great, and the questions it would raise very intricate. In the letter from which he had already quoted Mr. Clutton said—

"I do not think the increased rateable value to be obtained by rating timber is worth the expense and trouble which will be necessarily incurred."

He also confessed he should deeply regret any measure which caused the destruction of the fine timber which was so great an ornament to this country. He must also express his concurrence in the remarks of the hon. Member for Pembrokeshire (Mr. Scourfield) with reference to the rating of literary and scientific societies. He trusted Government would not press that proposal, for surely the very trifling relief of rates to be obtained would be dearly purchased by the discouragement of scientific and literary pursuits.

MR. CLARE READ observed, that everyone who had looked over the Bill must consider it a mere skeleton, and that a Select Committee was the proper authority to put flesh upon it. It appeared, also, to be almost a direct contradiction to the Bill that would follow it, which provided for uniform deductions in order to arrive at the rateable value. There they had a Bill which brought into assessment a large portion of property which did not now pay rates, and did not lay down any principle on which that assessment was to be founded. The Government had issued an edict "Let woods, game, and mines be rated," and they expected them to be forthwith justly and equally assessed. The hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) had referred to the case of woods. If they got rid of woods they could not get rid of the land, which must produce something, and that something was liable to be rated. Whether it produced mutton or wheat, the effect of rating was, no doubt, a considerable burden on the production of the necessities of life. He had been that morning at a meeting of the Chamber of Agriculture, at which these Bills had been discussed; and although the Chamber cordially agreed that mines, plantations, growing timber, fowling, shooting, sporting, and fishing should be assessed; yet it also said that, in the absence of all principles on which they were to be assessed, they would unsettle everything and settle nothing, and produce such irregularity and variety of assessment as would lead to endless litigation and expense. He would much rather discuss Amendments in a Committee upstairs, composed of practical and business men, than in a Committee of the Whole House, and he therefore cordially supported the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

CAPTAIN GROVE said, he wished to explain that previous to the Recess he had been asked to take action with regard to the Bill, and that he had, accordingly, placed a Notice on the Paper for its reference to a Select Committee. He was at the time strongly of opinion that the adoption of that course would result in making it a much more satisfactory measure; but when he went down to the country some 10 days ago, he had an opportunity of consulting many gentlemen who took an active part on assessment committees in Wiltshire, and he found they thought that the Bill might very well be modified in Committee of the Whole House, and that to refer it to a Select Committee would in all probability be to shelve it for the present Session. That being so, he had on his return to town consulted with the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), and other hon. Gentlemen who were anxious that he should persevere with his Amendment, but he found that other Gentlemen with whom he communicated were of a different opinion. That being so, he had given Notice at the earliest opportunity, that he wished to withdraw the Amendment, so that any other hon. Member who desired to do so might take up the matter. He admitted that the Bill was very imperfect; but if the Government would meet them in a fair way, he thought they might still make it a very good Bill in a Committee of the Whole House. As regarded woods, he knew that in many parts of his county trees were constantly planted for no other purpose than to shelter the land, and were utterly valueless as far as producing an annual return, but inasmuch as through the shelter they afforded the land, the adjoining fields were more productive and consequently were rated higher than they would be without this shelter, it would be unfair to rate such timber separately, as it already indirectly paid rates, and he thought they were entitled to know upon what principle it was proposed to rate that kind of property.

MR. FLOYER said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman had, no doubt, a perfect right to change, and had probably very good reasons for doing so. Looking at the question on its merits, however, he thought it desirable that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. As things at present stood, the principle upon which property was rated to the poor and other rates was perfectly clear and had been acted upon. That state of things the Bill proposed to alter, and if the House went at once into Committee it would have no guide to go by, for the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had laid down no principle on which the assessment committees should proceed, except with respect to Government property. Now, that that property should be rated was perfectly proper; but what he complained of was that the House was left at sea in the case of all other property, so that there being as many as 619 assessment committees, each would be left to take its own line as to the principles on which those various classes of property were to be assessed. What a puzzle would thus be created for the Judges who were the interpreters of the law, and who would have no fixed rule to guide their decisions. As to the taunt that those who wished to refer the Bill to a Select Committee sought to delay its passing, he would only observe that the more haste the less speed, and that the House would be the more likely to get on the faster with it if they knew where they were going. He, for one, had no wish to delay the Bill; but the Government ought to indicate the principles on which they meant to proceed, or admit their inability to do so. It was useless to proceed with this measure in the hope that on some future occasion the Government would see fit to make a declaration of their intentions on this subject. If material alterations were to be made in the Bill, they should be introduced when the measure was before a Select Committee and not in Committee of the Whole House. Under these circumstances, he should support the Amendment.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, he thought a Select Committee would be a most unsuitable tribunal before which to send a measure of this kind, because unless the Whip was certain which way the Member would vote, he took care that he was not placed on the Committee. Consequently, the vote of every Member might be predicted with almost absolute certainty, and the consequence was that the Report was carried by the casting vote of the Chairman, and it was treated as a nullity by the House. He recollected an instance in which the Chairman of a Select Committee, after speaking for a considerable time, caused directly two Members of his way of thinking came in, and said he should not trouble the Committee with any further reasons, whereupon the late Mr. Graves said—"Your other reasons have just entered the room."

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY said, that by this Bill the Government had recognized the right of the owner of the soil to the wild uncaptured game on his land for the first time; but if game was to be rated as property it must be protected as property. The Game Laws greatly required to be placed on a more satisfactory footing, for it was absurd to treat tame pheasants, bred by their owners, as private property when they were slaughtered, but as "savage wild beasts" when living, if they happened to stray from the place where they were bred into the neighbouring woods and copses. He should like to hear from the Government whether they proposed to place the Game Laws on a better and more sensible footing.

SIR HENRY HOARE said, he should vote for referring the Bill to a Committee of the Whole House, because he did not think it was desirable that its progress should be any further delayed; but, at the same time, he thought that some declaration should be made as to how woods were to be rated. It was hardly fair to rate them as a source of income the moment they became productive, when for perhaps 50 years before they had been nothing but a source of expense. Country houses also could hardly be treated as a source of income, when, as was frequently the case, they were a large source of expenditure—indeed, in many cases it cost a man several hundreds a-year not to live in his country house. He should like to see the definition by Government of the body who were to rate these houses, and an explanation of the manner in which they were to be rated. He thought that a Select Committee was not exactly the body which would clothe this skeleton Bill with shape, and put it into a proper form this year.

MR. CORRANCE said, his objection to the measure was that, by the express opinion of hon. Gentlemen well qualified to form an opinion, it was incomplete, shadowy, and should not in its present shape have been submitted to the House. He could not consent to flinging Bills on the Table of the House in this state. Not only was the present measure incomplete, it was also unjust. The House had lately been troubled with several Bills which resembled this one in their imperfections. Last year the House passed that sanitary measure which Judge Blackburn had said was an unintelligible jumble. He thought the proper course to adopt with reference to this Bill was to submit it to a Select Committee.

MR. BRISTOWE remarked that hon. Members had lost sight of that which was the substance of the Bill. In reading the Bill a second time, the House had given its assent to the principle that properties which had hitherto been exempted should hereafter be liable to be rated. But he did not understand the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill to say from first to last that he intended to make any alteration in the principle of assessing property; and they must therefore assume that the property proposed to be brought within the area of liability would be assessed upon the basis of the Parochial Assessment Act, until that matter could be dealt with by a future measure. He admitted that when they attempted to apply the Parochial Assessment Act to a tenant who was taking away the corpus of the property which it was proposed to rate they were attempting to do that which was inconsistent with the principles of that Act; but it had been done for many years in the case of coal mines, and therefore it was not impossible to apply the same principles to other mines. It seemed to him that the reasonable plan was that the Bill should simply propose to place mines under rating, and leave it to another time to determine the principle on which the rating should be applied. He thought ragged schools had a fair claim to be exempted from rating; but he could not understand why hospitals, literary societies, &c., should be exempted from rating, and for this reason—the benefit of them was not exactly coterminous with the parishes in which they stood. As to the assessment of Government property, he would leave that to be dealt with in Committee. He was altogether opposed to referring the Bill to a Select Committee, as he felt convinced that the whole subject would be re-opened again in that House, and much valuable time would therefore have been lost.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought the House had taken a wise course in exempting ragged schools; but if there was a good case for ragged schools, there was a much stronger one for public elementary schools. The basis on which such exemptions should rest should be that where any body of persons kept up an institution which saved the ratepayers a large sum of money, they should not be also called upon to pay out of their own pockets for the rates of the district generally. He did not think there was much to be said for the exemption of literary and scientific institutions, which were often little more than middle class clubs. But as the Bill appeared to him at present in a very unsatisfactory shape, he thought it should be referred to a Select Committee.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH said, he thought it would be unwise to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, and stand shivering on the brink of legislation on this subject. His experience of referring Bills to such Committees had not been very inviting. The question would be re-opened on the Report, and the same ground would be gone over again. He referred the House to the Reports of the Committees which sat 15 years ago and six years ago on the question of rating mines and woods, where they would find the subject discussed at the greatest length in every possible shape. He thought it impossible for the Government to lay down any principle of assessment which would be generally satisfactory; and it appeared to him that the better plan would be the formation of county or district assessment committees who should lay down a principle to be recognized in the rating of the district. He was surprised that hon. Gentlemen opposite should not strive to remedy the existing inequality in the rating of mines under a system which, for example, exempted mines worked by a shaft but made liable those worked by a quarry.

MR. LOPES said, the House desired to know on what principle woods and plantations would be liable to rating. Even upon the principle of what was called a hypothetical tenant, it would be difficult for any overseer to make the assessment. But while the Government in 1873 were studiously reticent as to the principle of valuation which would be applied to those properties, in 1871 they were much more communicative, for the Local Taxation Bill then introduced by them provided that where any land was occupied as plantations or woods, the gross value and rateable value should not be less than they would be respectively if such land were occupied for ordinary purposes of agriculture, either as pasture or arable land. That would be a very unjust principle. He had hardly heard a word of praise of the Bill, and should heartily support the Motion to refer it to a Select Committee.

MR. CRAUFURD said, what was complained of was that the Government would not give any indication of the principles upon which they were going to act. Some hon. Members had spoken against referring the Bill to a Select Committee on the ground that it would waste time; but the proposal of the Government involved, according to the Prime Minister, the taxation of millions of property, and therefore it behoved them not to proceed too precipitately. He had supported the second reading because he thought it was right that the property included in it should be rated; but hitherto the question had been discussed as an English one. What he wanted to know was, why there should be the constantly recurring clause—"This Act shall not apply to Scotland or Ireland." Was there no Government property in Scotland? He had himself introduced a Bill this Session, in which he proposed that Government property in Scotland should be rated for the poor rates. In the parish of Canongate, in Edinburgh, seven-eighths of the area was Government property, and more would be accumulated from time to time in various parts of Scotland. Ayr, for instance, was to be a military centre, and when the depôt was formed, Ayr would be deprived of some of its rateable value. Scotland had a principle of assessment in use in some cases. Woods, for instance, were assessed, according to acreage, at the value of the grazing grounds in the same parish. That also was the rule in Ireland, he believed. In Scotland also they had laid down a rule for rating all game that had a money value. Why should not these rules be considered with a view to the enactment of some plan which should be universal in its application? The Bill so far as it went was admirable; and it would be altogether satisfactory if its details were supplied by a Select Committee. The President of the Local Government Board might submit a scheme to that Committee, which would be far better able to deal with the matter than the House. This plan was preferable even at the risk of postponing the Bill for another year. There was no necessity for haste. Surely hon. Members were superior to the anxiety to be doing something regardless of imperfections. It should be the ambition of Parliament to create good Acts, not merely to swell the Statute Book.

MR. HENLEY said, that, knowing the great soreness and irritability that prevailed upon this subject out of doors, he was surprised that the Government did not avail themselves of the advantage to be obtained through a Select Committee. He was also surprised that they did not seem to consider the time of the House. There were four new principles in the Bill in reference to the kind of things that were to be taxed; and as to three of them, there was not the slightest intimation of the principle upon which it was proposed that the assessment should be based. The subject was full of difficulties, and it could not properly be discussed in the House except at an enormous waste of time. In a Select Committee there could soon be sketched out a plan upon which the rating should be carried out; and this was essential in order that the principle of rating should be uniform in different places. If the House had nothing definite before them, what chance was there of coming to a satisfactory conclusion? They had already had the question of rating mines before them for years; and there would be equal difficulty in rating game. There was soil where game almost sprung up of itself, and other soil where, do what you would, you could not have it; and how were these different properties to be assessed? He could not conceive that the Government designed to send forth this Bill to the assessment committees without some more definite plan to guide them than it at present contained. If they did, the confusion in the future would far exceed anything which had occurred in the past. A Select Committee would fill in the skeleton plan of the Government, and make the Bill as perfect as possible, which was extremely important when they considered that what was proposed was only part of a much larger subject.

Mr. STANSFELD expressed his obligation to the hon. Member (Mr. W. Martin) for his sound and telling argument against the reference of this measure to a Select Committee; and he also thanked the hon. Member for Newark (Mr. Bristowe) for his argument in favour of the Bill. No doubt it was true, as had been said, that a Bill of this kind must produce much opposition, because it touched important interests; and therefore the observations made by hon. Members representing those interests upon the Bill were rather likely to be of a critical than an approving character. The hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid) criticized the clause as to the exemption of Government property from rating. He said that it was extremely unfair that the question of the amount at which such property should be assessed should be left to Parliament, because in this way Parliament would virtually be a judge in its own cause. But there was no choice except that Parliament should be the judge in all matters affecting its own interests. Suppose that Parliament were to adopt the view that Government property should be rated according to the ideas of the local assessment committees, the thing might pass this year; but the question would arise in future years when the Vote for providing the money came before the House. It was impossible, therefore, to divest the House of Commons of the right to judge. The best opportunity for discussing clauses would be found in Committee, and therefore his hon. Friend must be content with some rather general remarks at present. He was quite prepared, however, to say that he would accept the principle of arbitration which his hon. Friend (Mr. Stone) gave Notice he would propose, provided he was permitted to reserve the freedom not so much of Government as of Parliament and this House. He would therefore place upon the Paper a form of words the effect of which would be to enable Government, through the Treasury or the Local Government Board, as the case might be, to agree, if possible, with the local assessment committees as to the gross and rateable valuation of Government property. He would then propose that, failing such agreement, recourse should be had to arbitration; but the functions of the arbitrator should be to propose a conditional valuation, the values to be inserted in the schedule of a Bill, so that Parliament might have the power of deciding for itself with all the facts before it on the principle and mode of assessing Government property. He had not forgotten the remarks made by his hon. Friend the Member for North Hants (Mr. Selater-Booth), when he said it was a very serious matter to bring all Government property within the area of rateability, and that it was not a subject to be broached in any light, perfunctory, or superficial way. If he had done so, the Government would have been justly condemned at some future time for having tied the hands of the House of Commons without affording it that minute knowledge which the case required. The hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) spoke against the rating of woods and plantations, thinking that the effect of it would be to discourage both the one and the other. But his hon. Friend must have forgotten that according to the law of Scotland this kind of property was rated in that country, and he had yet to learn that hill sides in Scotland were not so well clothed with wood as they were in England. As showing the discursive character of this debate, he had been appealed to by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Raimond Knightley) to give his opinion upon the Game Laws, but he must decline to answer that appeal; whilst he denied the logic of the statement that he could not tax game because game was not property. What he proposed to tax was that incorporeal hereditament, the right of sporting, a thing which was already rated in Scotland. The hon. Member for East Suffolk (Mr. Corrance) had referred to a judgment of Mr. Justice Blackburn, alleging that that learned Judge's remarks applied to the Sanitary Act of last year, and arguing that it was a loosely and badly-drawn Act. Now, the remarks of Mr. Justice Blackburn had naturally arrested his attention at the time. He had read them carefully, and was prepared to assert that they did not refer to the Sanitary Act of last year, but to the numerous Acts passed during the preceding 20 years, which had undoubtedly involved the law in considerable confusion, and to remove which the Local Government Board had deemed it necessary to prepare a digest of the sanitary laws for the guidance of those who had to apply them. Among the various contributions to the discussion that day the most original was one made by the hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Collins), who, on a Motion for referring the Bill to a Select Committee, proposed entirely to change its character. The object of that measure, and what Parliament and the public had been pressing upon the Government for years, was the abolition of exemptions from rateability. But the hon. Member for Boston desired that they should wholly turn their backs upon that principle and make that Bill positively one for the creation of new exemptions in favour of public institutions generally which had a tendency, morally or materially, indirectly to reduce the rates. He would remind the hon. Gentleman of an observation of Mr. Justice Mellor in a well-known case, to the effect that every such exemption from rates amounted to a forced contribution from all the other ratepayers of the district on behalf of the institution so exempted. Indeed, an hon. Member who spoke early in the debate told them that from a high authority in Manchester he had gathered that they strongly approved the principle of the exemption of useful local public institutions from rating, because, practically speaking, it was the only way of getting the general population to contribute towards them. According to that reasoning, they were practically to put a charge on the ratepayers of a locality in favour of these institutions, whether they approved them or not. The right hon.

Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) had on a former occasion treated the measure with scant courtesy, and characterized it as one which was not quite seriously intended by the Government. That imputation he had felt himself bound to repudiate. But in the present discussion the right hon. Gentleman took a totally different course. He had approved generally of the principle of the Bill, but proposed to refer it to a Select Committee because it was a mere outline which required filling in. The right hon. Gentleman and others urged that with regard to the new descriptions of property intended to be brought under rating he had failed to propound any scheme by which the assessment committees and the Courts might be guided in ascertaining their assessable value. Now what he had done in that respect was not done per incuriam, but designedly. The right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) appeared to be under a strange illusion, and had spoken of the impossibility of the assessment committees and the Courts of Law dealing with those questions unless Parliament laid down the principles by which the rateable value was to be ascertained. But it was singular that it had not occurred to him that although property of different kinds had been assessed, valued, and rated since the days of Elizabeth, there was not on the Statute Book of this country a single enactment defining the methods by which their value should be ascertained in England. An Amendment had been placed on the Paper by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. C. Read) in the sense of the Scotch Act in regard to woods and plantations. He had nothing to say against that Amendment if it met with the general concurrence of the House; but it did not call for a reference of the Bill to a Select Committee. He asked how they would be more ready to discuss the measure after it came down from such a Committee than before it went there? As to the right of shooting, he should be prepared to discuss the Amendments proposed on that subject, though he was ready, as at present advised, to defend the clause as it stood, holding that they could only calculate or guess the rent for which such a right would let; and that was the principle by which the assessment committees were guided generally in ascertaining the value of all hereditaments. With regard to mines, that very question had been considered by a Committee of the House years ago, and that Committee failed to come to a conclusion on so extremely difficult a subject. His hon. Friend the Member for West Cornwall (Sir John St. Aubyn) and others of great practical knowledge had Amendments on the Paper with respect to the rating of mines, and there was no reason why those Amendments should not be discussed. It was possible his hon. Friend might show good reasons why his Amendment should be adopted; but he very much doubted whether, notwithstanding the knowledge on the subject of his hon. Friend the Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) the House could address itself to the problem of laying down rules with respect to mines of all descriptions, such as were embodied in the proposals which now stood on the Notice Paper. The reason he had proposed to deal with the subject in the manner indicated by the Bill was because it involved great difficulties and complications, and that it was impossible to deal otherwise with it in a Bill which it was intended to pass during the present Session. He now came to the last part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt) who had been perfectly candid, for he had admitted that if the Bill were referred to a Select Committee it could not become law this year. To that admission he would refer those hon. Gentlemen who maintained that the Bill would not be lost if the Amendment were agreed to. The authority and experience of the right hon. Gentleman were against them, and it was clear that if they were successful the very difficult branch of the subject which they were discussing would be left to be dealt with in some Bill in a succeeding Session. He, for one, would not be responsible for any proceeding of that kind. He did not feel bound to propose a measure which would solve every possible problem connected with the subject of rating. We had since the days of Elizabeth gone on sufficiently contented with the rating of mines of a certain character without particularizing the mode of assessment, and it was, he thought, going too far to tell the House in the middle of the month of June, when it desired to make some progress in dealing with a great question of which the present Bill touched only the fringe, that it should not proceed further unless it entered into a branch of the subject which would make legislation impossible in the present and doubtful in a future Session. He was aware that there was some dissatisfaction in the House as to the method which the Government had deemed it their duty to adopt in dealing with the subject of local administration and taxation; but it was rather too late to dispute the policy on which they acted, seeing that the House had almost unanimously passed the Budget, and that there were no funds out of which contributions could be made in aid of the local rates. Was the House prepared, under those circumstances, to say that it would not permit the Government to do what they could in the matter? They had honestly and explicitly declared it to be their intention to deal with the question as a whole; and was it anything more than simple justice that they should be allowed to take the first step in that direction? If they were permitted to do so they would be doubling their obligation to meet the views of the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), who, if the present Bill passed, might be more than ever certain that a subject in which he took such an interest would in a future Session be taken up by the Government. There was only one other point to which he wished to refer. His hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) had called attention to the fact that Scotland and Ireland were excluded from the Bill, referring especially to the clauses which it contained concerning the rating of Government property. Now, if the views which he had laid before the House as to the rating of Government property should be accepted, there would be no objection to extending those clauses to Scotland and Ireland. In conclusion, he earnestly entreated the House to accept the assurances the Government had given on this subject, and allow the Bill to go into Committee.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that there was no principle laid down in any Act of Parliament as to the mode in which the value of property liable to rates could be ascertained. Now, he could not at that moment lay his hand upon the statute, but he had before him a well-known work, Archbold's Poor Law, in which he found the principle laid down that property was to be rated at a sum equal to the rent at which it might reasonably be expected to be let from year to year, the rates and taxes to which it was subject being first deducted. That being the principle laid down by statute, the right hon. Gentleman was now going to adopt an entirely different principle with regard to Government property and houses also, and the arguments of those who urged that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee were, therefore, perfectly reasonable. What was a person to do, he should like to know, who took from year to year growing timber, which for 15 years might be absolutely worthless? It was impossible that he could make any profit by it, and when the right hon. Gentleman proposed a certain mode of dealing with Government property which could not be applied to the case of timber, he must not be surprised if he were asked, as he had laid down a principle in one case, that he should do it also in others.

MR. STANSFELD said, perhaps he had not expressed himself with sufficient distinctness. What he intended to say was, that there was on the Statute Book no enactment defining, as it had been proposed the Government should define, the method and principle by which special classes of property should be valued by assessment committees. The general principle, which had operated since the reign of Elizabeth, was that the gross annual value should be ascertained with reference to the rent the property would fetch, and that principle would be applicable to new as well as old properties.

The House divided:—Ayes 211; Noes 181: Majority 30.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On Question, "That the Preamble be postponed,"

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

MR. STANSFELD said, he would be willing to report Progress after the first two clauses, to which there was no opposition, were passed.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought that the 2nd clause raised the question of the application of the measure to Ireland, and he must, therefore, persist in his objection to going on with the Bill.

MR. STANSFELD said, he would propose an addition to the clause which would probably meet the objection of the hon. Baronet. The clause was—"This Act shall not apply to Scotland or Ireland," and he proposed to add the words—"Except as is otherwise expressly provided by this Act."

MR. W. H. SMITH urged that the President of the Local Government Board should put on the Paper his Amendments on the 7th clause.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH said, he hoped that, before the right hon. Gentleman took the next step in this matter, he would make some statement with reference to the charge which the abolition of the exemption of Government property would throw upon the annual Estimates.

MR. M'LAREN said, he had originally objected to Clause 2, because it did not make the Bill applicable to Scotland as far as the rating of Government property was concerned; but after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the Bill would be applied to Scotland to that extent, he was perfectly satisfied.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 151; Noes 176: Majority 25.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Extent of Act).

MR. STANSFELD proposed to introduce words to the effect that the Bill should not apply to Scotland or Ireland "except as is otherwise expressly provided by this Act."

MR. COLLINS said, he believed there was a serious objection to the clause, and as it was impossible to discuss it in the few minutes that remained, he moved that Progress be reported.

MR. PELL supported the Motion, observing that a great number of Members had left the House.

MR. STANSFELD assented to the Motion.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday, at Two of the clock.

And it being now twenty minutes to Seven of the Clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the Clock.

NAVY (PROMOTION AND RETIREMENT).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR JOHN HAY, in rising to move—

said: Mr. Speaker—Sir, the formal Motion which I am about to introduce to the notice of the House is framed in the same words as the Motion which was made in this House ten years ago by Lord Palmerston. On that occasion I had brought before the House the then position of the Navy with regard to promotion and retirement. It appeared to me, at that time, Sir, that the service was suffering from stagnation of promotion and from the want of arrangement which then existed. It is now 10 years since that subject was inquired into. It was in the year 1863 that I had the honour of submitting this subject to the House, and Lord Palmerston made the proposal that a Select Committee should be appointed by the House to consider the system of promotion and retirement in the Royal Navy, and report thereon to this House. That proposal was adopted. My right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Spencer Walpole) was the Chairman of the Committee, and presided over its deliberations with great advantage. The hon. Member for the Montgomery Burghs (Mr. Hanbury-Tracy) has also a Motion of a similar kind before the House, and had intended to take an opportunity of calling the attention of this House to the subject, and of moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the condition of the Navy, with regard to promotion and retirement, and with a view of settling an equitable plan of retirement in the Navy. The Committee of 1863 produced a Report which no doubt many Members of this House have read, and which made various suggestions for the improvement of the position of the officers of the Navy. That Report was in some degree acted upon by the Duke of Somerset in the year

1866, and the advantages of the arrangement which was then made were manifest and were bearing good fruits during the six or seven years which succeeded the Report of the Committee. In 1863, as I have said, I had an opportunity of introducing this subject to the House, and was assisted in the view which I put forward by the opinions of naval officers who had considered the subject, and of the Rev. Mr. Harvey, whose name will long be remembered in connection with this subject. They had taken a great deal of evidence upon the subject, and that formed the basis of the recommendations which were laid upon the Table of this House, and also the basis of the inquiry which then followed. At present, however, the Navy is—I will not say suffering from—but is under the influence of a different scheme of retirement. In the year 1870, with very considerable liberality, a large grant of money was given by this House to the Admiralty for the advantage of retired officers of the Navy. The object of that grant was to induce officers to retire from the Navy, and in so doing to diminish the number of officers who were on the active list. There is a great deal to be said in favour of the proposal. The arrangement was one which was intended to reduce the active list so as to give more constant employment to those who remained upon it. And it was intended to reduce the active list of officers to 1,000 in the superior grades; that is to say, there were to be 50 flag officers, 150 captains, 200 commanders, and 600 lieutenants. But at that time there were on the active list 80 flag officers, 288 captains, 402 commanders, and 769 lieutenants, thus leaving a surplus of 30 flag officers, 138 captains, 202 commanders, and 169 lieutenants, at the time that proposal of retirement was introduced by Order in Council of the Navy. After the Order in Council had been three years in operation—in March, 1873—there were on the active list 59 flag officers, 226 captains, 306 commanders, and 703 lieutenants; still leaving a surplus of 9 flag officers, 76 captains, 106 commanders, and 103 lieutenants; the net result being a reduction of 21 flag officers, 62 captains, 96 commanders, and 63 lieutenants in that period. Now, it may be asked, why I should select a period of three years as the time at which to call the attention of this House to this subject. I wish to do so because at the time that this measure was introduced the notice of this House, we were promised by the Minister who then had the honour of submitting it and carrying it, that at the end of three years from that time all the good results which were to be expected from it would have followed from this measure. I will quote the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Childers), who was at that time First Lord of the Admiralty. He said—

“The House may wish to know what will be the future financial effect of these changes. In the first year there will be an addition of £54,111. In the second year the amount of increase will be reduced to £42,499. It may be assumed that all the compulsory retirements will be in the first year and two-thirds of the optional retirements; in the second year there will be half of the remaining third of the optional retirements and half of the further reduction to bring down the number to those proposed. In the third year, the numbers being fully reduced, the increase of charge will be diminished to £30,886. In the fourth year, instead of an increase of expense, there will be a saving of £7,552. In the fifth year there will be a saving of £45,990. A steady saving will then go on for 20 or 25 years, until all the lists will be in what may be called their normal condition.”—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 937.]

Upon that I am bound to call attention to a Return (321, 1872), before this House, which shows that the diminution has been hardly anything. The charges, which were £1,755,336 in April, 1868, are now shown by a Return to be £1,754,041, which is little less. And since that, owing to certain changes, although there has been no further Return, I believe the Secretary to the Admiralty will acknowledge that the charge has rather increased than diminished. However, at any rate, it is apparent that there has not been the diminution which was anticipated, and the increased charge continues, as it was supposed it would, by those who opposed the measure. The half pay, the reserve pay, and retired pay in 1868-9 was £700,166, and it is now £847,462. In 1870 it stood at the increased charge of £902,100, and therefore it has been reduced slightly from that great increase; but that sum included the special grant of £120,000. It was £723,000 in 1869-70; £782,000 in 1870-71, excepting £120,000 which was specially voted; and then the charge went on to £829,000 in 1871-2; £818,000 in 1872-3; and for 1873-4, £847,462. Therefore, so far as this House is concerned, the promise of a diminution of the public charge has proved to be fallacious. There was another object with which this proposal was introduced to the notice of the House. I quote from the pages of Hansard, February 28th, 1870. The then First Lord of the Admiralty said—

“Our third object was to render the service contented. So long as we had a large number of officers unemployed, and while some of the questions I have mentioned were unsettled, no one can wonder at a certain uneasiness and want of contentment in parts of the service. We believe, however, that the proposals I have made to-night ought to remove these feelings; and, if that prove so, we shall have succeeded in our third object. Efficiency, economy, and contentment are, then, the main bases of our naval policy.”—[Ibid. 938.]

I am quite sure the House and the country and the Government desire efficiency, economy, and contentment in the Navy, and all I venture to ask the House to grant a Committee for is, because I do not believe that either efficiency, or economy, or contentment have been obtained by that scheme of retirement and promotion introduced in the year 1870, or that it is likely to lead to those most valuable qualities in those who have had the honour to serve the Queen. I understood that under that retirement scheme the measure of efficiency was principally to be the age of the officers who were employed. My right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) 15 years ago proposed that officers at the age of 70, of whatever rank, should be retired. That appeared to him to be an age at which no more services could be required from gentlemen serving in the Navy, and that it would be fair to create a flow of promotion by removing them from the list and promoting other persons into their places. That is a very different plan, so far as the Navy is concerned, from the plan by which persons are forced off the list at a certain age and other persons are not promoted to take their places. I myself had proposed in 1852 a plan of retirement. To quote the words I used at that time, I proposed that “the services of men of energy, of great practical experience, inured to war, should be retained whatever their age might be.” That is another plan of retirement; and it was not until the Committee sat, over which my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University so well presided, that I became aware how difficult it was—that is now many years ago, and I had not then so much experience as I have at the present time—for men in high office to make a selection of those whom they might think had the energy and ability which, according to my view, would have retained their services in the Navy. I am therefore willing, so far as I am myself concerned, to acknowledge that I was mistaken in that proposal.

SIR JOHN HAY proceeded: I was remarking, Sir, that the various plans of retirement which had hitherto been offered for the acceptance of this House had contained various elements which might have been more palatable to those who were affected by them. But before the Committee which I have alluded to, presided over by the right hon. Member for Cambridge University, we had a very singular piece of evidence of the extreme distaste of these proposals of retirement to the officers of the Navy. One of the most distinguished Admirals of the Navy—I allude to the late Lord Dundonald—was one of those who were about to be affected by one of these schemes of retirement. It was given in evidence by Sir George Seymour that Lord Dundonald's expression of distaste for the proposal was couched in these words—"I have no wish to be driven into the knacker's yard." Now, although that is not by any means a satisfactory place into which to drive officers, yet it is the place to which large numbers have been driven by the arrangement of 1870. I do not propose to-night, in asking for this Committee, to go into any question as to all the officers of the Navy. I merely desire to place before the House the condition of the combatant officers, for the rest will follow and will be naturally inquired into by any Committee which it might be the desire of this House to appoint. Now, with regard to the combatant officers of the Navy, the crucial test, as I understand it to exist at present, is the test of age accompanied by service at sea. The object of the proposal was a very valuable and excellent one if it had been attained. The object of the proposal of 1870 was to quicken promotion in the Navy and give us younger officers. If, however, it had succeeded in giving us younger officers, I, for one, should have been perfectly satisfied with the scheme as proposed; but I wish to call the attention of the House to some figures bearing on this proposal. Of the various classes of officers on the flag list in the year 1870 the aggregate ages of the 3 Admirals of the Fleet were 246 years; in 1873, or rather at the present time, they are 252 years. In the year 1870 the aggregate ages of the 13 Admirals—the youngest 13 Admirals on the list of full Admirals—was 844, and it is now 860, or 16 years older. In 1870 the 15 youngest Vice Admirals were 880, and now they are 895, or 15 years older. The 25 youngest Rear Admirals were at that time 1,291, but they are now 1,365 years; so that in every one of the cases in which flag officers of the Navy are concerned, the age of the active officers has been increased.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

SIR JOHN HAY, resuming, said: I am extremely sorry for my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty if he is unable to catch the thread of the argument I have endeavoured to adduce, but it has been so frequently broken that I must ask the House to excuse me if I, perhaps, go over a little of the ground I have already trodden. I was endeavouring to point out to the House that the ages of the officers in the upper ranks of the Navy had considerably increased under the recent arrangement. I will not recapitulate the ages which I have already given, and which I daresay the hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do; but I will proceed to say that in 1870 there were 5 officers on the flag list under 50 years of age, and there are now a smaller number—namely, 4—under 50. Comparing the ages of individual officers with the aggregate ages I have adduced to the House, it will be shown that they also have considerably increased. There are now 31 under 50 and 60; 17 between 60 and 70; 4 over 80 years of age, still upon the flag list. It therefore seems that the object of the retirement scheme for which the House paid so handsomely has not been achieved; and I must say that although the liberality of the House at that time to the Navy, so far as regards retired officers, was considerable, the House must not be under the impression that the Navy generally benefited by that liberality. I would like here to point out that it was, of course, desired by this House and supposed that those who were the most inefficient were those who were rejected from the list, and those retained were supposed to be the most efficient and the most fit for service. Those on the half pay list and the active list have received no important increase of pay whatever; and, indeed, on the half pay, none whatever. There were certain distributions of pensions which might give a slight increase to certain officers and deprive others of them; but the half pay has not been increased, as a matter of fact, nor has the active pay of the Navy been increased. This large sum of money was given to the retired list of officers, who are officers who have been rejected from the Navy, and are no longer competent to serve the Crown in any naval capacity. It is difficult to express it exactly; but they are paid largely by the country for not allowing themselves to be employed, which is about the worst object to which public money could well be applied. In addition to the increase of the aggregate age of the officers which I have already alluded to, the slowness of promotion now has become a very great disadvantage to the profession. Of all things that you ought to keep before the eyes of those who are serving you in the profession of arms, is the prospect they have, if they distinguish themselves, of rapid promotion—that for distinguished services they are sure to be promoted. Now, the fact is at this moment that the Navy is labouring under the impression that it has become almost a seniority service, that there are no young officers comparatively being advanced to the ranks above them; and you are arriving at this stage—that you will retain officers on the list of captains until they are 54 years of age, and yet under the new retirement scheme as Rear Admirals they will be obliged to retire at 55. The result is that they are retired before they have an opportunity of serving in that capacity, and the country has a heavy charge to pay them on their retirement as flag officers, for which they never do the country any service whatever. It will be the year 1880, or seven years hence, before the Admirals' list is reduced to the established number. Now, I make that assertion upon what I hope the House will consider sufficiently good evidence. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty will know very well the name of Mr. William Hickman. He is an officer whom the Admiralty has constantly employed for statistical Returns, and he has been so kind, without taking any particular view of the matter, as to make all these calculations for me, he having been in possession of the ages of every officer on the list, and having made these calculations on a fair basis of life assurance calculations. Now, I will take the list of Admirals. There are 3 Admirals of the Fleet at this moment, and 13 Admirals on the active list on the 20th of March, 1873. To 4 of these officers the retirement scheme does not apply, and of the remaining 12, 8 elected to remain on the system in force in 1866, which enables them to continue on the active list until they attain the age of 70. They are Sir Henry Codrington, who will retire in 1879; Sir George Mundy, who will retire in 1875; Sir Henry Keppel, in 1880; Sir James Hope, in 1878; Sir Alexander Milne, in 1877; Admiral Richard Warren, in 1880; Sir Sidney Daeres, in 1874; and Sir Augustus Kuper, in 1879. These are the officers who are not subject to the retirement scheme of 1870. The 4 Admirals subject to the Order in Council of 1870, will retire in the following order on attaining the age of 65—namely, Lord Clarence Paget, in 1877; Admiral George Elliot, in 1879; Sir Thomas Symonds, in 1877; and the Hon. Charles Elliot, in 1884. I will not go over all the list, but I wish to show the House and the Secretary to the Admiralty, that I have gone carefully into these matters, and to place before them the fact that these calculations are based upon accurate statistics. So far, then, as retirements are concerned, there will be from the Admirals list, 1 in 1874, 1 in 1875, 3 in 1877, 1 in 1878, 3 in 1879, 2 in 1880, and 1 in 1884. There are certain contingencies provided for in regard to death vacancies; but with regard to voluntary retirement, from the foregoing will not be more than 12 commanders promoted in each year up to 1883. Now, I think that is a serious matter. A number of senior officers of ships now exist, and it is a very awkward matter if the Government contemplate that only 12 commanders, who hold such responsible positions, will be promoted out of a considerable number. They must know that in consequence of the check of promotion only one person will be promoted out of two vacancies—and rather less from certain changes which have been made; and these officers will have to go on serving without prospect of promotion during the next 10 years if the present system continues. And at that time—1883—the captains' list will be only reduced to 194, and will be still 44 above the number to which we were promised it would be reduced by this time. The right hon. Gentleman suggested 150 as the aggregate number which was to have been reached at this date. But the First Lord of the Admiralty has broken through that rule—as I think with great judgment—and I give him great credit for it. He has promoted a considerable number of officers very rightly and justly, but he has entirely broken through the arrangement which was to reduce the list, which has been increased by nearly 20. By the retirement scheme of 1870 the captains' list was reduced from 288 to 239; but since that time it has only been reduced by 13. But the captains' list has to be reduced to 150; so that for the next 10 years the Navy must look forward to an absence of anything like that right, and just, and reasonable promotion which men ever hope for in the public service. With regard to the commanders' list, there are now 306 commanders, and that number is to be reduced to 200. It was reduced by the proposal of 1870 from 402 to 339; but since that time the action of the retirement scheme has only been to reduce it by 33, which is a very slight way on the journey towards the reduction to 200 proposed. The lieutenants' list in March, 1870, numbered 769. It was reduced by retirement to 688; the intention originally being to reduce it to 600. But the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty very wisely intervened, and I thank him on behalf of the service for what he did in breaking through the rule. Still, the effect has been to increase the list to 729, or nearly up to the numbers at which it was at the time the House voted so liberally for the reduction of the list. It is evident that the numbers not having been reduced, there can be no diminution of charge such as was held out as a boon to the country in 1870. There has, in fact, been a slight increase of the public charge instead of the anticipated reduction. Now, there are certain points which may not seem to be of any great importance to the House, but which are of very great importance to the Navy, to which I desire to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues. A new plan with regard to retirement of Admirals of the Fleet was introduced in 1870, which I conceive to have been a most improvident and improper arrangement. The rank of Admiral of the Fleet has no doubt since the time of Lord Howe been an honorary rank, but is equal to the rank of Field Marshal, and is much coveted by those who have risen to the rank of Admiral in the Navy. And I believe the proposal of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was extremely unjust to those officers in that particular. Let us see how unfairly it is working. It is quite true that at this moment there are three very distinguished officers who hold that high post, and I am sure that whoever may hereafter attain to it will be officers of distinction and deserving of that honour. But many of the officers who commanded-in-chief your Fleets by the action of this scheme are prevented from ever becoming Admirals of the Fleet. Although they may have looked forward to it from boyhood, and have risen to command your Fleet, they are deprived of that position by the red tape rule which says that at the age of 68 or 65, according as they accept the new or old scheme, they are to go off the list of Admirals. The result is that such men as Sir William Martin, Lord Lauderdale, Sir Alexander Milne, and Sir Frederick Grey have been, or probably will be, deprived of this rank, not because there are better men—although, perhaps, equally good men may reach it before them—but because they may be pushed off the list of Admirals before their turn comes, and another man who is a day under the age may have arrived at the top of the list. The result will be that three officers—excellent officers, but who do not

SIR JOHN HAY: For having appointed him to the Hercules; for having allowed him to resign; and for the fact that his service was over in six weeks.

MR. GOSCHEN: It was not over in that time.

SIR JOHN HAY: Oh, was it not? Well, then, it was seven weeks or two months. I thought it was six weeks. I will not be sure; but at any rate he commanded the Hercules for a short time, and came back to his duties in the City of London.

MR. GOSCHEN was about to make another observation, but was met by cries of "Order!"

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Baronet is in possession of the House, and unless the right hon. Gentleman desires to make an explanation he is not in Order.

SIR JOHN HAY: I understood—I do not know—but I believe Captain Osborn held an appointment of considerable importance in the City of London, and that he went away for six weeks or more, and came back to the same employment. I may have been inaccurately informed, but if I am wrong I am quite ready to be corrected. But, as I have said, Sir Walter Tarleton and Rear Admiral Sherard Osborn have prevented the promotion of the two next captains on the list. I will now mention the case of Captain Ashmore Powell, who was appointed to make certain experiments with regard to ships in which the public were much interested, and whose qualities had been very much challenged. He was sent to sea with two ships, and then somebody at the Admiralty discovered before he made his report that he was 55 years of age; so he was shelved, and we did not get his report. He had been selected as the fittest man for the duty, and yet before he could put pen to paper he was sent away, and could make no report whatever. Take another case. I was looking through the list of Rear Admirals the other day. A knowledge of the Transport Service is of great value to this country in our amphibious wars, and there is hardly any person who has the same experience as Sir Leopold Heath, who was thanked by the House which preceded this—by your predecessor, Sir, for the services which he rendered in Abyssinia. He was Commander of the Fleet there, and had probably had more experience there in the Transport Service connected with a considerable Army than any man going. He was young—although, perhaps, the House does not consider 55 young—and very active. I happened to look to see where he was, and I found he was retired. [MR. GOSCHEN: Voluntarily.]

So much the worse that the country allows him to retire voluntarily; the country should compel him to remain. Of what advantage is it to the country to give an option to a man like that to retire from the service? I do not want to weary the House with these cases, but I must mention one more. I am sorry to see that my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Stirlingshire (Admiral Erskine) is not in his place. He had hoped to be here. The youngest captain on the list who is just about to be retired is the nephew of, and of the same name as the hon. Member for Stirling. He served under my command, and I know him to be a most excellent officer; but, unfortunately, the seniority system takes older men to be employed, and he is within a month or two of the time at which he will be retired. He is very little over 30 years of age, yet he will be put upon the shelf and have £300 a-year for life, unless my calling the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the case may enable him to obtain a command. He is a young man with a tolerable fortune, no wife, and all other advantages to enable him to serve his country with credit and distinction; but unless he gets a ship within a month or two, the country will be charged with £300 for his life-time, and he may go where he likes. Surely that is not for the advantage of the country? There are other cases of the same character, but I do not wish to tax the indulgence of the House, and I have taken him because he is the youngest, and a relative of the hon. Member for Stirling, who I was in hopes would have been here to confirm my statement, and who entirely concurs in the objects of my Motion. Now, I am not going to attempt to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman what he should do. One thing is quite evident. If he looks over the Report of the Committee of 1863, over which the right hon. Member for Cambridge University presided with so much ability, he will find that all the suggestions made there were more practical and more valuable than the plan of retirement under which the Navy at present suffers. But there is

this to be said—that it cannot go on. One of the great evils has been the entry of a large number of young officers. I have always thought so and said so. You must limit your entries, for although they are very valuable officers, yet if you are to have 600 lieutenants you must not enter any one for three years, and after that you must limit your entries to 45 or 47 a-year. It will be said, and very properly said—"How is the work of the junior officers of the Navy to be performed if you limit the entries so largely?" I know many of my naval friends differ from me in that which I have advocated before, which is that you must do this—You must promote your youngest and best-conducted seamen to a class of warrant officers, and employ them for certain duties connected with the boats, tops, decks, and quarters, which anyone who has been at sea will understand, and which they are capable of performing. Before that Committee, of which I have already spoken, one of the most distinguished officers of the Navy—the late Sir George Seymour—was examined, and it will be seen that his evidence bears me out in this statement as to the employment of warrant officers. You cannot hope to improve the list of officers if you swamp them by numbers. With 45 entries, and by retirement from the lieutenants' list of 25 or 30 lieutenants a-year, you would require no retirement from the other lists of the Navy. What you ought to have is a much larger number of warrant officers, which would give a great inducement for good conduct among the seamen of the Fleet; and you ought also to retire officers from the list of lieutenants before they attain the age at which they would become commanders—those who are superfluous, and who are not to be promoted to the higher ranks of commander or Admiral. It may be asked—"What are you to do with these lieutenants?" Well, the question certainly is a difficult one. I may, perhaps, anticipate to some little extent what will fall from the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Brassey), who I see is about to move an Amendment to my own Motion for a Committee. I believe I may presume to say that it is not a hostile Amendment. I would venture to suggest that the lieutenants so retired should be employed as lieutenants in the Naval Reserve, and that considerable inducement would be held out to the mail contract companies, and all the other shipowners of this country, to employ them to command their ships. They would be the fittest men for that purpose; and, assuming that the commanders of those vessels receive, say, £800, they having £150 or £200 from the Crown as a retaining fee or retired pay, would be able to give their services for a smaller sum to the great shipowners, who would be, as I believe, ready to employ them. The advantage of that would be that we should have competent and skilful officers to train our Naval Reserve, and they would be available, in the event of war, to command those very ships which it would be necessary to man or commission for the purpose of destroying an enemy's commerce. The arrangements with the contract steamers formerly—I do not know whether they do so now—contemplated the employment of those vessels in war, and they were obliged to have certain means to enable them to mount guns in case of necessity. What could be more advantageous for the country than that on the outbreak of war those admirable vessels should be filled with men of the Naval Reserve—which I have always supported the right hon. Gentleman in obtaining money to pay—and commanded by lieutenants in the Navy, with the rank of commander if you like, who being so employed in war would, by gaining distinction in their special branch of the profession, I hope have an opportunity of rising to a higher rank? Various interruptions have, unfortunately, marred my attempt to introduce this proposal to the House; but I trust that the right hon. Gentleman may have gathered what it is that I desire to offer to his consideration. I believe it is very desirable that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into these matters. I am quite sure that neither efficiency, economy, nor contentment are at present the rule with regard to promotion and retirement in the Navy, and I am also sure that the large sum given by this House in 1870 has not had its desired effect. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Childers), who was not here at the beginning when I quoted the statistics supplied by Mr. Hickman, will see that the system—instead of being as he hoped it would be at the end of three years—is in a state of considerable confusion; and that there is no prospect under the continuance of the present system, without larger infractions of the Order in Council than have been so judiciously made by the present First Lord, of any restoration of that efficiency, contentment, and economy for which he looked. The hon. and gallant Baronet concluded by moving for the Select Committee.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY: Sir, I rise to second the Motion of my hon. and gallant Friend, but I do so for reasons which differ very essentially from those he has expressed. He has moved for the appointment of the Committee because he believes the retirement scheme of 1870 was founded in error, and could not possibly be made to work well. He (Sir John Hay) never was a friend to that plan and I fear he never will be. I, on the contrary—believing that the retirement scheme of 1870 only requires expansion and to be carried out in its entirety to be a great success—wish that a Committee may be granted in order that it may receive that development which is essential to its well working. That retirement was carried by my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract, when he was First Lord of the Admiralty, in the face of great opposition, but it had been designed with the greatest care, and it had been elaborated by the right hon. Gentleman with a full knowledge of the complicated state of the lists. I know it was honestly intended to put an end to a chronic state of grumbling, to stop that continued, almost annual meddling with the retirement lists, which had brought about such a mass of different schemes that the Navy List had at last obtained a retirement for any letter in the Alphabet, which required a lifetime to understand. In my humble capacity, I have always, inside this House and out of it, supported that plan, and I have always thought that my right hon. Friend was the only First Lord who ever had the courage to deal with it as a whole, and in a comprehensive spirit, for the good of the entire service. His main principle was to decide what the numbers on the active list ought to be, not only in reference to the peace establishment, but also for the requirements of war, and once having settled that, then to reduce the number to that point, keeping the officers—although, perhaps, somewhat smaller in point of numbers—yet thoroughly efficient. He saw that the great fault of our system had always been having quantity, not quality; the maintenance of an enormous number of officers, which you were totally unable to give employment to, and the large body of whom were therefore rendered inefficient and discontented. In carrying out the details my right hon. Friend endeavoured to avoid, as far as possible, giving cause of complaint, and, by large and liberal retirements, he hoped to clear the lists, and reduce the number of active officers to the point he had determined on. Unfortunately, Sir, my right hon. Friend became ill and was obliged to quit office at the critical moment when he of all men was absolutely necessary at the head of that Department in order to see the scheme carried out in its entirety, to expand and adapt the details as circumstances might arise. Nothing could have been more untimely, nothing could have been so prejudicial to the good working of such a delicate piece of administrative machinery than the loss at that moment of the fountain-head and author of the scheme to guide and direct. Although my right hon. Friend offered considerable inducements in order to clear the lists, it was, I think, thoroughly understood by the House, that if they were not sufficient to bring about that desired end, he was determined after the experiment had been fairly tried to take such further steps as might be necessary. Of this I am quite certain that the fundamental key-stone of his plan rested on the lists being brought down, and all the vast improvements which he fondly predicted to flow from his scheme were based on having a small but thoroughly efficient body of officers, in the place of an enormous unworkable number and inefficient so-called active lists. It is melancholy after the great and confident expectations raised in 1870, of reduced lists, of constant employment, bringing with them an even flow of promotion, and officers in a high state of efficiency, to look at the present Navy List, and to compare it with that of 1870. Three years have passed away, and yet what do we find. A block in all the lists; great want of employment; many of the very best officers remaining on half-pay for years and years in a state of perpetual despair, obliged to live on a miserable pittance which hardly keeps them from starving, and with little prospect of obtaining employment until years of idleness have passed by, until by the natural course of events they must be far less efficient, far less zealous, and far less able to take command of our vessels. My belief is that had my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract remained at the head of the Admiralty means would have been found long ago to have reduced the lists, and that this state of things would not have occurred. In saying this, I have no wish for one moment to say a single word which could be thought disrespectful or uncourteous to my right hon. Friend now at the head of the Admiralty. He has had in a very brief time to master all the difficult technicalities of the service, not only of the matériel, but also of the personnel, and it is not surprising that he should not at once have seen the urgent necessity of bringing the lists down to the point determined on in 1870. The remedy is very simple. There is only one way of effecting it, and that is by going boldly into the field and giving such ample and liberal retirement or such other appointments as will, in the shape of a pecuniary bribe or employment, induce the requisite number to leave the active lists. I know of no intermediate course which can be adopted with justice to the officers. What is now the present state of the lists as compared with what you said was essential in 1870? You laid down that with due regard to the necessities of war the number required of active officers should be—flag officers 50, captains 150, commanders 200, lieutenants 600. The First Lord of the Admiralty in introducing his scheme stated that he had arrived at these figures after the most careful investigation. Now, Sir, I am aware that there are some officers who think that these numbers are too small, but I think it is unnecessary to argue that point. I start on the general assumption that these numbers have been accepted as sufficient, and that those officers, especially the captains and commanders, if kept thoroughly efficient, would be ample for every emergency. I desire to argue on the premise on which the retirement scheme was based. In 1871, after the scheme had been in operation one, year you had 10 flag officers over the complement—82 captains and 125 commanders. In May, 1873, you have certainly got the flag list to within 6, but you have 76 captains over the list, and 106 commanders. Practically speaking, it may, I think, be fairly stated that, although some lists are brought down in these important branches, no progress whatever has been made. As a necessary consequence of this you are obliged to retain enormous numbers unemployed. At the present moment I find you have 138 captains and 147 commanders on half-pay, all anxious and desirous for service, rusting ashore, and in very few cases doing anything to retain their efficiency. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), in 1870, in describing the small number of officers employed, stated—

“ we would propose a plan of promotion and retirement which would, so far as we could judge, get rid of that terrible blot upon our Navy, the redundancy and unsatisfactory employment of our officers. . . . the system of keeping up an excessive number of unemployed officers is open to three objections. In the first place, it is very uneconomical; in the next place, it is very mischievous, by creating discontent among the officers who are constantly on half-pay, and by causing continual agitation for increased pay; and, thirdly, it produces great inefficiency, because in those days if an officer is on shore for a long time he gets behindhand with the improvements that are always going on.”—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 930-31.]

Well, Sir, in 1873, three years after this statement was made, I find that whereas in 1870 you had 109 captains promoted within five years, and only 10 officers serving, in 1873 you have had 91 promoted during five years, and only five employed; and whereas in 1870 you had then 123 commanders who had been promoted during three years, and only 23 serving, you had, in 1873, 88 commanders who had been promoted during three years, and only 29 serving. Notwithstanding you succeeded in 1870, during the first year, in reducing the list of your captains and commanders, it was far more nominal than real. What you did was this—You at once cleared off the dead weight; you swept off those who, having long given up all intention of serving afloat, were delighted to go into retirement—amongst them many men who had not been afloat for years, and had not sought employment, and to this extent a great benefit was effected. But the main difficulty in reducing the active list was not in dealing with this description of officer, because it was well known that, to all intents, they had long and practically given up the service as their profession. The main point was to know what to do with the next stratum, having weeded out all the dead weight, how to get rid, for the benefit of the service, of a certain portion of the young and active, and here the Navy has deeply felt the loss of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract. Let us take the list of captains and commanders as being the two which are the most important. To the most uninitiated it was self-evident, in 1871, that some further step must be taken as a temporary measure. You had arrived at the point where you found you had to deal with a list full of officers, anxious to serve—men who had served their country in distant climes with zeal and intelligence, who had a vested interest in employment and promotion. If for the good of the service it was found, from the altered state of the profession, absolutely necessary to reduce the list still further, it was essential that it should be done with the greatest care, with the most scrupulous justice, that the feelings of those officers, who were to be asked to give up their profession, should have been consulted, and that no steps should be taken which were not dictated with the utmost liberality. In April, 1871, you found yourself with 233 captains and with 312 commanders, most of them being in the prime of life, and the élite of your service; of these you were bound to get rid of 83 captains and 112 commanders in order to carry out the policy of 1870, and to enable the retirement scheme to have a fair chance of getting into working order. Well, Sir, there were two courses open by which this could be effected—one, I may be allowed to term a policy of justice and the other a policy of injustice. A policy of justice would have brought with it contentment and an instantaneous remedy. You could have gone to a certain number of those officers, and said—"We are sorry to blight your prospects of advancement in the profession, but it is impossible to find employment for so many, and it is imperative to reduce the list, therefore we are prepared to make ample compensation. We will give a bonus of so many years sea service, and a step in rank, or so much money down to buy you out, provided a given number will elect to take it." The cost of this would have been a mere flea bite compared with the benefits which the country would at once have secured from the extra state of efficiency the remaining officers would soon have attained to. Then, again, it would have been quite possible to have reduced the cost by giving appointments in connection with your Naval Reserves, or employment under the Board of Trade. Surely, Sir, 100 or 150 naval captains and commanders in the prime of life would have been the very best material to have made available for these purposes. It would, I undertake to say, have required a very small amount of administrative ability to have found positions for which these officers were so eminently fitted to fill. Instead of this, up to this moment the very opposite policy has been adopted, which I, with all deference, cannot help calling a policy of injustice—one which is as unjust as it is niggardly and hurtful to the service. I must say that I think the Admiralty have been very much to blame after the strong assertions made from the Treasury bench in 1870, to have allowed three years to elapse without taking some more active steps in a fair, generous, and liberal spirit to reduce the number. I do not attribute the blame to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Admiralty individually, because until he had been at the head of affairs a considerable time it was impossible for him to be aware of the great importance of the subject; but I think there is no excuse for the Admiralty as a public administrative body. For the last two years they have endeavoured to starve a certain number of officers into submission by keeping them continually unemployed. I must recall to the remembrance of the House the fact that liberal as the scheme of 1870 undoubtedly was, it was based upon service, and that according to age and number of years employed the amount of retirement pension depended. After that Order in Council it became, therefore, of the most vital importance to obtain employment. My right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract also introduced a clause into that scheme that non-employment for five years as commander or seven years as captain would necessitate retirement. I remember very well that the sole intention of this was to prevent officers blocking the lists who did not care to serve, and I am confident that nothing so unfair ever entered into the mind of my right hon. Friend as to use this clause as a lever to clear the lists. Now, however, it is perfectly clear that before long it must operate to compulsorily retire large numbers of officers who are anxious to serve, and whose non-employment is in no way due to them. The effect of this is that the double hardship is perpetrated—you offer liberal retirements based on service, and then you force men into retirement without putting it into their power to obtain that service on which it is based. [Mr. GOSCHEN: We have not retired any one compulsorily, and do not intend to do so.] I am very glad my right hon. Friend has made that statement, and though I could point out two cases in which it has taken effect, I will not dispute the point further. One thing, however, is self-evident—namely, that as there are a large number of officers who have nearly run to the end of their five and seven years, some immediate steps must soon be taken to give employment, unless inducements are given to retire. The other day my right hon. Friend at the head of the Admiralty said that he feared no pecuniary inducement would even now effect a reduction of the list; but I can assure him that he is mistaken. During the last six weeks I have, in concert with several officers acting as a Naval Committee, been in communication with some 250 captains and commanders, and I therefore can speak with some authority on the matter. I am confident that it only requires a fair proposal to be offered by the Admiralty to induce the requisite number to quit the active list. Does the House realize what being condemned for a long term of years to half-pay means in the present day? It is a very different thing from what it used to be. Formerly, it was looked upon as a moderate but sufficient maintenance. No change has been made for 50 years, and what was plenty then is now almost starvation. Sir, the great evil in the constitution of our Naval Service—the great bane of the English Navy—is the system of condemning our officers for years and years to a miserable half-pay, with enforced idleness. My right hon. Friend stated this so clearly—especially as regards efficiency—that I cannot do better than quote his words—

"I wish to point out a still more injurious result arising from our having too large a number of officers, and I make this statement with a full sense of its importance, and on my responsibility I feel no hesitation in saying that it is injurious to the efficiency of the Navy. Communications which I have received within the last two months from Admirals and officers in command in all parts of the world convince me that though our Naval officers are as gallant men as are to be found in the world, and as willing to do their duty, yet there is want of efficiency among them, arising from want of employment. You cannot expect adequate experience from captains and commanders who are for two-thirds of their time on shore."

These are the evils which it was intended to remove, and which I trust the House will insist shall not be allowed to remain. I find that it is still no uncommon thing—indeed, it is the usual custom—for captains to be appointed to vessels, who, if you reckon their time of service from the date they were promoted to commanders, have been 12, and sometimes 14 years, during which they have only been actually at sea three, four, or five years. Think of this, Sir, at a time when you have vessels worth £250,000. Would it be allowed in any private firm? Would it be tolerated by any foreign country? Can it be to the advantage of this great country to allow such a state of things to exist? In France and in America, if I understand their system rightly, no officer is obliged to be ashore more than two years, and even during that period he is attached to some port and to some committee, where he has the means and the opportunity of keeping up and improving his professional knowledge. We alone, who pride ourselves on being economical, condemn the system in 1870 as costly, extravagant, and inefficient, and yet allow the same state of things to flourish in 1873. I can imagine nothing more pitiable or more unenviable than the position at the present moment of many of our senior commanders. Most of these officers have, from long service, justly earned their promotion, and yet, year after year, they find themselves passed over by many of their juniors. They ask for employment, and cannot obtain it, and are forced to exist on a miserable amount of 8s. 6d. or 10s. a-day until, at last, worn out in mind, and disgusted with the profession it was their pride to belong to, they find themselves starved into submission, and they retire. I know it was part of the policy of my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract to keep half-pay low, with the view of making officers anxious for employment, but it was his fundamental object that there should be employment for all who desired it. Picture to yourself, Sir, the condition of many and many a deserving officer led to marry by a fair prospect of promotion, and by the usual tradition of the service that he would in his turn obtain employment, and some day become an Admiral. Fancy this poor officer striving to support a family on 8s. 6d. a-day, and condemned to see employment given away, and juniors promoted over his head without any recognized system, and with the knowledge that it all depends on the caprice and the ideas of the private Secretary and the First Sea Lord. I have received piles and piles of letters of the most distressing character, which show only too clearly what misery is being experienced. To add to the continued penalty of poverty, you have devised that most inhuman torture—endless suspense. Month after month your commanders and captains visit the Admiralty, asking for employment, but you have not the courage to tell them the truth that they are never to be employed again. Would it not be the commonest kindness to put some of those officers out of their misery, and to tell them their fate, and let them seek from other employers that due reward of their service which you refuse to give. There never was a time when promotions were so cavilled at owing to their small number. Nothing could be worse than the present system of promotion. I know that my right hon. Friend would not for a moment permit any officer to be promoted from political or interested motives, and I am sure that no one can accuse him of any of those gross promotion scandals which used to be of so frequent occurrence. It would be impossible to select a more favourable moment for criticizing the mode of promotion. Of the two officers who advise, Admiral Sir Alexander Milne is allowed on all hands to be one of the best officers of the Navy, and Captain Tryon is deservedly popular, and above all suspicion of jobbery. But, Sir, I maintain with every intention to act fairly, and to promote the right man under the existing system, it is almost impossible to do it. The First Lord consults his two professional advisers, and thereupon makes his selection. It is impossible, with this limited knowledge, to make just promotions. I give every credit to the motives which actuate the private Secretary and the First Naval Lord, but how is it possible that they can know every officer? They naturally look amongst the officers they have served with, and those must practically receive the preference. It is impossible to pick up any professional paper without becoming aware of the fact that there has been great irritation lately against many of the promotions which have been made during the last few years. Seniority tempered by selection—which is the mode under which our lieutenants and commanders are supposed to be promoted—must be carried out not only with the utmost fairness, but it must be by a plan of selection, which inspires confidence in the service, or public opinion will force you into a pure seniority system, which I for one should greatly deplore. I apprehend the only feasible and sensible plan is to adopt the French system of a conseil d'avancement. There you have a body of seven or eight officers outside the Admiralty whose duty it is to examine into all the Reports, and to make minute investigation and to submit names for promotion after the most careful and elaborate inquiry that it is possible to make. With such a council it is absolutely certain that every officer's claim must be known by one of the council and cannot be neglected. After the list is formed it still rests with the First Lord or Minister of Marine to make his selection, but he cannot go beyond this. In this way I am informed by officers of great authority, that little if any complaint is made respecting the promotion, and it is found to work very well. If this were carried out, I apprehend you would hear far less of constant criticizing which every promotion now gives rise to, and you would then be enabled to carry out an improvement which must come before long—the selection of your captains for the rank of Admiral. Is it not a great farce that however incompetent a captain may be, he must of necessity become an Admiral, provided his age admits. Where you have a limited number of Admirals you must have the élits of your service. The other system was tolerated when your lists were so large that you had ample choice, but having once restricted the numbers, selection must follow. There were many, who, like myself in 1870, looked forward to this and other measures as certain soon to follow. We thought that three years would not elapse before death vacancies would be limited, if not abolished, before some sort of educational course would be instituted to qualify lieutenants for the rank of commander, not as an examination but as a test, and before attempts would be made to arrange a more certain retirement for lieutenants. We certainly did not think that after the declaration made from the Treasury bench it would be possible three years after to find the lists still blocked, and no promotion or employment. When I urge constant employment, I do not mean that it should of necessity be sea service, but that in lieu of half-pay with enforced idleness, you should attach your officers, when not at sea, to ports, dockyards, committees, and surveying vessels where they would be continually keeping themselves alive to all the changes and requirements of the time, and thus increasing their efficiency. If this policy is pursued in the French Navy, and found to be successful, surely we might adopt it with safety. Sir, I will not trouble the House further in the matter, I will only say that I am confident if the Committee is granted it will prove that the retirement scheme of 1870 has already done great good to many classes of officers, but that an imperative necessity exists for bringing the executive lists into a more healthy condition. As I have already said, the retirement scheme was based on reduced lists, and until this is done it will not have had a fair trial. In the present day, when vast improvements and alterations are being carried out, not only in the construction of your ships but in the science and art of war—when five short years are sufficient to revolutionize the whole aspect of modern warfare, it has become absolutely essential that our executive officers should be well trained in technical and scientific information of every description, that they should be zealous and contented, and that no special knowledge which they may have acquired should be allowed to rust. Our naval officers have ever distinguished themselves—they are worthy of higher consideration, of a more generous policy than has of late been accorded to them. I maintain it is unfair to them, it is unjust to the taxpayers of this country; it is derogatory to a great naval nation to carry on a system which keeps your officers in a chronic state of discontent, and prevents them maintaining their efficiency, and which, looking at it in the most mercenary point of view, does not even give you fair value for the money spent. I beg to second the Motion of the right hon. Baronet.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the present system of Promotion and Retirement in the Royal Navy, and to report their opinion thereon to this House."—(Sir John Hay.)

Mr. T. BRASSEY: Before I proceed to speak to the Amendment which I have placed on the Paper, I desire to explain that if the forms of the House had permitted, I should have preferred to present my Amendment as an Instruction to the Committee for which the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir John Hay) has moved. My object, however, will have been sufficiently attained if I can succeed in calling the attention of the House to the proposals which I am about to make. The efficiency of the Navy cannot be maintained if discontent prevails throughout the service. The enforced idleness to which so many naval officers have hitherto been condemned, would, under any circumstances, be a fruitful cause of discontent, and from every point of view it is a great evil. The origin of the difficulty is not far to seek. It has been our policy to train up, in time of peace, a number of officers sufficient to command our fleets in time of war; but, having trained these officers, it is impossible to find employment for them in a peace Navy. It has long been an accepted axiom that the number of lieutenants must be taken as the datum line upon which the lists of officers in the other ranks of the service must, to a great extent, be determined. As to the number at which the list of lieutenants should be maintained, the Select Committee on Naval Promotion and Retirement of 1863, in their Report, say that, including lieutenants in the Coast Guard and other services, 1,000 is the lowest number to which the active list of lieutenants can be prudently limited. At the same time, they say they were quite aware that this list is so large as to render the promotion of all the lieutenants on the list impracticable. By the recent Order in Council, the number of lieutenants has been fixed at 600; but without offering an opinion as to the wisdom of that reduction, it is sufficient for my present purpose to observe that the importance of finding employment is equally great, whatever be the actual numbers with which we have to deal, so long as a large proportion of the officers of the Navy are pining away in poverty or idleness on a miserable half-pay. For the purpose of maintaining the list of lieutenants at a number sufficient to meet the emergencies of war, it has been the practice of successive administrations to enter a far greater number of cadets than it has been possible to promote to the higher ranks of the service. When 200 cadets were entered in every year, and only seven officers were put on the flag list, it is clear that out of those 200 cadets, 193 were doomed to disappointment. They either died, or were put on the retired list. But, discouraging as are the prospects of the majority of the cadets who enter the Navy, the Admiralty is always beset with urgent solicitations from parents and friends for nominations to cadetships. This demand must be attributed to the desire of parents to obtain for their sons the advantage of the gratuitous education which is given to all-comers who aspire to become officers in the Navy. I strongly object to the principle of tempting parents in narrow circumstances, by the offer of this gratuitous education, to send their sons into a profession which is so ill adapted for those who have not the advantage of some independent resources. It has been urged by the most eminent officers that our naval cadets should be educated at a College ashore. But such an institution should be self-supporting, and the boys should be required to pay for their education in the same way as those who are trained for the Army at Sandhurst, and for every other profession. In support of this view, I may quote the opinions of Admiral Cooper Key, the Duke of Somerset, and many high authorities on naval subjects. If any exception be allowed to the rule requiring payment for the education of a cadet at a naval College, it should be limited to the sons of naval officers. Passing from the nomination and the education of cadets, we have now to deal with the more difficult problem of finding the means of employing and promoting a body of lieutenants whose numbers, even under the reduced scale laid down in the Order in Council prepared by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers), are considerably in excess of the ordinary requirements of a time of peace. Nearly one-third of the lieutenants are now on half-pay. Various means can doubtless be suggested for dealing with the case of these officers. The propriety of allowing lieutenants more leave on half-pay than they at present enjoy deserves consideration. Naval officers, after a long commission abroad, or when invalidated home from a foreign station, are as much entitled to the privilege as the officers of the Army. After an absence of four years, a year's leave on full-pay cannot be considered an over liberal allowance. Under the existing regulations, an officer does not enjoy more than six months leave on full-pay in the first 10 or 15 years of his service. But an adequate promotion, as well as employment, is required for deserving lieutenants; and in order to secure a sufficient flow of promotion, the number of officers in the superior ranks of the Navy is maintained at a standard considerably in excess of the ordinary requirements of the service. This plan of rewarding good service in the Navy is of old date. In 1816, at the conclusion of the War, lieutenants' commissions were given to all mates of above two years standing. More than 1,000 lieutenants were then made. In the French Navy, no officers on the active flag list are without employment. In the United States Navy, all the officers of lower grade, and almost all the Admirals, are employed. But with us, in consequence of the disproportion between their numbers and the amount of employment during peace, the commanders and captains are not employed at sea on an average more than one-third of their time; and in the case of the flag officers, the proportion of time on half-pay is infinitely greater. It is unnecessary to dwell on the insufficiency of the half-pay. A naval officer without private means cannot maintain a social position commensurate with his rank in Her Majesty's service. On the other hand, the total amount of the non-effective Naval Vote is already so portentous, that no considerable permanent addition to that Vote could be entertained. Something might be done for the commanders and captains, both to improve their position in a pecuniary sense, and to give them more frequent opportunities of serving at sea, by employing commanders in lieu of first-lieutenants and captains in commanders' commands. But there is another means of relieving the overcrowded lists, to which I desire more especially on the present occasion to call attention. My proposal is that civil employment, of a kind for which naval experience is a fitting preparation, should be offered to officers for whom it is impossible to provide occupation afloat. There are two branches of the public service for which naval officers are thoroughly adapted. I mean the Consular service at foreign ports, and the surveyorships of shipping, under the Board of Trade, at home ports. The post of Consul at a foreign port can scarcely be regarded as a diplomatic appointment, though, if it were, I should be prepared to maintain that a well-selected naval officer would be as fit as most other men who would be available for the service. For the general business of a Consular office, nautical experience is an excellent preparation. The most important transactions with which our Consuls at ports abroad are accustomed to deal are connected with ships or sailors. When a British ship is wrecked abroad, and an application is made to the Consul for assistance, how much better qualified he would be to take whatever steps the necessity of the moment required, if he were himself an experienced sailor. The other class of civil employment to which I have referred is that of the surveyors of shipping under the Board of Trade. Some considerable technical knowledge of ship-building would be required in order to perform these duties; but it is a knowledge which a sailor would readily acquire. Character, indeed, is at least as essential as technical knowledge; and at present the salaries are so inadequate that it is difficult to induce men to enter the public service in this department, whose social position makes them independent of every kind of influence. If naval officers were appointed, their professional associations would make them superior to temptation; and with their half-pay in addition to their salary under the Board of Trade, their positions would, without additional expense to the country, be made more satisfactory than those held by the majority of the existing body of surveyors. These surveyorships and Consular appointments would offer a wide field for naval officers unable to find employment in their own profession. The surveyors under the Board of Trade are not a numerous body, but their number may probably be increased in order to provide for that more active supervision of our shipping, which, whatever be the form which it may ultimately take, seems to be impatiently demanded by public opinion. The withdrawal of so many officers on half-pay from the active lists would have the effect of giving increased employment to those officers who continued to serve exclusively in the Navy, thus adding materially to their efficiency. The advantage of this more frequent employment has been strongly insisted on by our best officers. In conclusion, I would refer to a field of employment in which naval officers judiciously selected would find it in their power to render services of great value. For the Royal Naval Reserve a staff of naval officers is absolutely essential. The discipline, the drill, the organization, the appliances for instruction, of the Royal Naval Reserve have hitherto suffered from not being placed under the close and constant supervision of a sufficient naval staff. An Admiral at the head of the Reserve is required at Whitehall; a lieutenant should be present during the drills on the gun-deck; captains should be appointed to superintend the general organization in their several districts, and to combine the varied resources of the Mercantile Marine in an effective manner for the local coast defence. The value of the Naval Reserve has been sometimes called in question. If the Reserve is not all that it ought to be, it is because we have hitherto neglected to supply the means by which the force may be more perfectly organized. A very different spirit has prevailed in the organization of our reserves for the land service. There are general officers at the head, supported by a vast array of colonels and adjutants. But hitherto the entire burden of organizing the Naval Reserves has been cast upon a member of the Board of Admiralty already overtaken by his other duties. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. LIDDELL, in seconding the Amendment, said, he felt such a love and interest for the Navy that he was induced to offer these remarks. He condemned the hard-and-fast line which had been used for the purpose of reducing the numbers of the senior members of the service. Any line drawn by the Admiralty which retired such men as his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) bore upon its face its own condemnation. What the Admiralty ought to do was to act upon the service at both ends; they ought to limit the entries in the first place, and to establish a more generous scheme of retirement for the senior officers. If he understood the French system, there existed in it a principle wholly unknown in this country. In France there was a regular flow of employment for naval officers which never stopped. They were employed either at the Bureau de la Marine, or at sea, in the dockyards, at the arsenals, or on a duty unknown in this country—namely, organizing Naval Reserves, both offensive and defensive, in the ports. If we would consent to trust in time of war more than we had hitherto done to our Mercantile Marine for our second line of defence, we might safely limit the entries of young officers in time of peace; and by founding a generous system of retirement, we might maintain an efficient state of the Navy without those grievances and complaints which it would be cheap at the expense of hundreds or thousands to avoid.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "consider" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "how far Naval Officers on half-pay can be more generally employed in the Consular Service, and in the numerous appointments under the Marine Department of the Board of Trade,"—(Mr. Thomas Brassey),

—instead thereof.

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, it may be convenient to the House if I make some remarks on this Motion before my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty. The Motion, it is true, relates not only to the great changes which were effected while I was First Lord, in the rules of promotion and retirement, but also to the recent Acts of the Board of Admiralty, with which, of course, I am not conversant. But the main part of the hon. Baronet's attack is undoubtedly directed at the Order in Council of 1870; and so far as time allows, I should like to reply at once to that attack. I do so at great disadvantage, for I did not hear the hon. Baronet's speech. The unexplained absence from his place of the hon. Member for South Hants has deprived many of us of two debates, while others like myself who were not concerned with them, have missed what we wished to hear on the present subject. But I will reply to so much of the hon. Baronet's statements as have reached me. Let me now in the first place explain what were the circumstances in 1870, which led, to what is properly called, the "scheme of retirement," then established. Since the Crimean War it had been an acknowledged axiom that the number of naval officers was excessive. But the full force of this had hardly ever been admitted at the Admiralty, and the reductions which were made did not even keep up with the altered state of naval affairs from year to year. The substitution of vessels of new type for our old ships, a wiser policy as to England's share in the police of the seas, and other economical tendencies, were causing a rapid diminution in the amount of employment available for certain classes of the service. Nor was this the only difficulty. There was no method, no intelligible principle, I may say, in the rules as to pay, promotion, or retirement, as between different branches of the profession. Every class had its grievance, because it found some other with which it could make, in some respect, an unfavourable comparison. Each, in turn, found some friend at the Admiralty or in Parliament, and almost the only result of improvement in one class was the jealousy of other classes. In respect of retirement the scale and the conditions were unsatisfactory and inadequate throughout; and the same might be said of the pensions of the lower class of officers. Perhaps the House will allow me to give a few figures. Taking what is called the military branch first, there were, in 1858—a year or two after the Crimean War—2,100 officers of the rank of flag officer, captain, commander, and lieutenant. In 1870, all we wanted of these ranks was 1,000. But the previous three retirements of 1860, 1864, and 1866 had only brought the numbers down from 2,100 to 1,600, and the percentage of employment, which had been so low as 46 per cent at the former date, was still only 50 per cent in a list of younger men. On the other hand, while the Admiralty reduced the upper ranks by about 50 a-year, they absolutely entered not only as many, but far more naval cadets than were required for the larger number, and, in fact, taking the upper and lower ranks together, were increasing instead of diminishing the number of officers. In 1857 the number of entries was 105; exactly the number of officers who died, retired, or were dismissed in that year. But from 1858 to 1868, inclusive, the number of cadets entered was 1847, or about 170 a-year; while the total number of officers from Admiral to cadet who died or retired from the service was only 1,543, or 140 a-year. Professing, therefore, to reduce the number of officers, the Admiralty were really increasing it; with the additional circumstances that the inconvenience did not fall on themselves, but would only begin to tell on the lists when the cadets they nominated became lieutenants. I had, therefore, to deal with a list, the upper part of which had been insufficiently, but still, to a considerable extent, lessened, while the lower part had been enormously and most unnecessarily augmented, the diminution of employment being at last palpable to everyone. Nor was the case better in other branches of the services. The paymaster and clerks' list was more excessive in proportion even than the military officers. There were too many navigating officers, too many engineers, too many medical officers of the highest ranks, too many warrant officers. My predecessor had largely reduced the Marines, but increased the marine officers, leaving me a task the very reverse of agreeable in respect of this corps. And my hands were not a little tied by a part of the Orders of 1866—the supposed favouritism of which had all but produced a rejection of the Vote in the House of Commons. What I did in 1869-70 may be stated in a few words.

There were altogether about 7,850 officers of the Navy and Marines; and I took in hand their reduction to about 5,500. I put the regulations as to retirement, half-pay promotion, and sea-time, on as nearly as possible an uniform and simple basis, greatly improving in nearly every instance the pecuniary rights of the officer. I did my best to counteract, in spite of social pressure and a hostile Motion in this House, the privileges which certain officers had claimed, being anxious to treat all alike, from flag officer to midshipmen. And in respect of pay, I made very large additions to certain classes. The result, in spite of the hon. Baronet, I affirm, to be satisfactory. The grievances and the difficulties of two-thirds—I think I may say three-fourths—of the service have been removed. Except on a question which has no connection with number or retirement, even the navigating officers are satisfied; and the same may be said of every other class but the captains, commanders, and lieutenants on the military list. Here, I admit, the work is not complete. The list of these ranks, which numbered 2,100 in 1857, and 1,600 in 1869, and which ought to have come down to 1,000, still numbers above 1,250. It is with these 250 or 270 that we have now to deal. The hon. Baronet, I am aware, is not satisfied with this view of the case. He thinks we have too few flag officers, and by comparing the ages of the 56 youngest of each rank in 1870 with those of all the 56 in 1873, he has persuaded himself that we have actually older officers now than then. He has also calculated that even were the Order in Council in full operation it would not produce the amount of promotion and retirement really required. Now, on this point I must trouble the House with some figures. I have taken great pains to calculate, on the basis of the numbers established by the Order in Council, what promotion may be fairly expected; and I will give roughly the result. The problem to be solved is how many retirements—the probable deaths being determined by the usual scale—will give an average promotion to each rank at the right age? I take 23 as the desirable age, on the average, for promotion to lieutenant, 32 to commander, 38 to captain, and 53 to Rear Admiral; and I assume the number of those ranks to be 600, 200, 150, and 50 respectively. Now, I assert that if 70 cadets are annually entered, the Order in Council being in full operation, the proper promotion will be secured, if 21 lieutenants, 11 commanders, 5 captains, and 5 flag officers retire annually; and that the provisions of the Orders effectually secure an average retirement to that extent. For instance, if every Rear Admiral must retire at 60, and every vice or full Admiral at 65, it is certain that out of a list of flag officers, the youngest of whom is about 53, there will average 4 compulsory retirements and 2 deaths yearly. Allowing only one optional retirement, this will give 7 captain's promotions. Again, on a list of 150 captains from 38 to 53, there will be 3 deaths annually. At the rate in 1872 and 1873, there would be 10 retirements; but taking these only at 5, we should have 15 promotions for commanders. Similarly we may anticipate 4 deaths annually in the last-named rank, and at least 11 retirements; and this would give 30 promotions from the rank of lieutenant. Again, allowing nine years for service in this rank as the average of those who obtain promotion, there will be an ample margin of officers not promoted—and we must always allow for this in the lieutenants rank—if against 60 annually promoted from sub-lieutenant we set 9 deaths out of 600, 21 retirements, and 30 promotions to commander. An annual entry of 70 cadets will barely produce 60 lieutenants a-year, so that my calculations err if anything on the side of caution. There is therefore practically no doubt that once fully in force the Orders of 1870 will ensure for the military branch what they have already given to other branches of the service—adequate promotion and retirement on liberal terms. Sir, I confess I attach great value to the maintenance of the principle of these Orders. My hon. Friend the Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) has referred to a particular case, and has said that any rule which enforced the retirement of such an officer as the hon. Baronet (Sir John Hay), must be a bad rule. I admit that the hon. Baronet's case appears a hard one. But he had been offered employment which he had declined.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he thought it a great misfortune that personal questions were brought before the House. He had carefully omitted doing so himself, and he extremely regretted the reference which his hon. Friend had made to his own case. He was quite prepared to explain the circumstance to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded, if the House really cared to hear it. He denied having ever declined any appointment which he could have accepted with honour, and when he did decline he referred the question to his right hon. Friend the late Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry) and his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire who both said that he could not accept it with honour.

MR. CHILDERS: Every man must be the judge of his own honour. The hon. Baronet does not dispute the fact of my offer of employment, and I wish to carry the controversy no further.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he did dispute the facts. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to two occasions—one when, happening to meet his private Secretary in 1869, he said to him—"My man is very sweet upon you; if you let me know you want employment I shall be happy to get it for you." He supposed that to be a joke. The next occasion was a year and a-half afterwards, when the retirement scheme had been carried, and when an offer of employment was made which he had referred to his right hon. Friend, who decided that the office was one which he ought not to accept.

MR. CHILDERS: I mentioned the case because my hon. Friend almost challenged me to do so, and I gave it as an illustration of the old saying about hard cases. To go back to what I was saying I trust that the sound principles we laid down will be observed, however their application in detail may vary from time to time. Do not let it be supposed that in calculating the necessary numbers, we omitted the reserve for war. We fully allowed for this, and I should greatly deplore any further extension on this account. Everything, indeed, points in the other direction, and I find myself in certain quarters blamed now for the moderation of my reductions. Indeed, the very same persons, and their organs in the Press, who attacked me in 1870 for over reducing the lists—especially the captains and lieutenants—and if I am not mistaken, threatened me with a Motion on the subject in Parliament, are now the loudest to complain that in these very lists the reductions effected are inadequate and prevent sufficient employment. Hit high or hit low, there are some forms of opposition which nothing satisfies. Let it be remembered that in these days of progress, you cannot have an efficient Navy unless they are adequately employed at sea. Just as we decided to maintain an annual rate of shipbuilding, so as to keep with the times in mechanical improvements, so we determined to compel our officers to be, throughout their service, for an adequate time at sea, so as not to fall behind in scientific knowledge and practice. It is a libel on this policy to say that economy was its first object. Our main view was the efficiency and contentment of the service; but the result has been economical. The figures which have been quoted to-night have no reference whatever to either what I promised, or to the out-turn. I have carefully compared the cost to the country of the pay, half-pay, and retired pay of naval officers in each year from 1867 until now, not omitting to allow for commutations; and I find that whereas I estimated, and informed the House in 1870, that there would be a large increase of charge during the first two years, that increase was limited to the first year, and that the net cost is now £50,000 a-year less than in 1867-8, and just the same as in 1869-70. There is, therefore, a fair margin for some further action to bring down the excessive number from 1,270 to 1,000; and I hope my right hon. Friend will not shrink from a bold measure. I repudiate, as much as any one, the notion that through the time clauses of the Orders it was intended to drive out of the service efficient officers; and as only two cases have been even alleged, I think the action of my right hon. Friend in the past is fully justified. But he will have my warm approval in any scheme inducing a further number voluntarily to retire; and I sincerely hope that he will not listen to the plan of the hon. Baronet, which would work great mischief. I thank the House for having allowed me to defend a reform, every part of which I believe to be sound in principle, and certain, when in full operation, to be cordially accepted by the opinion of the Naval Service.

Mr. F. STANLEY observed that, however sanguine the expectations of the right hon. Gentleman might be, they had before them the fact that by his own acknowledgment the hopes held out to them in 1870 had not been realized. That circumstance alone was sufficient to justify his hon. Friend's demand for an inquiry. Again, the public expenditure had not been diminished by the new scheme, as they were told it would be; on the contrary, as the right hon. Gentleman had himself shown, it had been increased by the sum of £8,000. The right hon. Gentleman said that the criticism of the scheme was different now from what it formerly was, but it should be remembered that they spoke now from experience of its working, which was also different. He intended to support the appointment of the Committee, and he regretted that its advocacy had fallen into such weak hands as his own, in consequence of the illness of his noble Friend (Lord Henry Lennox) who sat beside him.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, he felt it due to Captain Sherard Osborn to state that he accepted command on the usual terms, and only applied to be relieved of it on account of unexpected events, the Admiralty at first refusing his application, but afterwards, on the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief, acceding to it. There was no understanding on either side that his command would be a short one. The Admiralty had now under consideration a scheme for further improving Retirement, and there was every prospect of its being carried out. They wished to reduce the lists, but they had not endeavoured to effect this by forcing officers off and refusing to employ them. As to promotion, heartburnings had always existed on account of their being so many excellent officers and so few opportunities of promoting them, and the present state of things was no worse than formerly, while the anxiety to investigate every case was as great as it had ever been. The Government were so anxious to find increased employment for the officers, if possible, and also further inducements to retire that they would accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Brassey), and there being no difference of opinion as to the necessity of dealing with the case of the unemployed officers, he trusted the hon. Baronet would not divide.

Mr. BARNETT said, he had been told that there were four Admirals on

The Navy List for active service whose united ages amounted to 335 years. If that were true, it was necessary that some further scheme of reduction should be set on foot.

SIR JOHN HAY offered to withdraw his Motion on the understanding that the Committee would have power to inquire why the necessity for finding additional employment for officers had arisen.

MR. GOSCHEN declined to agree to such an understanding.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 64; Noes 81: Majority 17.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to consider how far Naval Officers on half-pay can be more generally employed in the Consular Service, and in the numerous appointments under the Marine Department of the Board of Trade.

EDUCATION OF BLIND AND DEAF-

MUTE CHILDREN BILL.—[BILL 53.]

(Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Mellor)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading, read.

MR. WHEELHOUSE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to do for blind and deaf-mute children what the Education Act of two years ago did for the rest of the community.

MR. HIBBERT opposed the Bill, as one that would burden the ratepayers with the expense of providing for the education of children whose parents were quite able to provide for such education themselves. This Bill was worse, instead of better, than its two predecessors.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time," put, and negatived.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE) [PAYMENT OF RATES].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of rates in respect of property occupied for the purposes of Government, which may become chargeable thereto under any Act relating to the Liability and Valuation of such Property for the purposes of Rates.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND)

BILL.—[BILL 45.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER, in moving that this Bill be now read the second time said, that his apology for having embarked in a measure of such magnitude was that he had for many years been engaged in the consideration of matters connected with road legislation; in connection with the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) in 1865; and subsequently as a member of the Turnpike Trusts Continuance Committee. In October last a meeting on this subject was held at Edinburgh, when a Resolution was almost unanimously passed in favour of such a measure as he now proposed, and he was requested to bring in a Bill accordingly; and although he was aware that, as a private Member, he was incompetent to carry through such a measure, he had not thought it right to refuse the request from such a quarter. So far as the principle of the Bill was concerned he was convinced that it ought to receive the sanction of the House. He did not desire to commit the House to the details of the measure, many of which were doubtless open to and would receive revision in Committee, should the Bill reach that stage, but it was not difficult to show that the principle of the Bill was such as the House might very fairly affirm, and such as had already received legislative sanction for England. The measure was founded on the Report of a Royal Commission of 1859. The Commissioners stated in their Report the effect of the evidence they had received of the evils and inconveniences attending the toll system, and they added that the rapid extension of railways and the consequent diminution of the existing road traffic had materially altered the position of many trusts hitherto prosperous, and whose roads were in good condition, and they said that should there be any further fall of revenue, as was to be anticipated, there was reason to fear that the roads would soon be allowed to deteriorate. If this was true in 1859, it was quite as true and even more so in 1873. If the allocation of the tolls was unequal and unjust then, by what possibility could they be equal and just now? Since 1859 railways had so rapidly extended throughout the country that the argument of the Commissioners as to the result had been greatly strengthened; nor would it be difficult to show that both in Scotland and England the public mind was set upon an alteration of the system of road revenues. So strongly, indeed, did public opinion confirm the Report of the Royal Commission, that since it appeared no fewer than 14 counties in Scotland had, at very considerable expense, obtained private Acts almost exactly carrying out the principle recommended by the Commissioners, and contained in the Bill he was about to ask the House to read a second time. A statement had been prepared which showed the result in those counties which had adopted that principle; and though they did not in every case bear out his conclusions, yet on the whole they were conclusively in his favour. For instance, in Banffshire, which before they got their private Act raised £3,665, the assessment in 1871 was £4,424; in Elginshire the sum raised by tolls in 1862 was £3,427, and the assessment in 1871 £4,480. Selkirk, again, was a very prominent example of the excellence of the new system as compared with the old. In 1867 the sum raised by tolls in Selkirkshire was £1,007, and the sum raised for statute labour by the farmers and occupiers of land £2,430—making a total of £3,437. Under the new system the assessment was only £2,252; so that the occupiers who before paid the whole of £2,430 now only paid the half of £2,252, or £1,126. This being the case in Sel-kirkshire, it was not unfair to assume that similar results, though probably not so large, would be found to obtain in other counties. The present Bill was practically, with certain amendments and improvements, the same as that introduced by the Lord Advocate in 1869, but it contained a clause which was not in the Bill of the Government, but which, he thought, was very important. One of the principal objections urged against a uniform rate of assessment of land and heritages was the inadequate share of taxation which would fall on mines, quarries, and public works, where the use of roads was very extensive, and the damage occasioned by the traffic was accordingly very great, and yet where the rental of the land was comparatively inconsiderable; and in order to meet the undeniable specialities of such cases, the Commissioners thought that such properties might be assessed at twice, or even three or four times the amount of the ordinary rate, as the case might be, on a warrant from the Sheriff or other competent authority, grounded on the certificate of the surveyor, stating that the injury to the roads by the traffic had exceeded double or three or four times the amount of ordinary rate payable in respect of such properties. He had introduced a clause of that nature into this Bill, because he thought that without such a provision it would be impossible to obtain a fair amount of assessment on such properties. At the same time, he did not think it would have any extensive operation, because most large quarries and mines were provided with tramways and did not use the roads at all. The only other clause materially differing from the Government Bill of 1869 was the last, under which power was given to those counties which had abolished tolls, and which were now raising road-funds by assessment, to adopt the present measure in whole or in part, as might be deemed expedient. He did not conceal from himself that there were difficulties involved in the question, and that what might be simple in a small agricultural county might be very difficult in a large metropolitan county. The difficulties were not, however, insuperable, as was shown by the fact that in certain great centres of industry tolls had been abolished, and it was absurd to say that what was done in London could not be done in Glasgow. But of the difficulties by which the question was beset the greatest was that of the debt existing in most cases; but those who were experienced in road legislation must know that a great deal of this difficulty was exaggerated—partly in order to frighten people from bringing forward these measures, and partly in order to maintain an effete system, which was found to suit the officials connected with it. The Commissioners stated the nominal total of the debt on roads and bridges in Scotland to be upwards of £2,300,000—and they added that a considerable portion of this must be regarded as of very doubtful value, much of it being entirely irrecoverable. This was especially the case with regard to the interest unpaid, which had in many cases been kept on the books of trusts without any expectation of its ever being realized, and there would be no doubt that a considerable amount of debt secured on the tolls was in a similar position. In Renfrew, for instance, the unpaid interest was £15,000, while the debt was stated at its full nominal value. The Commissioners said it was absolutely necessary to deal with the question of debt, and expressed their opinion that irrespective of any ulterior legislation, it was imperatively necessary that provision should be made for getting rid of this incubus. The Commissioners asserted that the debt ought to be apportioned equably over each county—which meant that the entire county ought to pay the county's debts. This seemed to be the only principle on which they ought to act. The cases of roads made for merely through traffic might complicate the matter a little, but he thought that on the whole, nothing could be fairer than to say that the debts of a county should be paid by the owners of land in that county. With regard to boroughs, the Commissioners proposed that all turnpike roads within borough boundaries should be handed over to the boroughs which should undertake their future maintenance, and also be liable for the burdens now resting upon them. It was only fair to say that in drafting the clauses of the Bill, he had not absolutely followed the Bill of 1869, on the recommendation of the Commissioners. The Commissioners laid down a rule for apportioning the debt according to the mileage; but in the Bill of 1869 it was found impossible to lay down a hard-and-fast line on this question. There was, however, no reason, where the mileage system was deemed most equitable, why it should not be adopted; and, on the other hand, there was no reason why, in other cases, it should be made compulsory. What he proposed in the Bill was that these mileage questions should be laid before competent persons to be appointed as arbitrators, who would determine what was the fairest way in which the debt should be apportioned. The Commissioners recommended that a commission should be authorized to make a valuation of the debt. He thought he should be hardly treating his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) with proper respect if he omitted to notice the Amendment, or rather the Amendments he had placed on the Paper. The hon. and learned Gentleman had put on the Paper an Amendment, which the Speaker had decided could not be put to the House. This was unfortunate, because he (Sir Robert Anstruther) felt certain that as between the Motion for the second reading and that Amendment, the former would certainly have been preferred. His hon. and learned Friend had since altered his Amendment into an acceptable form, and he (Sir Robert Anstruther) would read it as it had at first appeared, and as it was now worded. As first put forward, the Amendment was—

"That this House declines to entertain any legislation involving new or additional local charges until the question of the relief to be granted from Imperial funds to local taxation shall have been definitely settled."

As the Amendment now appeared, it set forth—

"That whereas the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill involves the compulsory imposition of new local burdens, this House declines to entertain this Bill until the question of the relief to be granted from Imperial funds to local taxation shall have been definitely settled."

Now, he was bound to admit that to a certain extent the Bill imposed a new burden, and he admitted that, in his judgment, local taxation did require assistance from the Imperial funds; but he asked whether the hon. and learned Member for Ayr intended to say, that although by this Bill to a certain extent local taxation would be imposed, yet if they would show that the money would be economically and well spent, he would prevent the carrying of a measure which had the effect of bringing about a saving? The truth was, that the increase of local burdens under the Bill would be not so much an increase in fact as a variation of the incidence of taxation. It appeared that his hon. and learned Friend did not object to the proposal to abolish tolls; once on a time he was in favour of that being done, and of some more equitable system being adopted. His objection to the Bill was that it imposed new local burdens. But having taken the course of objecting to this Bill on the ground stated, the hon. Member ought to take the same course upon all other Bills relating to local burdens. But see what that would involve; almost every valuation Bill would be stopped. He would stop Bills emanating from the Treasury bench, Bills arising from below the gangway, and Bills from the other side of the House. They would have to stop the Juries Bill—indeed, it was whispered that it was stopped already—they would have to stop the Election Expenses Bill, the Bill for the education of Deaf Mutes, the Juries (Ireland) Bill, all the Provisional Orders Confirmations Bills, the Lord Advocate's Bill, and the Poor Law (Scotland) Bill. It was a pity the House took the trouble to throw out the hon. and learned Gentleman's Bill, because his own Amendment would have stopped it. It inferred an increase of local burdens, and his own Amendment would have prevented it from going on. That Amendment, as applied to his Bill, might succeed better than if it were applied to the Government and parties on both sides; but if his hon. and learned Friend did not succeed in destroying him before he destroyed the Prime Minister and everybody else, he (Sir Robert Anstruther) would then have a chance of carrying the second reading of his Bill. He would put himself in the hands of the Home Secretary. If the right hon. Gentleman would give him facilities for going into Committee on the Bill, he would endeavour to make such progress as he could; but, of course, everybody was aware how, in the present mode of conducting business in that House, it was impossible for a private Member to pass a Bill through Committee. If the right hon. Gentleman would give him assistance to pass the Bill through Committee, he would then recommend the whole matter to the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

From the knowledge he had obtained of these Acts, he believed they were working well, and therefore it was not unreasonable to hope that the Government would take an early opportunity of dealing with what they considered to be a very important matter of Scotch legislation. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

MR. ORR EWING, in seconding the Motion, said, he would not enter into details, but would rather deal with general principles. The spirit of the Bill was that the present system of maintaining the roads was inadequate in its operation, expensive in its mode of collection and management, and also insufficient for maintaining the roads in a proper condition. Roads in Scotland were supported under two systems—one being the turnpike system, by which all those roads which used to be the principal links of the thoroughfares in the country were supported by tolls; and the other system was that known as the statute labour roads. These latter roads were under an Act which passed as far back as 1810. At that time the parts of Scotland in which these roads existed did so little trade that the cost of maintenance was perfectly insignificant. The conditions attached to the statute labour roads were that the landowners had the power to manage them—they had the power of laying on the assessment, but the payment came out of the tenant-farmers of Scotland. One could hardly fancy at this time of day such a law could be allowed to exist, and that the parties who paid the tolls, which might be 3 per cent of their rental, should have no voice in the management of the roads; but such was the fact. In some parts these roads were very expensive—in some cases, though the assessment amounted to 3 per cent, the roads were actually impassable. In the county of Stirling the length of the roads under the turnpike system only amounted to 165 miles, while under the Statute Labour Acts there were 394 miles, or more than double that under the turnpike system. It was most unjust that such a system of maintaining the statute labour roads should exist. The assessments were also most unjust in their incidence. In one district of Stirlingshire, where the great bulk of the assessment was laid upon land and fell upon the occupier, the valuation of public works and other heritages amounted to £43,000, while the assessment was laid upon £16,000 only; so that the tenant-farmers paid the whole, while those who used the roads most escaped. He should also support this Bill on the ground of the present system being expensive. It was also unequal. One man might have one or two tolls to pay, although he was only five or six miles from a city like Glasgow; whereas another, who might be as far removed from Glasgow, might have only one toll to pay, and perhaps none. He also believed that £3 per £100 was not sufficient for maintaining the roads. This Bill had for its object the total abolition of the toll system, and for raising a sufficient amount of money by assessment. Out of 33 counties 14 were supported by the system which this Bill provided, but there were still 19 counties where they supported the old toll system. He was warmly in favour of the Bill, and regretted that the hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Anstruther) should take so desponding a view of the probability of its passing this year. He hoped, however, that Lanark and Renfrew would be excepted from the Bill. These counties, having such a large number of people concentrated in boroughs and towns, were in such an exceptional position, that they might reasonably demand legislation specially adapted to their case. Indeed, he saw no chance of passing a Bill this year unless these counties were exempt from its operation. He was, however, quite at a loss to understand the object the hon. and learned Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) had in view in the Amendment which he had placed on the Paper. While he (Mr. Orr Ewing) would willingly do anything to relieve local burdens, he was quite satisfied this Bill would be useful to farmers, who really were an important class; and, as it was not at all likely that the roads would be supported out of the Imperial Exchequer, it was but right that each county should support its own. He could not conceive the reason for the opposition of the hon. and learned Member to a Bill which he might say had the almost unanimous support of the people of Scotland—the conveners of Royal burghs—and the loss of which would disappoint almost the entire body of his fellow-countrymen.

Mr. Orr Ewing

Motion made, and Question proposed: "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Robert Anstruther).

Mr. CRAUFURD in rising to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice—

"That whereas the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill involves the compulsory imposition of new local burdens, this House declines to entertain this Bill until the question of the relief to be granted from Imperial funds to local taxation shall have been definitely settled."

said, the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Orr Ewing) was unable to see on what the Amendment was based. It was very simple. The hon. Baronet who had moved the second reading, said he (Mr. Craufurd) had been in past times, if not now, in favour of the abolition of tolls. He could say he had not changed his views on that subject, and he could still show that he possessed the merit of consistency, but he must say that he objected to the way in which this Bill proposed to deal with the question; but while he objected to this mode of dealing with the subject, he was prepared to accept any equitable method of getting rid of the evil against which the Bill was aimed. No doubt the feeling was very general throughout the country, and among those dignitaries which the hon. Member quoted with so much unction—the conveners of Royal burghs—for whom he felt the respect to which they were entitled, though he generally found them petitioning for objects which he believed to be in the wrong direction. If the hon. Member for Fife-shire (Sir Robert Anstruther) was obliged to him for changing his Amendment, he (Mr. Craufurd) was doubly obliged to the hon. Member for putting into his hands one of the most potent weapons he could have desired—namely, the Returns for the 14 or 15 counties who had adopted the new system. The hon. Member had referred to three only of these, and even these did not support his views. One of these, Banff, where they formerly raised £3,665, now raised by assessment £4,584. In another county they now raised £4,886, exclusive of bridges instead of £2,100 which had been paid by statute labour. In Aberdeenshire where they formerly raised £14,971 by tolls and statute labour they were now assessed at 6d. in the pound and expended no less than £21,685; and it was the same in other counties. In fact the hon. Member had carefully omitted from his statement what was raised under the new burden. His objection to the Bill was that under this Bill there were no limits to the assessment and expenditure—there were no possible means for the ratepayers checking expenditure, and he was convinced that the effect of this legislation would be an immense increase of expenditure without any control over it. Why should the House sanction such an enormous increase of expenditure? As to the Royal Commission, there was a great deal to be said between the state of things in 1859 and the state of things now. It was one thing for a county of its own accord to come to Parliament and say the people were willing to tax themselves in this way, and that in their peculiar circumstances the recommendations of the Royal Commission would benefit them. But here the House was asked to deal by compulsion, and make people follow in the steps of other counties, notwithstanding that some of them had petitioned against this Bill in toto. It was necessary to remember that the circumstances of all counties were not the same, and that a system suitable for one might not be suitable for others. Yet this Bill proposed to apply compulsorily to counties whose circumstances were totally different from those that had obtained local Acts—the system of assessment adopted by the latter, simply because it had been found suitable for them. It was admitted that it was not applicable to some counties—Lanark and Renfrew for instance. Then why not leave it to the counties themselves to come here and get this Bill if they wanted it. If they had wanted it, he thought they would have come here before now. If they persisted in forcing it down their throats when they said it would not suit, and they did not want it—he thought they would impose on them a grievous hardship. The hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Anstruther) had had alluded to the inequality which might be produced by the 47th clause of his Bill. Now, it was partly on account of this very clause that he (Mr. Craufurd) objected to this Bill. He was opposed to any system by which they imposed upon people a charge for maintaining roads utterly disproportionate to the use they made of them. His hon.

Friend said that those who used the roads ought to pay for them. He admitted it; but he believed the system of tolls was at least as equitable as that provided for by this Bill. And now as to the mode in which it was proposed to levy the assessments. Clause 41 said that the one-half should be paid by the proprietor, and the other half by the tenant. If this Bill had been proposed by a burgh Member, he should not have been surprised at an arrangement of this kind; but he wondered what his hon. Friend would say to the tenants among his constituents for supporting a scheme by which, in addition to paying poor rates and other things, they would have to pay the half of the assessment on roads? They paid only 1*d.* in the pound of income tax; under this Bill they would have to pay 3*d.* or 4*d.*, not only on a third of their rental, but the whole amount. On the whole, he thought it would fall most hardly on the tenant farmers. His hon. Friend had referred to the Lord Advocate's Bill for 1869, and had claimed his Lordship's support for this measure. Now, he thought that the fact that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given up the Bill showed that he had grown wiser as he had grown older, and that he had become convinced it was impossible to impose an assessment that would be equitable. He quite agreed that the matter was one which could only be dealt with satisfactorily by the Government, and he did not wish to detract from the labours of his hon. Friend, who had done his work in a most able manner, and deserved the gratitude of those who thought with him. He could not help referring for a moment to the Secunder of the Motion. He thought his hon. Friend the Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing) was hardly justified in being so severe on him for his Amendment. He confessed he could not follow his argument, that the Amendment, as originally proposed, would have blocked the way to all the legislation referred to. Putting aside the forms of the House, to which he had been obliged to conform, there was no difference in the Amendments. The principle in the two cases was the same, and the only effect of the alterations would be that he would have to repeat the Amendment to every other Bill he objected to on the same ground. He could not see how his Amendment in either the one form or the other would have interfered with the Rating Bills of the Government or his own Poor Law Bill. In regard to the latter Bill, the hon. Baronet forgot that if he imposed new charges, he simultaneously had clauses giving relief, for he proposed to tax Government property, and he proposed likewise to get a subsidy for lunatics, and an allowance from the Imperial Fund for medical officers. This, however, was not the occasion to defend his Poor Law Bill. The effect of his Resolution was simply this—He wished the House to refuse to read the Bill a second time, because it imposed inequitably the charge of maintaining the roads in a way to create new local burdens. He thought it desirable to point out what the position of local taxation was, but he had no authentic information beyond the pamphlet he held in his hand. His right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, who took up the question a few years ago, and presented to the House full statistics regarding taxation in England, had carefully avoided giving them anything but most general and, he must add, most useless information in regard to Scotland, and he was not aware that there had been any official supplement to that Return. He therefore had to confine himself to the information contained in the pamphlet to which he had referred. Now, shortly, what had been the results in Berwick as shown by the Returns obtained by the Commissioners. The county assessments for the county of Berwick had during the last 34 years increased 246 per cent, while the value of property in the same county in the same period had only increased 48 per cent. To his mind these figures spoke volumes as to the state of local taxation, and showed how enormously the local burdens were being increased. He was not maintaining that grants should be given out of the Imperial Fund for the support of the roads—though much might be said in favour of that—What he wanted was this—that they should settle how the local burdens were to be relieved before they imposed any new ones. He was quite satisfied the feeling of the country was strong against the inauguration of any more local government until an equitable adjustment of this pressing question had been made. He had heard the party of which he was a member decried because it failed to deal with this question. The education of the country was no doubt supplemented out of the Imperial Funds, and so was sanitary legislation supplemented; but what was wanted was that the whole subject should be taken up, and an understanding come to as to the proportions to be borne by the local and Imperial Exchequer. He did not bring forward his Amendment as any reflection on the Government. He was willing to accept a statement that it was first of all necessary to deal with the Bills now before Parliament. The Prime Minister had declared that the Government accepted the Resolution of last year, and he was willing to leave the matter in the hands of the Government, but he said—do not aggravate the evil; do not increase the burdens, and throw the ratepayers into despair by this legislation which was being forced on them year after year. The Prime Minister had only on the previous day admitted that it was right this principle should be adopted, and intimated that the Government would do what it could to get it acted upon. Under these circumstances, he was willing to leave the matter in the hands of the Government, and he did not see why they should hamper them by agreeing to the second reading of this Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman then moved the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

After a pause,

LORD ELCHO seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "whereas the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill involves the compulsory imposition of new local burdens, this House declines to entertain this Bill until the question of the relief to be granted from Imperial funds to local taxation shall have been definitively settled,"—(Mr. Craufurd)

—instead thereof.

MR. M'LAREN said, he felt a good deal surprised that the noble Lord should have seconded the Amendment, and rather thought that he had done so out of good nature, to prevent his hon. and learned Friend standing in the ignominious position of not having a Seconder—or perhaps that he had not had an opportunity of reading the Amendment. The Amendment was a very curious one. It desired the House to express the opinion that until the question of the relief of local taxation was definitively settled we should do nothing in the way of legislation on this matter. Now, when would that question be definitively settled? He (Mr. M'Laren) did not believe it would be ever definitively settled, and therefore if they passed the Amendment they would never be able to deal with the question at all. They had heard of measures being delayed for such a reason for three or six months, but here they were asked to postpone dealing with the question till the end of the world. Then the Amendment spoke of the relief to be granted. What relief? Where was the Bill proposing to grant relief to local taxation in Scotland? There was a Bill providing for the relief of local taxation in England, but Clause 2, which was passed in Committee, set forth that it should not be applicable to Scotland and Ireland, and he was not aware of any Bill for granting relief to Scotland. It was therefore altogether irregular and improper to propose that this Bill should be postponed until a relief should have been granted of which no one knew anything at all—unless his hon. and learned Friend himself had special information on the subject. On the merits he had gone into a great many questions. He (Mr. M'Laren) would not follow him into all these, but he would endeavour to state some circumstances to the House which he thought it important for hon. Members to know. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the increased rates of assessment in certain counties. Now, there were four or five counties that never had tolls at all; there were others which had obtained Acts for abolishing tolls, and there were 15 now remaining which asked the benefit of a general Act. His hon. and learned Friend said that it was found necessary to expend a great deal more under the systems of assessments, and had referred to the case of Renfrew as an example. Well, a Report had been drawn up by the authorities of that county, in which it was stated that £10,000 would be required annually for the next ten years to put certain roads in the same condition as the turnpike roads of the county. No doubt this was a great exaggeration; but admitting it to be true, how had the roads been allowed to get into such a disgraceful state of disrepair as that in which they now stood? Was it not the result of the present system? It was just like a person coming into the possession of an estate where everything had been allowed to go to wreck and ruin. The new proprietor might have to spend two or three years' rent before he got any return, but it was not his management which was to blame for that state of matters. It was precisely the same in regard to the roads. The hon. and learned Member had spoken of this new expenditure which was required to bring things to an ordinary level, as if it were to be perpetual expenditure. This was most unfair, for while the first expenditure was necessary in order to put things right, there was no doubt whatever that it would have the result of greatly diminishing the expenditure in future years. His hon. and learned Friend had referred to a particular clause as imposing additional burdens on landowners and farmers; in fact, he had come forward as "the Farmers' Friend." Well, he (Mr. M'Laren) attended a meeting of the Chamber of Agriculture in Edinburgh which was almost exclusively composed of farmers, and it was unanimously of opinion that a Bill of this kind ought to be passed. Instead of being aggrieved parties, they were the great promoters of this Bill. Instead of being a Bill to impose burdens on land to an undue extent, it would bring in for the payment of assessments hundreds and thousands who never paid a toll in their lives. As the hon. Baronet said, those should pay for the roads who used them, and therefore the small occupier was justly called upon to pay for walking on them, though he might never have ridden in a carriage in his life. He admitted that there was some difficulty in regard to counties like Lanark, with large cities in their centres, and enormous debts, and he thought that if the authorities of Lanark and Glasgow thought fit to propose a clause providing that the Bill should not apply to the county in question, he should have no objection to it; but it was surely too much to ask that because the county of Lanark and the City of Glasgow did not want the Bill all the other counties in Scotland who desired such a Bill should be prevented from getting it. The increased expenditure which had been spoken of had been considerably exaggerated. The Returns for the county of Berwick were said to show an increase of 250 per cent. That was a very high sounding statement, and was calculated to have a great effect on those who did not know the facts. But it was necessary to see what the rates were as well as the percentage. There was a Paper in the library giving an account of the rates levied in all the counties in England, and information both as to the character of the assessments and the rate per pound. Now, there were 15 counties in Scotland that would be affected by this Bill. No doubt English Members would think from the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Ayr that the local taxation in Scotland was very much higher than in England. If they did so, they would make a great mistake. It appeared, from the Returns made by the Secretary of the Poor Law Board for 15 counties, commencing with Anglesea, that the average rate was 4s. all but a fraction. Deducting the poor rates all the ordinary rates amounted to 2s. in the pound. Hon. Members would, perhaps, be surprised to hear that the average rate of all the counties of Scotland affected by this Bill, not including the poor rate, was $3\frac{1}{2}d.$ per pound, and the county of Berwick, with its flaming statement of increase of 250 per cent, paid $3\frac{1}{2}d.$ Then, with reference to the allegations that these rates have increased in far higher ratio than the property, he would mention that the valuation of these 15 counties had increased from £190,951—say £200,000—to £7,000,000, which was equal to thirty-six fold, or 3,600 per cent. In Ayrshire, the rate was $3d.$; in Forfarshire, 2 2-15d., and so on. But the result was an average of $3d.$ Now, take a year as a curious illustration. His hon. and learned Friend said he could get no authoritative Returns. Now, by request, every county sent to Oliver and Boyd's Almanac a statement of all rates levied, and the amount per pound. Taking the several rates for a year, the county rate was $4d.$, the police $1\frac{1}{2}d.$, the valuation roll $\frac{1}{2}d.$, prisons $\frac{1}{2}d.$, lunacy $\frac{1}{2}d.$, registration of votes $\frac{1}{2}d.$, and cattle disease $\frac{1}{2}d.$ —altogether, $8d.$ per pound for all these charges. In Renfrew, the rates were for prisons $1d.$, police $1\frac{1}{2}d.$, cattle diseases $\frac{1}{2}d.$, and county assessment $\frac{1}{2}d.$,—in all, $3\frac{1}{2}d.$ In the county of Edinburgh—the metropolitan county—it was still more curious. The rates there were—for prisons $\frac{3}{4}d.$, police $1d.$, militia stores 1-24th, registration 1-24th, county rate $\frac{1}{2}d.$, lunacy $\frac{1}{2}d.$, cattle diseases 1-12th—total $2d.$ 8-12ths. Yet, in England, 15 counties, as he had mentioned, paid on an average 2s. each. Now, as to the way the taxes were imposed, he would give an illustration of the anomalies the Bill would redress. There was in the county of Edinburgh a palatial residence which had been in recent time the residence of Royalty, and that was rated at £250 of rent. All that the noble Duke who owned it paid for relief of all these charges was $2d.$ 8-12ths on the £250, which was equal to a sum of £2 15s. per year for rates. There was an hon. Member of this House who occupied a small residence in the same county not two miles from the ducal residence, and this House was rated at £170, but the rates were 1s. 9d. for ordinary purposes, and 7d. for water, making 2s. 4d., and he paid £19 6s., while the Duke paid £2 15s. Then a house in the City he had the honour to represent, rated at £24, paid £2 16s. a-year, or 1s. less than the Duke. The owner of such a house might be a clerk with a salary of £120, and yet he paid 1s. more to the local rates than the noble Duke he had referred to. That showed the wisdom of giving some relief. For the reasons he had given, he supported the second reading of the Bill.

LORD ELCHO said, he admitted he had come to the House without the remotest intention of speaking on the Bill, but he felt bound to accept the challenge given him by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. McLaren). He confessed the hon. Member was right in his conjectures that he had seconded the Amendment to prevent the debate breaking down, and that he had done so without knowing the terms in which the Amendment was couched. He was, however, perfectly cognizant of the nature of the Motion, and he had confidence in the legal and Parliamentary knowledge of the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) to be convinced it would be worded in the best possible form. This was a compulsory Bill, and corresponded with the permissive Bill which he had himself vainly endeavoured to carry against the opposition of the city and county of Edinburgh and the county of Lanark and Glasgow. These two powerful communities were the stopping blocks to any general legislation on the subject; and, therefore, his own county taking a practical view of the subject, applied for and obtained a special Act. Their main road was the principal communication between north and south, and was sufficiently maintained by tolls; but with the railways the traffic fell away, and they were compelled to a change of system. As to what the hon. Member had said about the Duke of Buccleuch, he had forgotten that his Grace likewise paid on every farm of his estate. The question, however, now at issue was not that stated by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, as to what was the best mode of maintaining the roads. There was a new element imported into this matter by the general Resolution which the House had passed in regard to local taxation; it was not a question of the rate of the taxes, but of the proportions which should be borne by the local and Imperial Exchequers. The House of Commons, by a large majority, had decided that this question should be gone into by the Government. The Government had not shirked the task—quite the contrary—they said they accepted the vote and were prepared to give effect to it, and all they stipulated was that they should be left to do it in their own way. After the speech delivered by the Prime Minister on the previous day, he maintained that the Government were not justified in supporting this Bill, or any Bill which proposed to impose additional taxation.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR would support the second reading of the Bill, in the hope that certain Amendments would be made in Committee. He claimed for the county of Kincardine, which he had the honour to represent, the credit of having taken the lead, or at least, of having been foremost in the list of counties in removing tolls, and particularly in reducing the rates at toll gates. Except in one part of the country, it was inexpensive to pass over the roads of Kincardineshire, for the toll rates were singularly low. It was also the desire of the county to effect the early removal of all toll-bars. The county had also the merit of having roads in proportion to the area of the county greater than in any other. There were about 500 miles of roads under management to about 388 square miles. These roads were also in very good condition, well looked after, and very fairly maintained. The economy in keeping up these roads was also shown by the Report of the Commission on Roads to be remarkably low; indeed, the average rate per mile for maintenance was as low as in any of the Scotch counties. This was owing to the intelligent and efficient management of the communications of this county; and the result was brought about by confiding to those most interested in the roads—namely, the tenant farmers—the right to look after the roads. They had not hesitated to carry out amalgamation of roads under one Road Inspector, so as to diminish the cost of management and provide for efficient supervision over the communications within fixed areas. He had no doubt that with similar judicious arrangements throughout Scotland a very great reduction of expenditure on roads could be effected. No doubt, this Road Bill had defects, and when it got into Committee he would propose Amendments calculated to effect improvements in the management of roads of Scotland based on the experience of Kincardineshire. And on this understanding he would give his cordial support to the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Fifo.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that the question was whether it was most expedient to support the roads and bridges of Scotland by a direct tax on property, or by means of tolls. For himself, while the present system of statute labour lasted, he would confine them to tolls. He admitted that there was great room for improvement, but in his own view those improvements could be carried into effect quite independently of anything in the Bill. He quite admitted that this was a difficult question to deal with in detail, but he did not think there were any difficulties which might not be removed in Committee. He admitted that there were some points which would have to be settled, and probably Lanarkshire and Edinburgh would have to be omitted; and there were many cases in which inequalities would have to be adjusted. It was unjust, for instance, in the case of great towns, that a large proportion of the assessment should fall upon its suburban districts—of course, it would be most unjust to call upon the counties to pay tolls for the convenience of the cities. They might just as well impose tolls on the cities for the support of the roads in the counties. He did not see that there was any ground whatever for interfering with the second reading of the Bill, it appearing to him that the promoters of the measure were willing to make an exemption where anomalies such as he had referred to existed. There was another reason why he was unwilling to throw the Bill out, and that was the necessity of making some suitable provision in the case. At present the debts were on bonds given personally by the trustees, secured on the property of the trust. Now, he thought it most unjust that one class of property should bear the burdens which ought to be cast equally upon all, for the purpose of obtaining a benefit which was to be shared by all. For these reasons, he thought the Bill ought to receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, that he did not rise to debate the merits of the Bill, because he did not think himself competent to do so, or to give any opinion which it was worth the while of the House to listen to; but he was anxious to make an explanation with reference to a declaration of his which appeared to have been seriously misapprehended by two hon. Friends. He understood that they put a construction upon some words that had fallen from him recently, assuming that he had entered into an obligation on the part of the Government that they would not, during the dependency of the general question of Local Taxation, make any proposal involving an addition to local burdens. It must be obvious that he could not have made any statement involving such a pledge, and that he could not have done so with consistency; because the Government had at that moment Bills before the House which did impose new local burdens—such as the rating of game, mines, woods, and other descriptions of property. What he did say was, that the Government had not overlooked the Resolution of last year, and that they were desirous to avoid raising any question which would interfere unnecessarily with the general question of Local Taxation; And, as an instance of that desire, he might remind the House that in the discussion on the Juries Bill he stated his hope that the Government would make such a proposal as would enable them to withdraw that portion of the measure which was opposed on that ground. He did not shrink from that declaration of the general intention and desire of the Government; but he did seriously deprecate any Resolution of the House that they will decline to entertain any measure by which new local burdens shall be imposed or old ones shifted until a definite settlement of the whole question of Local Taxation shall have been arrived at.

Mr. ELLICE said, he did not object to the principle of the Bill, but he thought some of the proposals were highly objectionable, and must be altered in Committee. He did not know that it would be possible to introduce one uniform system into Scotland; but there could be no doubt that there was a general wish in Scotland that tolls should be abolished, and that the means of maintaining the roads should be by assessment. He would remind the House, however, that by the present method of raising revenue by tolls, a large proportion was obtained from the general public who actually used the roads; and a large part of this came from visitors. Of course, if they maintained the roads by assessment, that source of revenue would vanish. He thought there could be no doubt that there were exceptional cases in various localities, and that to apply one general rule to all would be to inflict great injustice, and that those places must be exempted from the operation of the Bill and dealt with separately. There was another point of importance, and that was the question of the debts of various trusts. The trustees of roads in Scotland stood on a different footing from the trustees of turnpike roads in England. The latter were secured on the proceeds of the trust, and the persons who lent the money considered the risk and the security; but in Scotland the money was lent on the personal bond of the trustee, and therefore the creditor was safe to be paid his money some time or other. But it did seem hard that one district of the county—take the county of Fife, for instance—should be saddled with a burden to pay the debt of another, and that would be the result of an uniform arrangement. He hoped the Government would accept the second reading of the Bill as an indication that the representatives of Scotland desired to have this matter fully considered and settled, and that they would take up the question themselves and introduce a more complete and perfect measure next Session.

Mr. SCOURFIELD said, there could be no doubt a toll was in theory more equitable than a rate, because the toll supposed that those paid for the road who used the road, whereas a rate was founded upon the attractive principle of discharging your obligations by putting your hand into the pocket of your neighbour. On the other hand, there were incidental advantages which counterbalanced that—in Wales, for instance, the abolition of tolls had proved a great boon. The whole question was one of expediency rather than of principle.

MR. BRUCE said, that it was his intention to vote for the second reading of the Bill, and he would state shortly why he proposed to do so. The subject had caused great excitement in Scotland, and as long ago as 15 years a Royal Commission was issued; and a former Government, of which he was a Member, had brought in a Bill on the subject. Not only that, but the Report of the Scotch Committee, who had made a long and exhaustive inquiry, was unanimous against the continuance of the system of tolls. But while he supported the second reading of the Bill, he by no means intended to pledge himself to the details. The county which he had the honour to represent—Renfrewshire—was in an exceptional condition, and so also, though not to the same degree, the county of Lanarkshire which was represented by his hon. Friend (Sir Edward Colebrooke). With respect to those two counties it seemed to him that it would be the duty of the Committee to consider any fair suggestion, and if the justice of their case was not met, it would be necessary to consider whether they should not be excluded from the operation of the Bill. For he agreed with the hon. Member for St. Andrews (Mr. Ellice) when he said, speaking generally, and not with respect only to these two counties, that in a measure of this kind exceptional cases should be exempted from the general rule. He quite agreed that there ought to be some change with reference to the debt on the trusts in Scotland. Altogether there were 160 trusts in Scotland, and in 16 important counties the debt amounted to £337,000, while the interest had actually risen to £41,000. He thought the question raised by his hon. Friend (Sir Edward Colebrooke) as to the debt was a very proper one; and they ought to consider whether it was not possible to relieve the trustees of their personal responsibility for it—since there existed a common law obligation to repair the roads. In Wales a system not unlike the Scotch system had been found utterly inadequate in many cases to keep up the roads. In consequence an Act was passed dealing with the six southern counties by which the trusts were consolidated and other arrangements made by means of which a small assessment was sufficient to extinguish the tolls. It might be desirable to consider whether in accordance with the suggestion of the hon. Member for Pembrokeshire (Mr. Scourfield), a similar arrangement for Scotland might not have a similar beneficial effect. It was argued that private Acts led to lavish expenditure and to the dissatisfaction of the people, but he did not think that result had followed in those counties which had obtained them. The Acts were similar in principle to the provisions of this Bill. Was there any proof whatever that any dissatisfaction existed at the prospect of this measure becoming law? On the contrary, those counties where the special Acts were in force were well satisfied with the present state of things, and none of them were willing to go back to the old state of things. There had been an increase in the cost of repairing the roads, but that was caused by a rise in the price of labour and material, and perhaps the increase in the population had something to do with it. But besides this there had been an improvement in the character of the roads, and it was a very poor way of looking at the question of economy to consider only increased expenditure without looking for the cause. Improvement of roads was a measure of economy. Increased means of locomotion, and the abolition of restrictions upon it were directly or indirectly a gain to the community; and considering with what spirit public affairs were managed in Scotland, it would be found that in this, as in all cases in which expenditure had been wisely made on a sound system, advantage would follow. It seemed to him that if the people of Scotland called for this measure as they did generally, it was not for the House of Commons to say their wishes should not be gratified. If they were prepared to meet the charge why should they not be allowed to do so? The difficulty now pending respecting the incidence of Imperial and local taxation should be settled as soon as possible; but the delay on this subject should not be used as an excuse for denying to any part of the Empire an improvement in the administration of local affairs.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER, in reply, said, that Returns he had received from counties in which private Acts containing provisions similar to this Bill were in operation fully bore out the statement of the Home Secretary. The statement that had been made to the effect that a very large proportion of the debt on Scotch roads had been secured on personal security of trustees was not correct. In Renfrew the amount of debt secured on personal security was £31,000, and on tolls, £91,000. In Lanark the sum on personal security was £18,000, and on tolls, £254,000. Throughout the whole of Scotland the amount of debt resting on personal security was only £223,000; whereas the amount of debt secured on tolls, and with which his noble Friend would have to deal next year, was £1,345,000.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 124; Noes 115: Majority 9.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday 27th June.

FACTORY ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

BILL 47.

Mr. H. Smith, Mr. Munro, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Phillips, Mr. Colclough, Mr. Johnson.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. MUNDELLA in moving, "That the Bill be now read the second time," said, it was practically the same as that framed by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department last year. He regretted that at that late hour (four o'clock) he should have been called upon to address the House upon a question of much magnitude and importance when there was a chance of the Bill being "talked out." He trusted, however, that as the measure had been postponed until the present time, when there was no chance of fully considering it that day, both sides of the House would agree to the adjournment of the debate, and that the Government would exert their influence to assist him to procure a full and fair discussion of the subject during the present Session. The whole of the factory workers of the kingdom took a deep and intense interest in the Bill; but it was not the workers only; a considerable number of the employers were anxious for that legislation. He knew that he was incurring a grave responsibility in promoting the measure, more especially as it affected one of the largest and most important branches of industry in England; but it was urgent that legislation should speedily take place in the interests of the great body of people who were employed in textile factories. This country, in its textile industry, occupied a pre-eminence over the whole world, and that pre-eminence she had maintained against all competition. With that branch of industry he had been employed, in one capacity and another, all his life, so that he necessarily took a deep interest in all connected with it. The industry with which the Bill dealt employed 1,000,000 of persons in spinning, weaving, and production, and that number was quite irrespective of those engaged in the subsidiary and auxiliary branches of finishing and preparing the article for sale. The exports alone of their textiles had risen to the enormous and unparalleled sum of £120,000,000 a-year, and there was in addition a home trade which, with the exception of America, was unsurpassed by any home trade in the world. He left the House to form some impression from those figures of the extent and magnitude of that giant industry. He had not undertaken the responsibility of introducing the Bill without entertaining the deepest conviction as to its urgent need. He believed that in the interest of the health, the education, and the improved social condition of the vast mass of women and children employed in the factories of this country, the proposed legislation was imperatively called for. He had not lost sight of the economic side of the question; and he had time after time refused to deal with the question, until he had assured himself by personal investigation, and by what had taken place in other countries, that they were in a position to concede what the female and children workers of this country had reasonably demanded. A deputation of mill-owners who waited on the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department last year declared that the agitation on the subject was the work of the overlookers, who were paid weekly wages, and who would have as much for

9 as for 10 hours; that the women and children were not overworked, and were contented; and they prayed for inquiry. The right hon. Gentleman told that deputation, that inquiry had already been commenced, and that whatever might be the effect upon their individual interests or upon trade, if it should be clearly shown that the health and educational condition of the workers required fresh legislation, the Government would deem it their duty to institute that legislation. It had been insinuated in other quarters that the Bill was the work of the trades unions, and that it arose out of a jealousy of female labour. Its object was, it had been stated, to place a serious obstacle in the way of the employment of women. He thought he should be able to satisfy the House that there was no foundation for that statement. In another rather influential quarter it had been said that this was a party move. That could hardly be, when the Bill was supported by some hon. Members opposite; and, he deeply regretted to say, opposed by some Friends of his on his own side of the House. He could only say that on social questions he owed no allegiance to any party, and that he would co-operate with any leader of party or any ally who was prepared to assist in promoting the social well-being and prosperity of those in whom he took a deep interest. He regretted, moreover, that on that question he was opposed to some of his Friends on the benches below the gangway; but he would continue to be opposed to them as long as they took the cold-blooded, economist views they did. The object of the Bill was, to use the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), in reference to a large body of their fellow-subjects, to "effect a reduction in the hours of labour, and to humanize their toil." There was no industry which demanded such ceaseless and restless energy on the part of its workers as the textile industry. They laboured continuously from morning until night, and through winter and summer; and it might be said there was no rest to the soles of their feet. The evils of factory labour had been growing for years, and though those evils had been greatly ameliorated by the Act of 1847, the press of competition had very much intensified since then, and a very cruel system had been invented in many cases, under which over-lookers were paid upon the out-put, and a condition of things, little short of slave-driving, had resulted therefrom. Well, he had introduced a Bill which, as well as himself, had been subjected to a great deal of criticism. In the first place, the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester took the alarm, and Mr. Hugh Mason, a model employer, delivered two presidential addresses on the subject. But he would by-and-by call Mr. Mason into court, and show that he was his strongest ally. The Chambers of Commerce throughout the kingdom, moved by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, got an inquiry instituted, but were not satisfied with the result. The Professor of Political Economy at Oxford was very forcible in his condemnation of the Bill; so was the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), and the estimable lady who bore his name had written a letter on the subject, of which he would only say that it was altogether mistaken. What were the provisions of the Bill? The first proposed to shorten the hours of labour of children, young persons, and women from 60 hours a-week to 54. The second provision would make "half time" less of a misnomer than it was now. In some instances "half time" meant 39 or 40 hours a-week; he would make it 33. His next proposition was, that the hours of labour should be between 7 in the morning and 6 in the evening, so that the hour saved should be in the morning. By his fourth proposition he would raise the age of "half-timers" from 8 to 10. He was perfectly aware that this last proposition was a very weak one, but it was the best which he could frame. His fifth proposal would raise the age of full-timers to 14, with a certain exception. No child would be allowed to work full time until it had reached the age of 14, unless a certain standard of education had been reached. If the third standard was attained by a child of 13, he was content that it should work full time. His last proposition was to abolish an old exemption in an Act of William IV. with regard to silk mills. Through some sort of Parliamentary tactics, silk mills obtained a certain exemption when the Factory Acts passed through Parliament; children were allowed to enter them as half-timers at 8 years of age, and, if 11 years old, to work for 60 hours a-week. Statistics showed that 557,377 women and girls were employed in mills, of whom 184,000 were mothers of families. The question was, were these women, children, and young persons to be left to the mercy of "free contract," or was the measure of 1847 to be made complete? All the provisions of his Bill were recommended by the Commission instituted by the Home Office; the Commissioners were most competent men, and in their Report they stated that they were prepared to recommend that a reduction in the hours of labour should be made. That Report, however, had been most hardly treated by employers of labour outside Parliament, who impugned the personal conduct of the Commissioners, because their Report was against them; but he (Mr. Mundella) trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would stand up and defend their representations. There was no better official in existence than Dr. Bridges, and he had no doubt that Dr. Holms was equally to be relied upon. The Commissioners, like fair men, gave all the arguments for and against the Bill; but what did the employers do? Having picked out all the arguments against the Bill, omitting those on the other side, they published them with their own comments. On the other side, Mr. Mason, who he had before referred to, and who had reduced the hours of labour in his mills from 60 to 58 hours a-week, gave his opinion that the time had come when the hours of labour for children and young persons should be a little reduced, and for doing so he was hunted off the Manchester Exchange; but he added that it could not be done without the intervention of Parliament, and that the reduction should be to half-time. Mr. Redgrave expressed similar opinions, but he knew that the House had its own views on this subject. Nothing that he could say would fairly describe the neglected and miserable condition of children of 11 who had to work in a silk mill 60 hours a-week, no time for meals being deducted, and had to be up at 5 in the morning; and he was sorry to be compelled to say, what he thought a disgraceful thing—how women had to come to the mills through pouring rain, being afraid to be five minutes late lest they should be fined, and had to work in their wet clothes throughout the day. What could be the state of such children as regarded cleanliness, and what could they be expected to learn in an evening school after the labours of the day? He would ask hon. Members, however, how they would like one of their own children of 9 or 11 years of age to be forced to come to the mill at 6 in the morning? As to the poor factory children going to night schools it was of no use, as they only sat down by the fire and fell asleep. And that was the system which was said to be essential to our national prosperity. ["Hear, hear" and "No!"] Yes, it was stated by a Macclesfield manufacturer the other day that the trade of the country was in jeopardy, and would be ruined if the hours of children's labour were curtailed. At the Huddersfield Institution, it was ascertained that half the young women and children could not read or write. At the sewing school, out of 900 women who passed the school, not 100 could read or write, and that might be taken as the general educational average of the factory schools. The hours for women's labour were too long, and the strain on their energies too great. It was painful to see them in the early morning hurrying to the "leaving shop" to leave their children, and then hurrying on to their work. The woman was away from home 12 hours, whilst the man was only nine. What must be the condition of that woman's home under such circumstances? The average death-rate of infants under one year was in England and Wales 17,731 in 100,000; but in Stockport, in 1870-71, it was 24,350; Macclesfield, 18,877; Bolton, 21,750; Ashton, 22,300, and so on. Of 100,000 women between 15 and 55 the average death-rate in England and Wales was 919. In Stockport it was 1,198, in Halifax 1,205, in Huddersfield 1,101, in Ashton 1,191, and in Preston 1,229. In fact, there were from 40 to 50 per cent more deaths of women in these towns than in "the Black Country." In addition to all these, it appeared from a Return of the Factory Inspectors that the number of accidents in mills causing death had largely increased, the number in 1870 being no fewer than 373, while accidents causing injuries had increased from 9,000 to 18,000. For that state of things there was no remedy but the interference of Parliament, and it was for that interference that both master and men waited. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr.

Fawcett) objected to the limitation of the hours of women's labour as placing restrictions on the employment of women all over the country, but as a matter of fact, the Bill would only bring factory labour up to a level with the general labour of the country. The idea, therefore that the Bill would interfere with the employment of women was simply an impossibility. Men might strike work, but women and children would remain under the operation of the existing Acts. Two objections were urged against the Bill. First, it was said it would interfere with female labour. That objection was insisted upon in a letter which appeared in The Times of Monday last, bearing the signature of Mrs. Fawcett, in which the writer stated that the inevitable result of the Bill must be one of two things—either to impose a legislative limit to labour of nine hours a-day over all the country, or place the most serious restriction and impediment to the employment of women. Now, it should be remembered that nine hours was at present the ordinary limit of labour in many parts of the country. The writer added that if it were illegal to employ women in factories more than nine hours a-day it would lead to one of two alternatives—starvation or prostitution. Now, with every respect to this lady, he must say there never was a greater mistake made in this world. He believed in his conscience that if the Bill were enacted tomorrow, so far from limiting, it would increase the demand for the labour of women. He appealed to all their experience in factory legislation. Every child taken out of the factory must be re-placed by an upward movement of female labour. There was a great scarcity of women in Lancashire, and it was quite common when a married factory worker applied for employment to say—“We will employ you, but you must bring your wife with you.” It was well known also that trades unions were subscribing to get wives having daughters to emigrate, because there was a scarcity of women. He was not going to interfere with the labour of women. If the Bill did anything it would increase the demand for them. That was the opinion of Miss Emily Faithfull, who had done so much to promote the employment of women. Women had signed the Petitions in favour of this Bill to a very large extent, and they had raised by subscription not less than three-fourths of the funds to meet the expenses of this movement. The second objection to the Bill was urged on the ground of foreign competition. With regard to that point, Mr. Romaine Callender and Mr. Hugh Mason had both laughed at its dangers, and scouted it as a reason against the reduction of the hours of labour, and both gentlemen had adopted the principle of the Bill in their own factories. Besides, notwithstanding all that had been done in the way of foreign competition, our export of cotton had increased in three years from 1,000 millions to 3,000 millions of yards. He (Mr. Mundella) had no fear of foreign competition, and mainly because he knew that the Englishman was the best worker in the world. If we would only educate our people foreign competition would have no chance against us. The factory with which he was himself connected had adopted the nine hours system, and it had been found, from the greater freshness and vigour of the hands, that the diminution in the hours of labour made scarcely any difference in the production of the machinery. Germany recently, and France at the present moment, had imposed fresh restrictions on juvenile female labour in factories, and he might congratulate himself that he had the support of the principal manufacturers in that House in the same direction. The limit proposed by this Bill would economize fuel, gas, and wear and tear of machinery, and the result would be as much, if not more, work in the 54 than in the 60 hours. He was sorry to have talked out his own Bill; but he hoped the House would assist him to get the question fairly discussed, and he rejoiced to believe that in this as in all other cases the sufferings of the distressed would not appeal to the British House of Commons in vain. In conclusion, he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read the second time.”—(Mr. Mundella.)

MR. FAWCETT, who had a Notice of Motion on the Papers, to the effect—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is undesirable to sanction a measure which would discourage the employment of women, by subjecting their labour to a new legislative restriction to which it was not proposed to subject the labour of men."

simply rose to say, in the few minutes which were left to him, that after the speech of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), extending over an hour and three-quarters, containing such sweeping accusations against large classes in this country — accusations which must be answered in that House — he hoped the Government would give some facilities for the resumption of the debate. The hon. Member called the opponents of the Bill cold-blooded economists. Need he tell the hon. Member that there were men going to oppose this Bill who had won a proud position in this country for their philanthropy and generosity? What would he say to the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Akroyd)? What right had the promoters of the Bill to arrogate to themselves a monopoly of humanity, generosity, and kindness towards the poor? Those who opposed the Bill were quite as anxious as its promoters, that the labouring population should not be overworked, and that their children should be properly educated; that the age of the children should be raised; and that factory inspection should become a reality. They believed, however, that the Bill was founded on a mistaken philanthropy; and there was nothing more mischievous than a meddling philanthropy. The Bill was a mixture emanating partly from trades unions who were jealous of women's labour, and an indirect and dishonest way of getting a Nine Hours Bill for all adults. He would substantiate both those positions on a future occasion.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

MR. DISRAELI asked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to appoint a day for resuming the debate?

MR. BRUCE said, it rested with the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) to fix his own day.

MR. DISRAELI could not help thinking it would be convenient to the House to know to what day the debate would stand adjourned. The right hon. Gentleman said it was for the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) to name the day, but that was a ceremony which they all felt at this time of the Session was not a very substantial privilege. He thought, after the presentation of so many Petitions, emanating from so many thousands of their fellow-countrymen, and remembering that this question was brought forward last year, and submitted to the investigation of a Commission, it was most desirable, and would be appreciated by the country as a gracious act on the part of the Government, if they would, notwithstanding the state of Public Business, fix some day for the resumption of this very interesting and important debate.

MR. SPEAKER said, he must remind the right hon. Gentleman that, according to the Standing Orders of the House, the debate stood adjourned till to-morrow, when it would rest with the hon. Member for Sheffield to propose a day when it should be continued.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that being so, to-morrow he would ask the Government whether they were prepared to make any arrangement for the continuance of the debate.

CONSPIRACY LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of MR. VERNON HARCOURT, Bill to amend the Law of Conspiracy as applied to Masters and Servants, ordered to be brought in by MR. VERNON HARCOURT, MR. MUNDELLA, MR. RATHBONE, and MR. JAMES.

CIVIL BILLS, &c. (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of MR. DOWNING, Bill to amend the Act of the fourteenth and fifteenth years of Victoria, chapter fifty-seven, intitled "An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Civil Bills and Courts of Quarter Sessions in Ireland, and to transfer to the Assistant Barristers certain jurisdiction as to Insolvent Debtors," ordered to be brought in by MR. DOWNING, SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLIN, MR. SMITH BARRY, and MR. WILLIAM SHAW.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 187.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

PRIVATE BILLS.

So much of the Standing Order of the 15th day of March 1859 which requires "that the Examiner shall give at least two clear days notice of the day on which any Bill shall be examined," and also section 9. of Standing Order No. 178, considered (according to order), and dispensed with for the remainder of the Session.

GAME BIRDS (IRELAND) BILL. (No. 127).

(The Viscount Powerscourt.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the difference which at present existed between the law of England and Scotland and that of Ireland in respect of the commencement of the shooting season for different species of game birds enabled the dealers of the former countries to bring game into the Irish markets earlier than the Irish dealers could lawfully do so; and besides the hardship thus inflicted direct encouragement was given to poachers to pursue their unlawful calling. The present Bill was introduced with the view of putting an end to this state of things. Under the Act of the old Irish Parliament—the 37 Geo. III. c. 21, the open season for moor-game, heath-game, and grouse commenced on the 20th August—the Bill proposed that in future it should commence on the 12th August; the commencement of the open season for partridge, landrail, and quail would in like manner be altered from the 20th September to the 10th September.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Viscount Powerscourt.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

ARMY—MEDICAL OFFICERS SERVICE IN AFRICA.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD BUCKHURST moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for—

"Return of the number of Medical Officers of the Army who volunteered and served on the West Coast of Africa between the years 1859 and 1867 under the Royal Warrant dated 1st of October 1858; and also moved for Copy of the said Warrant which relates to medical service on the West Coast of Africa."

The noble Earl was understood to say that under this Warrant several officers had served on the West Coast of Africa in the belief that one year's service would count as equal to two years' service in Europe, and that they would be also under the passport system. These medical officers had volunteered and served under these conditions, which, as he was given to understand, had not been carried out. There were only very few of those medical officers living—he believed that only about 30 of them survived. He hoped that the information on the point which he desired would be forthcoming.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE thought that the noble Earl was labouring under a misconception with regard to the terms upon which the officers referred to had gone to the West Coast of Africa. There was no intention to withhold the information asked for, but he suggested that the medical regulations of 1859, upon which the whole question hinged, should be included in the Motion. There was a House of Commons Paper in existence which contained the names of all officers to whom the noble Earl had referred. It would be well to include that Paper also in the Return.

EARL STANHOPE suggested the addition of a Return of the names of medical officers serving on the West Coast of Africa who had died during the above period.

LORD BUCKHURST agreed to the suggestions made.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

Address for—

Copies of that portion or portions of the Royal Warrant of the 1st day of October 1858, regulating the grades of Medical Officers in the Army;

Of Section 5. of the Medical Regulations of 1859;

Of Articles 296, 297, and 298 of the Royal Warrant of the 3d day of February 1855, regulating the Medical Service on the West Coast of Africa;

Of Clauses 15, 16, and 17 of the Royal Warrant of the 1st day of April 1867 for the Medical Department;

Returns of the Names of the Medical Officers who served on the West Coast of Africa between the 1st day of April 1856 and the 1st day of April 1867, with the dates of their promotions, and their length of service on the coast: and

Of the Names of the Medical Officers serving on the West Coast of Africa who died during the above period.—(The Lord Buckhurst.)

RAILWAY CASUALTIES.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

LORD BUCKHURST said, he had to remind their Lordships that he had on several previous occasions drawn their Lordships' attention to the question of Railway Accidents and the destruction of life resulting therefrom. He had again to trouble their Lordships on the subject. He would at present confine himself to the question of accidents to persons employed by Railway Companies. He found by Captain Tyler's Report for 1872 that 347 persons so employed had been killed during the past year, and 365 had been seriously injured. He believed that these included persons who were not exactly in the employment of Railway Companies, but who were relatives or friends of persons so employed; so that some deduction should be made from the total number. He believed that most of those accidents were caused by carelessness on the part of the men themselves, and by defective machinery and arrangements. An Act had been passed obliging Railway Companies to send in a return to the proper Government authorities; but he much feared that that law was not very strictly observed. He understood it had been laid down as law that a railway servant could not claim compensation for an injury which had been occasioned by the negligence of another railway servant, and that the relatives of a railway servant who had been killed under similar circumstances could not obtain compensation from the Company. Surely, if this was the case, it was a defect in the law which should be remedied. Instead, however, of an alteration in the law, he should like to leave the Railway Companies to take the matter in hand, and provide a system of compensation for the benefit of the survivors of those killed in their service. It appeared from statistics which had been criticized in the newspapers that a large number of railway servants had been killed from time to time, and that their survivors had received nothing in the shape of compensation. He had been told that on the Great Northern Railway alone, within a radius of 60 miles, 60 children had been made orphans since the 1st of January. These were the children of persons who had been in the service of the Railway Company; and in every case, as he was informed, compensation was refused. The want of a sufficient number of hands might also account for many of these accidents. It was well-known that on more than one railway the men had to be on duty for too many hours at a spell. He had been told that there were pointsmen on the Great Northern line who had to work 84 hours a-week, and that some of them had not had a holiday for 18 months.

Moved, That there be laid before the House—

"Return of the number of persons in the service of each railway company in the United Kingdom who had been killed or seriously injured in the discharge of their duties from the 1st of January, 1872, to the 1st of June, 1873, and of the amount of compensation given by the Company in each case."—(The Lord Buckhurst.)

EARL COWPER said, that the Act which required the Railway Companies to furnish Returns of the numbers of persons in their service to whom accidents might occur each year was passed only in 1871, and that 1872 was the first year for which a complete Return could be made out. The Returns for 1872 were all, therefore, that could be produced. These were in the hands of the printer, and would be laid before Parliament, he hoped, in a few days; therefore all he could promise the noble Earl at present was Returns up to December, 1872. The noble Earl would have to wait till 1873 for the whole of the Returns asked for.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

Ordered, that there be laid before the House—

"Return of the number of persons in the service of each railway company in the United Kingdom who have been killed or seriously injured in the discharge of their duties from the 1st of January 1872 to the 31st of December 1872; and of the amount of compensation given by the company in each case."—(The Lord Buckhurst.)

INDIA—BANDA AND KIRWEE PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

LORD CAIRNS asked the Secretary of State for India, When the final accounts of the Banda and Kirwee Booty can be presented to Parliament; and, whether Her Majesty has been, or will be, advised to take the necessary steps for referring any of the claims of General Whitlock's prize agents to the judgment of the High Court of Admiralty, under the Act 3rd and 4th Vic., c. 65?

VISCOUNT HALIFAX said, that the noble Duke the Secretary of State for India had requested him to state, in reply to the noble and learned Lord's Question, that he was not able to answer the first Question, as the information had not been received from India which was necessary to enable him to do so, and that there was no intention on the part of the Government to open up the subject to which the noble and learned Lord's second inquiry referred.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that the troops concerned in this booty were not satisfied with the mode in which their claims had been treated by the Government Departments; they asserted, and maintained the assertion, that they had not received the booty granted to them by the Crown, part of it having been withheld by the Ministers of the Crown; they maintained that their dispute ought to be referred for the decision of a judicial tribunal, and they were not satisfied that their claim should be overborne by the arbitrary action of the Government.

ARMY—COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE FORCES IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it be the fact that the Commander in Chief of the Forces in Ireland has been absent from duty for the last eight months, or for how many out of the last twelve; and, whether during such absence he has been allowed to draw full pay, command pay, and other staff allowances, and particularly table allowance, or whether any of these have been withheld while he has been absent from his command?

SIR HENRY STORKS said, that, in answer to the Question of the hon. Member, he had to state that Lord Sandhurst had received all the emoluments of his office. As regarded absence from duty during the last 12 months, he had been in Ireland from June, 1872, to the 15th of February, 1873, when he took three months' leave of absence for the benefit of his health.

POOR LAW—REFUSAL OF RELIEF—GUARDIANS OF ST. GERMANS.

QUESTION.

MR. CARTER asked the President of the Local Government Board, If his attention has been called to the case of a child, named James Johnson, of St. Germans, Norfolk, whose death is reported to have taken place in consequence of want of proper medical treatment, refused to him by the relieving officer of the parish of St. Germans on the ground that his father was a member of the Labourers' Union; and, in case the report is well founded, what steps he proposes to take in the matter?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, that he was unable to give a decided opinion as to whether or not the report was well founded, as the evidence on the subject was not complete. He had applied to the Guardians for information. They, in their answer, said that whether the relieving officer did or did not mention the fact of the father belonging to the Labourers' Union as a reason for refusing medical relief they did not quite understand, as the relieving officer denied having said so, while at the inquest on the body of the child the mother stated the reverse. The Guardians, however, justified their officer on the principle that the father of the child was perfectly able to obtain the necessary medical attendance. Under these circumstances, he did not think a case had as yet arisen for his interference.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION.

EXPLANATION.

SIR HENRY WILMOT asked the Vice President of the Council, If the answer he is reported to have given to a deputation from the Council of the "General Association of Church School Managers and Teachers," on 23rd April,

"that the cost per head to the taxpayer for the year ending 31st March, 1873, on an average attendance of 1,399,919 children was 12s. 1½d., but that for the year ending 31st August, 1870, it was only 9s. 9d. per head," is correct; and, if so, if he will state the average attendance for the year ending 31st August, 1870, on which the above calculation was based?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the report was substantially though not strictly accurate. What he ought to have stated was that the average cost per child in the last year of the old Code amounted to 9s. 10d., and in the first year of the new Code to 12s. 2d.; and the 9s. 10d. was calculated upon an average attendance of 1,196,257. These were the estimates; and the actual sums paid were—for the year ending the 31st of March, 1871, at the rate of 9s. 11½d.; and for the year ending March 31st, 1873, at the rate of 11s. 11d.

Mr. Carter

NIGHT SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he will give a Return of the number of Night Schools and of Scholars in attendance on them during last winter, when the new regulations were in force; and, whether, without altering the regulations as to attendances, he is prepared to recommend any alteration of the clauses relating to age and standards?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he was unable to give the information required in the first part of the Question, as he had not yet got it, nor would he be able to obtain it until he had the results of the Inspection in his hands. As regarded the second part of the Question, they did not intend making any alteration in the clauses relative to age and standards.

NAVY—ADMIRALTY CONTRACTS. QUESTION.

MR. MILLER asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the stores required by the Admiralty are purchased or contracted for through the agency of brokers, or by open competition, or by application to selected lists of merchants and tradesmen, or by all the three modes; and, whether he is willing to lay upon the Table of the House, or to consent to a Return of the names of the Brokers usually applied to; of the title and place of publication of the Newspapers in which advertisements for Tenders are inserted; and, of the names of the selected Merchants and Tradesmen applied to in each of the several classes of Stores required?

MR. SIAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, that stores were purchased in three ways—through brokers, and by application to selected lists of merchants, but mainly by open competition. Information on the subject had been laid before the recent Committee on Contracts, and hon. Members would be able to refer to the Evidence, as it would be printed and placed on the Table.

RAILWAY COMMUNICATION WITH INDIA.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of M. Lesseps' proposed Railway to connect Russia with India by a Central Asian Railway, Her Majesty's Government are disposed to re-consider their policy as to co-operating with the Turkish Government for the purpose of obtaining a shorter and an alternative route between England and India by the construction of a Railway to connect the Mediterranean with the Persian Gulf; and whether, in furtherance of that object, they are disposed to re-consider the Report of the Select Committee of this House on that subject, so far as it related to the desirability of that object being attained?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he was prevented, by indisposition, from hearing the recent discussion on the Euphrates Valley route, and must be guided mainly by what appeared to be the decisive opinion of the House pronounced on division. Since that time the Government had kept their eyes open to intelligence coming from the East, and they would continue to do so; but they had not seen it to be their duty to take any step in consequence of that intelligence, which would be in contravention of the opinion expressed by the House.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON gave Notice that in consequence of the answer he had received, and seeing the daily increasing gravity of the question, owing to the plans of M. Lesseps on the one hand and Baron Reuter on the other, he should call attention to the subject on as early a day as possible next Session, and move for a Select Committee.

SPAIN—RECOGNITION OF THE SPANISH REPUBLIC.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government are prepared to recognize the Spanish Republic now that it has been formerly ratified by the new constituent Cortes?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have received no official intimation from the Spanish Government on the subject, and I am therefore not in a position to give any reply to the hon. Member's Question. When any official communication is received Her Majesty's Government will lose no time in taking the matter into consideration.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR: In consequence of the reply I have just received, I beg to give Notice that on an early day I shall move an Address to the Crown praying that Her Majesty's Government be directed to recognize the Spanish Republic.

EAST INDIA HOUSE MUSEUM.

QUESTION.

MR. REED asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any arrangements have yet been made for the Exhibition of the Museum transferred from the East India House to Whitehall; and, if not, whether the Collection could be restored to the East of London by being placed in the Museum upon Bethnal Green?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply Sir, to my hon. Friend I have to say that arrangements have long since been made for the exhibition of the India Office Museum, and that it is visited by about 50,000 people every year. That number is greater than the number which used to visit it when it was in Leadenhall Street, and I hope that some schemes with respect to it, which are under consideration at present, may lead to its becoming still more attractive to the general public. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend is aware, however, that the primary object of the Indian Museum is not exhibition to the general public. The Indian Museum is a very important accessory to the department of the Reporter on the products of India, an officer who is in constant communication with manufactures, merchants, and all manner of persons engaged or desiring to be engaged in trade with India, who are continually referring to him and to the Museum for information. I need not say that the more the Museum can be made useful and agreeable to the general public without interfering with its primary object the better shall we be pleased; but it is essential to its primary object that it should remain in or near the place where it now is.

ARMY—RIFLE RANGE, COLCHESTER.

QUESTION.

COLONEL LEARMONTH asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether the Government are taking any steps to provide the troops at Colchester with a rifle range?

SIR HENRY STORKS: In answer, Sir, to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to state that endeavours are being made to obtain a suitable rifle range for the troops at Colchester on reasonable terms. Tenders for land for the purpose have been advertised for, but one only was received, at £800 a-year, with an immediate payment of £500. We are now making inquiries as to the possibility of obtaining on terms which can be entertained certain rights over land adjacent to the War Department property, which is in itself hardly sufficient in extent.

ARMY—CARLISLE FORT.—QUESTION.

MR. MCCARTHY DOWNING asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether it is the fact that the fortifications in progress at Carlisle Fort, on the Cork Harbour, are to be stopped for want of necessary funds or other cause; and, if so, when it is supposed the works may be resumed?

SIR HENRY STORKS: No, Sir, it is not the fact that the fortifications at Carlisle Fort are to be stopped.

IRELAND—ACTS OF SUPREMACY AND UNIFORMITY.—QUESTION.

MR. JOHN MARTIN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in this Session, to bring in a Bill for the complete repeal of the Acts first Elizabeth, chapter 1, and thirteenth Elizabeth, chapter 2, the penalties under which were at least partially repealed by the Act ninth and tenth Victoria, chapter fifty-nine?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that the Question of the hon. Member did not bear upon its face what it really referred to. It really referred to the recent judgment in the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland delivered in the case of "Father O'Keeffe v. Cardinal Cullen." That case was now under appeal, and until it had been finally determined by the legal tribunals in that country, it would be premature on the part of the Government to enter into any consideration of the question.

ARMY—MILITARY HOSPITAL AT PORTSEA.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance,

Whether he has received a memorial from certain inhabitants of Portsmouth, objecting to the erection of a Military Hospital for Contagious Diseases in a site in close proximity to the town of Portsea, on the ground that it would be highly dangerous to the public health; whether it has also received a memorial to the same effect signed by the medical men of Portsmouth; and, whether it is the intention of the War Department to persevere in the erection of the building on the site objected to, or whether steps will be taken to select another site?

SIR HENRY STORKS: Sir, both memorials have been received. The memorial of the inhabitants was referred to the Army medical authorities, who gave it as their opinion that there were no grounds for alarm; and as it appeared that no other equally suitable site could be obtained, except by allotting a portion of the land intended for the people's park, the memorialists were informed that the Secretary of State was unable to comply with their request. The second memorial—that signed by the civilian medical men of Portsmouth—has been referred to the Army Medical Department, and is still under their consideration.

MASTER AND SERVANT WAGES BILL—

THE TRUCK SYSTEM.—QUESTION.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he still intends to introduce during this Session the "Master and Servants Wages" Bill, or any other measure dealing with the Truck system?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that it was not his intention to introduce such a Bill as was indicated by the Question of the hon. Baronet during the present Session, for two reasons—first, because it would be impossible for any measure to give satisfaction to both parties under present circumstances; and, secondly, because, since the publication of the Report of the Commission, the Truck system had very generally ceased in consequence of the action of the men themselves. It was highly inexpedient to introduce legislation in a period of transition, or until the further course of events had been observed, and the necessity for a stronger measure than the existing law established.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE ATTREK VALLEY.

QUESTION.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government can give the House any information as to the intended occupation of the Attrek Valley by the Russian Government; whether the Russian Government have claimed possession of this valley; whether the route along this valley is not the direct road from the Russian Forts on the Caspian to Herat; and, whether any communication has been received from any Foreign Power by Her Majesty's Government or by the Government of India upon the subject?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, with respect to the first and second Questions of my hon. Friend, the Foreign Office have no official information upon those points. With regard to the third Question, I confess that I am not sufficiently acquainted with the roads and passes in Asia to be able to hazard an opinion; and, as touching the fourth query, I may say that no such communication has been received by Her Majesty's Government, and the Government of India is not in direct communication with Foreign Powers.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS—THE FACTORY ACTS, AMENDMENT BILL.—QUESTIONS.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government will grant a day for the continuance of the discussion on the Second Reading of the Factory Acts Amendment Bill?

MR. D. DALRYMPLE asked whether, considering the position in which his Bill had stood on the Paper on the evening when the crisis on the Irish University Bill occurred, he had not a prior claim to the hon. Member for Sheffield?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, it was beyond his power to determine the relative importance of the Bills of the hon. Members. The fact was that the Government were in a great difficulty at the present moment with reference to the Public Business, and therefore it would be impossible for him to give any decided answer to the hon. Member for Sheffield at the present moment. The Second Reading of the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill stood for that night, and there were also the Bills of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, and one or two minor measures to be disposed of within a certain limited time. The Bill of the hon. Member for Sheffield was not only of very considerable importance, but was one on which it was desirable that there should be full and complete discussion. He trusted that the hon. Member would take his assurance in a friendly spirit that the Government would meet his views by giving him an opportunity of bringing on his Bill at the proper period of the Session, when a discussion on it would not be ineffectual.

THE CIVIL SERVICE—CASE OF THE WRITERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. OTWAY wished, in asking a question of the Prime Minister, to be allowed to make a personal statement relating to it. On Tuesday he had given Notice of Motion for an inquiry into the complaint of some hundreds of persons in the Civil Service. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hants (Mr. Cowper-Temple) had precedence of him for that evening; but was not there to proceed with his Motion. In his absence the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair called upon him (Mr. Otway) to proceed with his Notice; but though he was close to the door he was unable to comply with the direction. During the last Session of Parliament he had given Notice of a Motion similar to that of Tuesday last, and he was induced to withdraw it in consequence of a statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer from his place in Parliament. Under these circumstances, he appealed to his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government to grant him facilities for bringing forward the Motion. It was a grave matter that a large body employed in the Civil Service should be discontented; and as they alleged in consequence of the non-fulfilment of promises made by a Minister of the Crown. He did not ask his right hon. Friend to state that night what day he would grant, but he would undertake to state and dispose of the question, if the Committee of inquiry was granted, so far as he was concerned, in five minutes; and whatever debate might arise on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's reply need not occupy any great amount of time, probably at the utmost not more than two or three hours. The question affected between 3,000 and 4,000 Civil servants of the Crown, and it was most desirable that it should be settled as soon as possible.

COLONEL BERESFORD wished to know why the hon. Member had lost seven or eight minutes on Tuesday night by being closeted with the hon. Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Glyn)?

MR. OTWAY said, he had not the slightest desire to repudiate the friendly feelings which existed between himself and the hon. Member for Shaftesbury, and would only reply that the meeting did not last three minutes; and the conversation referred solely to the Motion which he (Mr. Otway) intended to bring on at a later hour.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was evident that the hon. Member for Chatham had been beguiled on his way to the House. The Question of the hon. Member was, in fact, answered by the statement he (Mr. Gladstone) had just made in reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Sheffield, that the Government had no immediate time at their disposal. He was told by the hon. Member that the number of those gentlemen was between 3,000 and 4,000. The fact was, as he was informed, that the number employed, not in the Civil Service under the Crown, but certainly in the Civil Service Department, was about 1,100. He quite agreed that the question was one which should be settled as speedily as possible consistently with the demands of the Public Business. What he would suggest was that the points in discussion, which were few in number and exceedingly narrow, should be thoroughly considered between the hon. Member and the Government; and if that were done he did not believe that even the five minutes which the hon. Member said would be all he required to state his case, would be requisite. If that suggestion was not assented to, the hon. Member might perhaps return to the subject.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day subsequent to the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relative to the Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL. (Lords.)—[BILL 154].

(Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [9th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is inexpedient to abolish the jurisdiction of the House of Lords as an English Court of Final Appeal."—(Mr. Charley.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. LOPES said, that the measure introduced into the judicial system of the country most vital and important changes. It proposed to reconstitute and remodel the Law Courts of the country; to abolish the House of Lords as an ultimate Court of Appeal; and by a schedule of rules so vague and uncertain that no practitioner could determine whether for the future Equity or Common Law pleading was to prevail, to create a new form of procedure in substitution for that which was well defined and well understood. The charges against our present system of Judicature were embodied in the speech of the Attorney General. That hon. and learned Gentleman said that at the present time there were two systems of Jurisprudence in this country—one a system of Law, and the other a system of Equity—and that those two systems were invariably conflicting with each other. He (Mr. Lopes) submitted that it was not a very true description of the two systems. It was perfectly true that a system of Equity had grown up in this country in order to meet the requirements of modern times—requirements that the Common Law was not sufficiently elastic to meet; but these two systems were not disconnected, distinct, and antagonistic systems; on the contrary, they were closely allied. They were both administered under the same Statute Law, and proceeded according to the same great maxims of Jurisprudence. He perfectly agreed with the Attorney General that it was impossible to have a fusion of Law and Equity, and all they could aim at was to have a concurrent administration of the two systems. But how would the consolidation of all the Courts into one Supreme Court in any way promote a concurrent administration of the two systems? Was any one so credulous as to believe that, after this Bill became law, if anybody desired to enforce a contract he would do otherwise than go into Division No. I., which would be the Equity Court, and file a Bill for specific performance; or so credulous as to believe that if anybody wished to sue for damages he would go anywhere else than to Divisions II., III., and IV., which would be the Common Law Courts? It was proposed by this Bill to disestablish these Courts in order to re-establish them under another name. If the object of consolidating the Courts was to promote more easy interchange of legal and judicial strength, the Government ought by a bold measure to do away with the old lines of demarcation, and constitute a Supreme Court free from any barriers of the kind. The Attorney General said one of the great evils we had to contend with was that at present a suitor often could not obtain full redress without being driven from one Court to another. That he (Mr. Lopes) admitted was an evil which required a remedy; but the Judicature Commissioners had suggested a much more easy remedy for it than was proposed by this Bill. They advised that there should be a concurrent administration of these two systems, and that every superior Court should have the power of deciding all questions of Law and Equity between the parties. Many years ago the Court of Exchequer administered not only Law, but Equity. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL: It administered both systems, but not by means of the same procedure.] Both systems were administered by means of the same Judges, and he defied the Attorney General to say that plan was unsatisfactory to the suitors, or that they had any reason to complain of it. The hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), said that the Common Law Judges could not administer Equity.

But there was no such great mystery in the administration of Equity that a highly-trained legal man could not deal with all questions of Equity as well as Law that might arise in any ordinary actions. He (Mr. Lopes) appealed to the Attorney General whether there was one case out of 50 of the cases which came before the Common Law Courts in which a question of Equity arose. It was not very long since the Court of Chancery was empowered by Act of Parliament to administer certain portions of Mercantile Law, and he appealed to members of the Equity Bar whether Judges of the Court of Chancery had proved unequal to the occasion and had not given satisfaction to the suitors. Then, again, the duties of the Divorce and Probate Court had been discharged by three Common Law Judges new to those duties, not only with the approbation, but the admiration of the profession and of the whole community. He did not agree with the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Osborne Morgan) that if new functions devolved upon Common Law Judges they would be unwilling to use them. The Judges had been willing to use the powers already given to them. The true state of the case was this—that although the different Commissions which had sat on these questions over and over again recommended that large powers should be given to the Judges so as to enable them to deal with every case that came before them, yet when the House was called on to give effect to these different recommendations, the Acts of Parliament passed had always fallen short of the power required to carry the recommendation into effect. He maintained—and that was the Attorney General's own statement—that the two main objects to be sought in the Bill were, first, the concurrent administration of Law and Equity; and, secondly, the giving of power to every Judge to afford full redress to the suitors, and that in order to secure these objects it was not necessary to reconstitute the old Courts of this kingdom. The objects might be obtained in the much easier way recommended by the Commissions referred to. If, however, it was necessary to consolidate the Courts, the Bill proposed to do so in a most imperfect way by keeping up old distinctions which were useless. Then it was proposed to abolish the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords for English cases, and many expressions had been used which were far from courteous or respectful to the noble and learned Lords who exercised jurisdiction there. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Osborne Morgan) spoke of them as a kind of Greenwich Pensioners. The Solicitor General called them octogenarians. The Attorney General contented himself with describing them as an irresponsible body—which he supposed might be applied without much harm being meant or done to any Court of Final Appeal. He would not abolish the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords, because he believed such abolition to be unconstitutional. He would not stop to ask whether it might detract from the dignity of the House of Lords, but was it not possible that it might detract from the strength and dignity of the Judicial Bench? The Judiciary of this country had always been regarded as part of our political system. The Judges had always been the Constitutional advisers of the House of Lords; but they were now reduced, from this high position in the State, to be a mere Department of the Executive. With respect to the character and composition of the House of Lords as an Ultimate Court of Appeal, he readily admitted that it should not continue to be an Ultimate Court of Appeal without certain additions to its strength as such, and certain provisions for a more continuous sitting at Westminster. But those were matters which it would not be difficult to bring about. As a Court of Ultimate Appeal the House of Lords had hitherto possessed the confidence of the country; and the decisions of that tribunal, as recorded in the Reports, had almost invariably been received by the profession with respect and satisfaction. What were we about to substitute? The Court of Exchequer Chamber and the Lords Justices were to be abolished as Courts of Appeal. In their place were appointed nine gentlemen. The five ex officio Judges who were also to be members could not sit upon it, for they were to act as the heads of their respective Courts, and not even Judges could be in two places at once. Nor could you rely upon the attendance of the additional and unpaid members. There would thus in practice be nine members of the Court of Appeal. But under the Bill, the Court of Appeal might be subdivided into three Courts, of which three members would be a quorum. Would anybody contend that a Court constituted of three Judges as the only and the final Court of Appeal could be so satisfactory a Court as the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords? But the House of Lords would still have jurisdiction in Scotch and Irish cases; the Judicial Committee would still deal with colonial and ecclesiastical cases; and these, with the new Court, would form three Courts of Appeal, perhaps giving contrary decisions in some respects. This would be a very unsatisfactory state of things. The proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee was justified by the skeleton schedule of rules alone. It was a complicated and technical subject, and he would only say, therefore, that the schedule would do away with two established systems of pleading, well-known and understood, and substitute a third of which we knew nothing. Such a subject could not be considered in this House. Nor was the matter an unimportant one, for this schedule contained the machinery upon which depended the success or failure of the new system. Surely the settlement of the rules was a matter for a Select Committee? The hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James) was of this opinion before he changed his mind, as hon. Gentlemen on the Government side of the House were accustomed to do. The hon. and learned Member thought the passage of this Bill this Session would be imperilled if it was sent to a Select Committee; but it had better be dropped at once than allowed to pass in an imperfect state. It had been said that professional men could not spare the time to sit on the Bill in Committee; but they had never been asked. It was by no means certain they would not, and certainly a Select Committee would be a less tax on their time than a Committee of the Whole House. The Solicitor General had furnished a most unanswerable argument in favour of this course. If a longer time had been devoted to the Bill, he had said at the close of his speech, it might have been made more perfect and more workable. No stronger argument could be urged for sending it to a Select Committee, and he left the proposal with confidence in the hands of the Solicitor General. There were two matters of detail which especially required attention. He strongly objected to the provisions enabling a Judge to refer matters involving "any local and scientific questions" to a referee. The power was too large. At present a Judge had no power to refer except in the case of mere matter of account, and then it must be to a Master or officer of the Court. Under these powers the Judges could send almost any case to a referee, for what case did not involve local or scientific matters or questions of account? The hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Matthews) had rightly said this was creating a number of inferior Judges, for it was absurd to suppose the Judges would reject the opinion of a referee on a matter of fact when once it had been taken. The Solicitor General, in reply to this, had charged the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan with not having read the Bill; but if he denied this interpretation of the clause, he laid himself open to the charge that he had not read the Bill, at least for any useful purpose. He also objected to the proposal to remit proceedings before notice of trial to Registrars, especially because there would be no appeal from their decision. In London these proceedings were deemed most important, and an appeal was allowed at every stage. Besides, the proposal in the Bill would work unfairly to one of two litigants living at a distance from each other. We should have District Registrars all over the country discharging the same duties, but coming to different conclusions. For instance, the District Registrar of Liverpool might take a different view from the District Registrar of Exeter, the consequence being that there would be no uniformity in the decisions. The best course for the Government to pursue would be to let the Bill lie fallow until next Session. That would be much better than passing a measure which the Solicitor General admitted to be wanting in detail and not so workable as it might be made. If the measure was a good one, it would stand the test of criticism and come before the House in a stronger form. If not, it might be discussed and digested during the long vacation, and many of its defects might then be cured.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that having passed more than a quarter of a century of his life at the Chancery bar, he still, although he had now left it upwards of half that time, retained sufficient interest in all matters connected with the administration of justice to be desirous to make a few observations on the very important measure now under consideration. He would first address himself to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley), who had not received much encouragement in the course of the debate, the only speakers by whom he was strenuously supported being the hon. and learned Members for Dungarvan and Launceston (Mr. Matthews and Mr. Lopes). Without travelling again over all the arguments so ably urged by the Attorney General in his opening speech, he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) would mention two or three practical considerations which were of themselves sufficient to show the expediency of abolishing the House of Lords as an English Court of Appeal. In his early days at the bar the prevailing impression certainly was that ex-Chancellors were—he would not say bound—but certainly expected to give, in return for their retiring pensions, constant attendance on the hearing of appeals, unless prevented by some grave cause, such as serious illness. But whatever understanding of this kind might have existed 30 or 40 years ago, there was clearly no such understanding now. Noble and learned Lords absented themselves if there was the slightest personal inconvenience in their attending; and during the last few years some of them had given, for a proper consideration, their services in private arbitrations. This last practice not only had the effect of leaving to them for the hearing of appeals only those fractions of their time which they did not require for recreation, and could not more profitably employ elsewhere, but it had a more serious consequence still, to which the Law Officers of the Crown had been probably prevented from referring by the restraints of official reserve. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid), however, felt himself at liberty to declare his opinion that this new usage tended seriously to lower the character of the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal, and to render inapplicable all that had been said of its prestige and of the reverence felt for it. How, indeed, could suitors retain such reverence when the learned individuals who one day formed a part of the Supreme Court were found the next day devoting their time to matters of which any eminent barrister might dispose, and in which the most eminent barristers usually declined to employ themselves, because they preferred a different kind of occupation? These noble Lords indicated by the course they pursued their concurrence in the idea mentioned by the Attorney General a few nights ago, that a lawyer's opinion obtained without direct payment was usually worth exactly the sum given for it. Then, again, the hon. Members who contended against the abolition of the jurisdiction of the Upper House in English Appeals must feel how hopeless their contention became through the very fact that that House had sent down to us the measure under consideration. These hon. Members were, to use a French phrase, "more royalist than the king," more attached to the authority of the House of Peers than the Peers themselves. This position of things recalled the old legend about the Pope who was accused of heresy before his own tribunal, found himself guilty, adjudged himself to be burned, and was burned accordingly—" Judico me cremari," he said. "Et crematus fuit." The House of Lords had pronounced sentence, not indeed against themselves personally, but against their Appellate Jurisdiction; and we might well lay to heart the principle suggested by the legend, that when accused parties condemned and passed sentence on themselves, the sentence might be carried into effect without much risk of injustice. It was strange that the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) and others who had cited the arguments used by eminent Law Lords not many years ago in defence of the Appellate Jurisdiction did not perceive that these arguments had now become authorities on the other side. For when we found that such distinguished men had by these arguments indicated not long since their natural leaning in favour of the authority of their order, and that nevertheless some of them actually supported, and the others acquiesced in, the present Bill, we were driven to the conclusion that they had been unable to dispute the accumulating proofs of the inconvenience of the Appellate Jurisdiction, or to withstand the irresistible logic of facts. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) would now pass to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr.

Osborne Morgan) for the appointment of an Equity Judge to each Division of the proposed High Court of Justice. In that Amendment he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) concurred, on the simple principle that men, however able, generally did best the work to which they were most accustomed. He understood that in "another place" that principle had been contested by some of the leading supporters of the Bill. But, however that might be, it had been frankly admitted by the Attorney General; and the only question that remained between him and the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire was how and when the requisite assistance of an Equity Colleague was to be provided for each of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer. The Attorney General objected to that being done by an express provision in the Bill. But he would at least admit that the Bill ought not to contain provisions which would make it difficult or impossible, and that, for the present, at least, the 28th and 31st clauses did. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL here intimated that he proposed to alter those clauses so as to obviate any difficulty about the appointment of the Judges required.] That being the case, he would not pursue this branch of the subject, but would say a few words on two or three other points. The hon. and learned Member who had last spoken (Mr. Lopes) had said that all that was required was to enable all the Courts to decide questions of Equity as well as Law. But, independently of the creation of a new Court of Appeal, this, as he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) understood the matter, was the principal thing that was done by the Bill. To the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee he could not agree. The hon. and learned Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had disputed, but the hon. and learned Members for Dungarvan and Llanecston (Mr. Matthews and Mr. Lopes) had frankly admitted, that reference to a Select Committee was another phrase for postponement to next Session; and, indeed, considering the vehement dissent which the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan had expressed from the most important portions of the Bill, it was to be wondered that, instead of deferring it till next Session, he did not propose to defer it to the next century.

Sir Francis Goldsmid

True it was that there were some slips in the Bill. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) had himself remarked one in Clause 21, Sub-section 3, which sub-section was intended to enable a defendant to bring before the Court another person as defendant, in order that the whole matter might be adjudicated upon. The provision as it stood would enable B, against whom A had brought an action to recover possession of an estate in Yorkshire, to tack to the action a proceeding against C, who had never had anything to do with Yorkshire, for an assault committed by him against B in the streets of London. But this, and some other minor errors, might be easily corrected. It was not a measure ill-drawn throughout, and of which the imperfections could only be removed, if at all, by the labours of a Select Committee. On the contrary, the Bill, as a whole, was framed with a skill worthy of the distinguished man who was understood to be its author. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) therefore hoped that it would be allowed to go to a Committee of the Whole House, and he had no doubt that it would be reported by that Committee in a shape which would make it workable, useful to suitors, and beneficial to the country.

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY said, that the gravity of the question and the importance of its being dealt with at an early period were admitted on all hands; but whether the present was the best time for so doing was a matter of doubt, for he had a strong conviction that until they had codified the law, and provided fitting habitations for our several tribunals, it was impossible to expect that they could have even approximately any complete amalgamation or blending of the two systems of Law and Equity. Still, they might with great advantage pave the way for that improved and more perfect system to which they hoped at some time to attain by carrying into effect the following three substantial proposals:—Firstly, the consolidation into one Supreme Court of the several Superior Courts of Law and Equity, together with the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Courts, and also the London District Court of Bankruptcy; and the vesting in that Supreme Court and its various Divisions and sub-divisions of all the jurisdiction and authority which could now be exercised by either or all of the several Courts of which it was to be constituted. Secondly, the introduction into that Supreme Court of a procedure as uniform as might be consistent with the various classes of cases brought under its cognizance. And, thirdly, that in all cases where the rules of Law and Equity conflicted, effect should be given to the rules of Equity. To each of these three propositions he gave his full and entire assent, believing that if they could be carried out they would be taking a decided step in the direction of that amalgamation of Law and Equity to which they were all looking forward. However, as regarded two of those propositions, he dissented in several respects from the particular modes in which it was now sought to give them effect. He might be told that these were matters of detail for consideration in Committee rather than on the second reading; but, nevertheless, they involved principles of very great importance, and he trusted the Attorney General might see in some of the objections which he was about to state further reasons, in addition to those already urged, for agreeing to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. His chief objection to the measure was the proposed constitution of the Supreme Court of Appeal. It was to be composed of three classes of Judges. The first class consisted of Chancery Judges who had hitherto—with the exception of the Master of the Rolls—sat as a Court of Appeal in Lincoln's Inn, dealing with appeals from the Court of Chancery alone. The second class consisted of Common Law Judges who had heretofore sat at Westminster Hall, in the Exchequer Chamber, disposing of questions of Common Law; and the third, of Judges who had sat in the Council Chamber at Whitehall hearing, among other cases, appeals from the colonies. How could they expect that any change would be made in the nature of the duties which these several classes of Judges would have to discharge when that Bill became law until they had provided proper accommodation for them in the new Courts? While things remained as they were now, did anybody suppose they would have Judges going from Lincoln's Inn to assist other Judges at Westminster? The inevitable result of what was proposed by the Bill would be, that they would have the same Judges, though under different names, discharging the same duties in respect to appeals as they did at present. He was bound to say he did not see any great objection to that. Some years must elapse before they had the law codified and the new Courts built, and in the meantime what they were going to do must be in the nature of an experiment, or transition only. If, then, they conferred on all the Judges equal power and authority, and also applied an uniform procedure to the several Courts, he should not object to the Courts of Appeal remaining substantially as they were now, provided the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was not abolished. With regard to the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, his objection to abolishing it did not arise out of any feeling but by so doing the importance or the dignity of their Lordships' House would be interfered with, for they were all aware that for many years past that jurisdiction had been exercised, not by the House in its integrity, but by the judicial Members of it, and every suggestion for increasing its judicial power had proceeded upon principles which would have rendered the tribunal still less than before a representative of the hereditary element of their Lordships' House. Until, however, it had been ascertained what would be the working of the new Court of Appeal which it was proposed to create, it was not, in his opinion, desirable to part with the ultimate right of appeal to the House of Lords. After the new Court was constituted, and had done some work, it might be found that the appeal to the House of Lords could be safely and advantageously abolished; but until that was ascertained, it was of the utmost importance in the interests of the public at large to retain the appellate jurisdiction of the Peers. This was exactly the view taken by the Judicature Commissioners in their first Report. The Commissioners said—"It might hereafter deserve consideration, after experience of the working of the Court, whether its decisions may not be made final;" but "in the meantime" they recommended that there should be an appeal to the House of Lords. His hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, referring to what had been stated by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Matthews), drew attention to an earlier passage in the Report, which he seemed to think took away from the effect of the passage he had just quoted; but he saw nothing of that kind in the paragraph referred to. The passage to which the Solicitor General referred was to this effect—the Commissioners did not consider it within the scope of their Commission to pronounce upon the constitution of the House of Lords, considered as a Court of Appeal; their only suggestion was this—that inasmuch as the Lord Chancellor was President of that tribunal when it sat he was prevented from sitting in the Court of Chancery for four days a-week while Parliament was in Session. They had indicated no doubt or hesitation as to the qualification of the House of Lords for the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. Looking to the names appended to the Report of the Commissioners—and it was impossible to have selected a body of men better qualified for the discharge of the duty intrusted to them—he observed that the name of the Attorney General was among those who concurred in the Report. They had, therefore, got the distinct recommendation of the Commissioners to the effect that, until they had experience of the newly-suggested Court of Appeal they should retain the House of Lords as a Court of Ultimate Appeal. The practical results of the labours of the House of Lords would show how important it was to reserve to suitors the right and privilege which they now possessed. By reference to the reported cases of the decisions of the House of Lords he found that, during the last seven years, in 23 English and Irish appeals they had reversed the decisions of the first Appellate Court, and in 11 of those the first Appellate Court had affirmed the decision of the Court of First Instance. In every one of these cases, therefore, the suitor would have been denied the justice which he ultimately got, if it had not been for the existence of the House of Lords as a Court of Final Appeal, and he had never heard it asserted that any of those decisions had given dissatisfaction either to the profession or to the public at large. There was another view that might be taken of this matter. If they were asked to abolish the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, not on the ground that a new Appeal Court was certain to work well, but because the House of Lords was unsatisfactory as an appellate tribunal, would it become more efficient, if, when deprived of the Lord Chancellor and perhaps of some of the other Law Lords, it was retained as a Court of Appeal for Scotch and Irish cases? Another objection to the new Court of Appeal was the inadequate proportion of Equity to Common Law Judges. As at present proposed, the Court of Appeal was to be composed of Common Law and Equity Judges in the proportion of three to one, and yet this was the Court which was to give effect to the rules of Equity when the rules of Law and Equity conflicted. The public would not be satisfied with such a constitution of the Court of Appeal unless there was an ultimate right of taking a case to the House of Lords. As to the High Court of Justice, the Attorney General, assenting to the spirit of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) for adding an Equity Judge to each of the Common Law Divisions, had stated that the Lord Chancellor intended, as vacancies arose on the Common Law Bench, to appoint Equity lawyers, and that he had reason to believe Lord Cairns, in the event of a change of Government, was prepared to do the same. It was a strange thing that the House should be asked to pass a Bill admittedly defective on a promise or suggestion that the deficiency would be supplied by the present or a prospective Chancellor. It was the more unsatisfactory because, as he read the Bill, Common Law Judges would no longer be appointed by the Lord Chancellor, but, as the Equity Judges were now, by the Premier. He had shown that he objected to the immediate abolition of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, and to the want of sufficient provision of Equity Judges in the constitution of the Supreme Court. There were a variety of other matters in the Bill which required very careful consideration; but they were mere matters of detail which could be very well settled in Committee. The appointment of referees and district Registrars within certain limits might be very desirable; but so far as regarded the extreme power proposed to be conferred upon them it would be most disastrous if the Bill passed in its present form, and would lead to enormous expense on the part of the suitors without conferring on them any corresponding advantage. If they passed beyond the clauses of the Bill to the number of rules contained in the Schedule, there was ample work provided for many days' consideration, and, in his opinion, it would be utterly impossible to deal with all those questions in a Committee of that House. He believed the Bill might be amended in a form to make it workable, and that if it could not be done within the compass of the present Session, the public would gain by the delay, even if the measure should pass over into another Session. He, however, saw no reason for that delay if the Government would agree to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. He trusted that at the proper time the House would be prepared to remove from the Bill the clause which abolished the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords; and that the Government would assist those on the Opposition side of the House who really wished to see a workable Bill passed by allowing it to go to a Select Committee.

Mr. WEST congratulated the House and the Government on the approval of the three main propositions of the Bill which had just been expressed by an hon. and learned Gentleman who occupied so high a position in the profession. With regard to patronage, he would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that, while the Lord Chancellor appointed the Paines Judges, the Prime Minister appointed all the Chiefs of the Common Law Courts, as also to any new judicial offices which might be created. He would also remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords was expressly excluded from the consideration of the Judicature Commission, and that even in those circumstances the Commissioners stated in their Report that that jurisdiction greatly impaired the efficiency of the Court of Chancery during the Session of Parliament by withdrawing the Lord Chancellor from the Court. As to the other objections of the hon. and learned Gentleman that there was a great want of Equity power in the High Court of Justice, there was no doubt considerable force in that criticism. It had just been proposed that the House of Lords should remain supreme over the new Court of Appeal, thus creating another step before the suitor could get to the final Court. [Sir.

RICHARD BAGGALLAY observed, that he simply proposed to leave the House of Lords as it was.] But it was proposed that cases could be taken through the new Court of Appeal to the House of Lords. For his part, he believed that the details of the Bill would be best discussed in a Committee of the Whole House. With respect to the proposed establishment of Local Courts, he could speak from experience as to the working of such a system, as to which his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Matthews) and several others of his learned Friends appeared to be in a state of profound ignorance. The House was aware that, under a Bill passed in the year 1869, District Registries were established for the great and wealthy county of Lancaster, and they had been found to work so satisfactorily that the Lord Chancellor proposed to extend them by the present Bill. It had been said that there was no appeal from the District Registries; but a reference to the 61st clause of the Bill would show that was a mistake. How had those local tribunals worked during the three and a-half years of their existence? From a document published by the Law Society of Liverpool it appeared that in the years 1867-8-9 the number of causes entered for trial at the Assizes at Manchester, Lancaster, and Liverpool was 1,330, and of these only 140 were instituted in the Local Court, the remainder being instituted in the three Courts of Westminster. What occurred after the Act of 1869 came into operation? During the three years 1870-1-2 the number of cases entered was 1,333, of which 772 were instituted in the Local Court and 561 in the Courts at Westminster. This showed that the people of Lancashire approved of the Local Courts. The document to which he had referred further said, that the number of writs issued during the last three and a-half years in Lancashire was 6,706, whilst the number of appearances was only 2,436, so that the great majority of the cases were settled without anything being done beyond issuing the writ. Of 4,292 cases before the local registrars in these Courts, in only 44 cases had there been appeals, and in only 15 cases had the decisions been reversed or varied. The costs in reference to causes commenced in the Local Courts were at least 25 per cent less than if the process had been issued in London. With reference to the proposal to send the Bill to a Select Committee, he could not help thinking that the effect of such a step would be to defeat the measure, and, with much respect for his hon. and learned Friends, he was of opinion that no Select Committee could be formed from among them which would be of greater weight in the mind of the profession and of the country than that which had considered the provisions of the Bill in the House of Lords. He could not help feeling that the postponement of the subject for a single Session would be a matter for deep regret, not only on account of the postponement of this Bill, but because that postponement would have the effect of delaying a still more important reform, which ought to follow—namely, that of the local Courts, Courts which had much more direct influence on the comfort of the people at large than the Superior Courts.

MR. AMPHLETT observed that the absurdity of the present system was, that a man might succeed in one Court, and immediately after be defeated in a Court sitting next door; and this anomaly was dealt with successfully in the present Bill. They had heard a great deal about the fusion of Law and Equity; but in fact the system of Equity was really founded upon the common law; it was the common law corrected and improved by a succession of great Judges, at a time when those Judges assumed to themselves the power of legislation. The Bill left the principles administered in the Equity Courts undisturbed, and simply said that all other Courts in the kingdom must adopt the same principles, so that the principles of the Courts of Equity would become the general law of the country, administered in every Court. But the most important part of the Bill was that which provided for the re-organization of the Courts of Judicature, but the mode in which this was to be done had not met with that general approbation which other parts of the measure had met with. This was not surprising when they found that there was to be no admixture of the Common Law and Equity Judges; that the Equity Judges were to sit in one Division, and the Common Law Judges in another Division by themselves. It was not surprising also that Equity practitioners should look with some anxiety when they found that Equity principles were to be administered by those who were not well cognizant of those principles. It was for this reason that the members of the Equity Courts had drawn up the memorial which had been published. The Attorney General admitted that there were defects in this portion of the Bill which would, it was to be hoped, be remedied by Amendments which would render the measure workable. Such Amendments would perfectly satisfy him (Mr. Amphlett) as to Courts of First Instance; but with regard to the Court of Appeal, out of 14 Judges there were only four Equity ones, and he thought that until the new system got into working order they should strengthen the Equity element. As to the House of Lords, he had a sentimental regret that that House was to be shorn of one of its most distinguished prerogatives, and though he felt bound to concur in the proposal of the Government on that point, his concurrence was in no way due to any belief that the House of Lords had proved themselves an inefficient tribunal. The time had, however, come when the Court of Final Appeal ought to sit en permanence, and the great objection to the House of Lords was that it sat only four days a-week, and for only a third of the year. That was not fair to suitors, and it was for this reason alone that he was unable to support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley). With respect to the rest of the appellate provisions, he should have very much preferred a Final Court of Appeal of fewer numbers, and composed of the most distinguished individuals—such as the Lord Chancellor and five or six of the most eminent men who could be obtained. Such a tribunal would have been more likely to earn the same confidence which the profession had given to the House of Lords. The proposed Court would consist of 14 persons, sitting in three Divisions, and his great objection to the Bill was not only to so numerous a Court, but that it should be split into three Divisional Courts, each of which was to be final. These Courts were not to be divided into a Chancery, a Common Law, and a Criminal Law Division, because the object was to abolish the distinction between Equity and Common Law. The three Divisional Courts would thus be called upon to decide the same class of questions. What was to be done if they differed, and how was the law to be settled if they came to opposite conclusions? There would not only be these three Courts, but the House of Lords would still sit in appeals from Ireland and Scotland, and the same class of cases would come from Ireland as those before the Divisional Courts. Which of these Courts was to be pre-eminent, and to lay down the rule of law that was to govern these Courts? This state of things would, he feared, lead to great practical inconvenience. It was a perfect novelty; for he did not believe that there existed in any country a system of jurisprudence in which the Courts sat in separate divisions, dealing with the same class of subjects, and each judgment to be final. In Paris the Court was divided into different Chambers; but they took a different class of business. He felt great diffidence in expressing an opinion which conflicted with that of the eminent individuals who prepared this Bill; but the novelty to which he had called attention had never been submitted to the requisite criticism and discussion. The Judicature Commission, it was true, had recommended a division of the Courts, but they had contemplated a final Court over them. No doubt they added that it might hereafter be found advisable to abolish the final Court of Appeal; but he would have preferred that there should be an appeal from these Divisional Courts to a final Court of Appeal. It was said that what was wanted was to put a stop to the present multiplicity of appeals; but if the decision of the Divisional Court were taken as final in all cases in which the Judges were unanimous, it would enormously reduce the number of appeals, and the number would not be greater than the Final Court of Appeal could dispose of. He relied upon the candour of the Attorney General and Solicitor General to give his views any weight which they might seem to deserve, and if they met with any general support he would take the sense of the House upon the question when the Bill got into Committee. It was better to defer any minute criticism until the House went into Committee; but, regarding the Bill as a whole, he should be sorry not to see it pass or to see it delayed. The question, however, remained whether the objections he had now raised could be better discussed in the House or in a Select Committee. As far as his own experience went, the passing of the Bill would be expedited if it were now sent upstairs. The Juries Bill went through that process with great advantage, and would, he believed, have passed through Committee of the Whole House in a single night if it had not received a check by falling foul of the question of Local Taxation, where no one expected to meet with it. He should vote for the second reading; but he trusted that the points he had raised would be seriously considered.

MR. NORWOOD said, there was one unfortunate class of persons who had a deep interest in this question, though they were not lawyers, and he ventured to interrupt the flow of legal eloquence to say a few words on their behalf. They were the suitors, who suffered from the present extremely expensive, dilatory, and unsatisfactory arrangements of our legal procedure, upon which this Bill would effect a vast and important improvement. Sometimes commercial men had a difficulty in knowing which tribunal they ought to apply to in order to get their grievances redressed, and more frequently complete relief could not be obtained in a Court either of Law or Equity; but this Bill proposed that there should be only one portal through which suitors could enter, and afterwards they would find the proper division for the discussion and adjudication of their cases; he approved the Bill because it abolished all the arbitrary distinctions between Courts of Law and Equity; because it shortened and simplified the procedure; because it established one—and that an efficient—Court of Appeal; because it invested the Common Law Judges with equitable powers; because sittings were to be held during the vacation for hearing cases of immediate importance; and because the present system of Terms was to be abolished. As to the provision which enabled the Judges to send cases to referees, he, as a commercial man, thought it would prove a very beneficial one, as it would obviate the inconvenience of the present system, under which cases were frequently referred to arbitration after very considerable expense had been incurred. He also approved the clause which allowed a Judge to decide cases with the assistance of two assessors, instead of trying them before a promiscuous jury. Many improvements might be effected which were not referred to in the Bill now under consideration. For example, local commercial Courts might be established; but as a layman, representing laymen, he heartily supported the measure, because it proceeded in a right direction, and he trusted the Law Officers of the Crown would not consent to its reference to a Select Committee, especially if that Committee were to be composed, as the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Matthews) had suggested, solely of gentlemen belonging to the legal profession.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, the general opinion seemed to be that the Bill would pass the second reading, and, therefore his object in rising was rather to assist the Government by suggestion now, instead of taking them by surprise by Amendments in Committee. He was glad to hear the views of his hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood). He was surprised to hear some of his hon. and learned Friends express a wish that appeals from the Courts of this country should still be preferred to the House of Lords. The Bill left untouched the constitution of the House of Lords as an Appellate Court in cases from Scotland and Ireland. He agreed to a great extent with the observation of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James) with regard to the Divisions into which it separated the Judges who were to compose the High Court of Judicature. He thought that by cutting up the jurisdiction into these various Divisions, instead of facilitating, they would delay and embarrass the administration of justice. His great objection to this part of the measure was that while it proposed to re-constitute our judicature by throwing all the Courts into one High Court and so combining the Equity and Common Law jurisdiction, it actually retained the distinction which it was its object to do away with. Whilst it proposed to confer Equity jurisdiction upon the Common Law Courts it still separated the Equity from the Common Law Division and preserved the Chancery Court in all its integrity, and almost all its exclusiveness. Instead of a suitor going into any one of the Divisions he pleased to obtain Equity or Law, he would still go to the Court of Chancery when he wanted Equity and to a Common Law Court when he wanted Law. But if the character of the Divisions were changed, and the present staff of Equity Judges were to be distributed over the four Divisions, no additional staff would be required, while Law and Equity would so to speak, be amalgamated, and would be administered concurrently. So vital did he believe that point to be to the operative character of the Bill that he should deem it to be his duty to take the opinion of the House on it in Committee. He was glad to find there was an attempt in the Bill to remedy an admitted grievance, whereby many suitors were kept waiting for an undue period for a decision. The appointment of official referees would, to some extent, meet that point, he thought; and, so far from complaining on the subject, he was very sorry the Bill did not go much farther than it did by appointing permanent arbitration Judges. He found a provision in the Bill whereby the Judge, in cases where the points in dispute, technically termed the "issues," did not appear, might compel the parties to come to an issue. That was done at present, not by compulsory powers, but by the mere process of pleading. It did not appear from the Bill, however, whether the issues were to be settled before going to trial; and that ought to be cleared up, or he could see that great difficulties and inconvenience would arise in practice. He should support the second reading of the Bill, thinking it went a long way in the right direction, though not so far as he had hoped, and he saw no reason for referring it to a Select Committee.

Mr. HINDE PALMER congratulated the Government on the general unanimity with which the measure had been received in that House. The consequence of having justice administered in two sets of Courts on opposite principles was that suitors did not know into which branch of judicature they ought to go, and thus great delay, cost, and injustice had been caused. With respect to the objection that had been urged by the hon. and learned Member for Mid-Surrey (Sir Richard Bagge) that this Bill could not be properly carried into effect until there was a codification of the law and the New Law Courts were built, if the House waited until those schemes were carried out they might be content to give up legislation on the subject for the remainder of their lives. He thought that the mode in which justice would hereafter be administered, by a concurrent administration in all branches would tend materially to advance the codification of the law of this country; and as to the necessity of Courts for the two appellate bodies, they could occupy the Lord Chancellor's and Lords Justices' Courts, which this Bill would render vacant. As to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Matthews) to the effect that the Bill was being hurried through the House with haste and treated with levity, he would remind him that it was framed on the lines which had been laid down in the Report of the Judicature Commission in 1869; that the subject had been dealt with by a Bill introduced by Lord Hatherley into the House of Lords in 1870; and that the imperfect constitution of that House as a Court of Appeal had been matter of general complaint for the last half century. It was true that none of the Royal Commissions or Committees which had sat to consider the question of the appellate jurisdiction had ever reported in favour of removing that jurisdiction from the House of Lords, and that their recommendations were directed to the improvement of the tribunal, and not to the abolition of its jurisdiction; but that was because an idea was prevalent that it was necessary to the dignity of the House of Lords that its ancient prestige as the highest Court of Appeal in the kingdom should be preserved. That idea was now dissipated, and the House of Lords itself had earned the gratitude of the country by being itself the first to pass a measure abolishing its appellate jurisdiction. Under these circumstances, it was rather too late for the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) to bring forward his constitutional objections to the proposal to transfer the appellate jurisdiction to another Court. When the proposed Appellate Court should be divided in opinion amongst themselves, and with the Court below, it had been felt that there ought to be a higher Court to which application might be made. But how was this new Final Court of Appeal to be constituted? Frequent appeals gave a great advantage to the more wealthy suitors. The hon. and learned Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had told the House that of 400 appeals decided in the Court of Chancery only 35 went to the House of Lords; and for so small a number he did not think it desirable to establish a new Court of Appeal. But besides the impossibility of finding a higher final Court of sufficient authority to review the decisions of so admirably constituted a tribunal, as the one proposed, the Bill provided that when questions of difficulty arose which could not be satisfactorily determined by one Division of the High Court the members of the other Divisions should be called in to assist, and thus the very cream of the legal authority of the country would be available to decide such questions; so that there would be no necessity for any further appeal. The Bill would effect one of the greatest steps that had ever been taken in this country in the way of legal reform, and if there were no other measure, it would be sufficient to stamp the character of the Session and reflect credit on this Parliament. There were, however, many faults of detail in the Bill as originally drawn. Thus, while it provided that the principles of equity should prevail in all the Courts of Law, it placed the Courts of Chancery, which were the real Courts of Equity, in the second rank and deprived the latter of their proper head, the Lord Chancellor. He thought it was a decided improvement of the Bill to retain the Lord Chancellor as President of the Equity Court. The Bill proposed that another Vice Chancellor should be added to the Chancery Division. He hoped that nothing would induce the Government to give up that proposition. Of all the false and foolish economies of which Government or Parliament could be guilty was that of starving and stinting the administration of justice. He regarded as one of the best parts of the Bill that clause which provided that an additional Judge in Chancery should be appointed. At the present moment the number of arrears in the Court of Chancery was perfectly frightful. It was said that those arrears were only temporary; but so far from their being temporary, they increased from year to year. According to the last Return, which related to the year 1871, the number of causes and other matters pending in Chancery at the end of the judicial year was nearly 600, and for every year for the last five years was upwards of 500. This was a monstrous state of things in a wealthy civilized country like England. The Bill provided that an additional Judge in Chancery should be appointed when the Bill came into operation—that was to say, in November, 1874; but he thought that an additional Judge should be appointed as soon as the Bill passed. To start the new Court fairly, the field should be clear. As to the proposal to send the Bill to a Select Committee, he did not think the progress of the Bill would be expedited by adopting that course; because all those gentlemen who would be defeated in the divisions of the Select Committee would come before the House when the Select Committee reported to vindicate the propositions on which they had been defeated, and thus the passing of the Bill this Session might be endangered. The Bill approached the accomplishment of a great scheme; and the House of Lords assented to the abolition of their appellate jurisdiction. He thought that, as in the case of the Bankruptcy Bill which was passed a few years ago, all the clauses of the Bill could be discussed most satisfactorily in a Committee of the Whole House. If the Bill was discussed in a Committee of the Whole House the lay and the commercial, as well as the legal Members, could take part with the greatest advantage, and there was no necessity for referring the Bill to a Select Committee. He trusted that before the end of this Session he might have the satisfaction of knowing that he could go to his constituents and claim credit for having taken part in the passing of a Bill that would be for the advantage not only of the legal profession, but of suitors and the public at large.

MR. HENLEY said, he felt diffidence in venturing to offer a few observations upon a question which might be said to exclusively belong to lawyers; but on a matter of such vast importance—affecting as it did the interests of the whole of the community—he had as great an interest as, if not greater than, the lawyers, in its ultimate working, for after all it was of as much consequence to those who were to be shorn that the work should be well done as it was to the shearers themselves. It was impossible to conceive a larger measure than this. It altered completely the administration of the law of England, if even it did not alter the law itself; and his first impression on reading the Bill was that it altered and unsettled everything and settled nothing. That impression was strengthened by the speech of the Attorney General, who admitted that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had pointed out evils for which future provision would have to be made. As to the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, the first thing that struck one was that only four-fifths of the population of the United Kingdom were affected by the Bill, and that the remainder would continue to have their appeals heard by the tribunal which now heard them. The result of establishing different Courts of Appeal for the several parts of the United Kingdom would be, that different final decisions would be come to and dissatisfaction would arise. When the Home Rulers ascertained that the Law Officers of the Crown had condemned in the strongest terms the present Tribunal of Ultimate Appeal, but yet thought it was good enough for Ireland, who could complain if they used this circumstance as an argument to further their cause? They had for many years been free from any serious matter of treason. Now, what would be the effect in the proposed change of the law if treason again showed its head in the country? There were at present societies going about propagating Republican opinions, and if they ran foul of the law what might happen? They might have the House of Lords deciding on an ultimate appeal from Ireland, that certain acts were treasonable or not treasonable, while a different Court of Appeal might decide just the reverse, and if that did happen it would be a very inconvenient circumstance, for certainly the Home Rulers could not hope for a stronger argument. He deeply regretted that one common Court of Appeal was not framed for the United Kingdom so that we might not have diversities in decisions in respect to the same matter in different parts of the country. The Attorney General had made much of the anomalies in the present law of Appeal; but were the people discontented with it? He had heard no expressions of discontent, and surely the whole system should not be upset merely to correct theoretical defects. The Attorney General had admitted there would be some difficulty at first in Common Lawyers undertaking cases in Equity and the reverse; but he hoped barristers of both sides of the Court would very soon become sufficiently "accomplished" to undertake cases on either side. The Attorney General contemplated some such process as that of putting a wild elephant between two tame ones to break him in, or, to change the figure, he hoped to create ambidexter members of the Bar who would be quite competent to strike out on both sides. Another point to which he objected was the large powers of reference taken under the Bill. It was a useful power to exercise in many cases; but there was such a disposition shown in the Bill to take everything from the Judges that could be done, as led him to fear that something like the old Masters in Chancery might grow up in the shape of the new official referees that were to be created under the Bill. Those points had struck him on reading through the Bill, and he trusted they would not be thought lightly of. In previous years Bills had been concocted and brought into Parliament with as much authority in their favour as the present measure had. Those Bills now, however, had been adversely criticized by the Attorney General. This was an additional reason why that House should exercise as much care and pains as it could in this matter. He therefore supported the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. He believed there was no desire to impede the progress of the measure; but there was a general wish that, regarding the vast importance of the subject to the great body of the people, the Bill should be carefully examined, in order that, as far as possible, every imperfection should be removed from it.

Mr. W. FOWLER agreed with a great deal that had been said as to the considerable difficulty in which they might be in respect to the Supreme Court of Appeal. It was a great anomaly to have one Court of Appeal for England and another for Ireland and Scotland, for it was possible that one law might be laid down with regard to real property in Ireland, and another in England by the two Appellate Courts. If that state of things were unavoidable he would submit to it with great reluctance. It was also objectionable that the Appeal Court should be divided into Divisional Courts, as that might tend to keep up the old distinctions; and this was a point which would deserve to be handled with great care, whether the Bill went to a Select Committee or not. Subject to those exceptions, he thought that the Appellate portion of the measure was one of the best parts of it. The House of Lords themselves had given up their Appellate Jurisdiction; nor could it be said that it was done under Government pressure, for the Government were in a minority in the other House. The House of Lords as at present constituted was totally unfit to discharge the functions of a Court of Appeal, and with the greatest respect for the noble and learned Lord (Lord Chelmsford) he must say that it was highly anomalous that the only Common Law Judge in the House of Lords should reverse the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber. He gathered from the debate that the general feeling on both sides was that this might be made a very useful measure; and the only question to be decided after the Bill was read a second time was whether it should be referred to a Select Committee or not. When he read the Bill first he thought it ought to be referred to a Select Committee; but he had since been convinced that if that were done the safety of the Bill would be endangered for the Session, as he doubted whether the Report would be made before a month. Under these circumstances they must discuss the Bill in the House itself, and trust to the reticence and forbearance of Members for getting it through in reasonable time. The main object of the Bill was to establish such a Court that every man who went into it should be able to get complete justice; but to do that it was obvious that every Division of the Court must be efficiently manned. He was glad that the Attorney General had promised that a sufficient number of Equity Judges should be appointed; but one thing more was necessary—when vacancies occurred in the Common Law portion they should not be filled up by Common Law men, so as to get an intermixture of Equity Judges in those Courts. There was another point to which he wished to refer. He could not help thinking that the present state of the business of the Court of Chancery was eminently unsatisfactory. It was admitted that a vast amount of bankruptcy business was done by Registrars, contrary to the intention of that House; and it was also admitted by the highest authority that to do that work properly the whole time of a Judge was required. It had been further intended by Parliament, on the abolition of the Masters, that a vast amount of business should be done by the Chief Clerk under the supervision of the Judge; but almost the whole of that important business was done by the Chief Clerk alone, because the Judge had no time to devote to it. In Chancery, under the Bill, the whole time of one Judge would be required to do the work in Chambers. Again, the Bill proposed to effect a great revolution in the mode of taking evidence in the Court of Chancery, by taking it via deo instead of by affidavit. To do the work that was now done by the two Examiners and a large number of Special Examiners would occupy the time of two Judges. To carry out the reforms proposed more judicial power would be required than existed at the present moment. The Schedule appended to the Bill was by no means complete, and must be supplemented by the Judges in various points. Before the Bill passed they should know what sort of pleading they were to have. Was it to be Chancery pleading or pleading by issue as at Common Law? The language used in the Schedule was most obscure and difficult to understand. He had a great predilection for the plain Bill and answer method adopted in Chancery. His general view was that this Bill might be made a very good workable Bill; but he thought it would require large and important alterations, and he was afraid the House must make up its mind to add to the judicial power. He thought they would require to examine the measure with great care and minuteness to see what they were going to do, for there appeared to be a strong tendency on the face of the Bill to keep up the old divisions of Courts, and gradually to drift into the old system so that they might not, after all, get that fusion which they were promised and all desired to have. Serious as were his objections to it, he should vote for the second reading of the Bill; and as to whether it should be sent to a Select Committee, he had come to the conclusion, though not without some doubt or reluctance, that it would be best discussed in Committee of the Whole House.

MR. HOLKER held that on such an important matter as that before them every man who pretended to be a lawyer ought to express an opinion upon the merits of this Bill. He confessed he came to its consideration with feelings of approval for most of the main objects which he believed the framers of it had in view, and meant to accomplish; but he could not help entertaining very considerable doubt whether the provisions of the Bill in its present state would achieve those objects or some of them. He did not think that the much-talked-of fusion of Law and Equity would ever be accomplished—and which, in his opinion, it was most desirable to accomplish—if the measure should be allowed to stand in its present shape. They had heard from the Attorney General that the Bill was founded upon the Report of the Judicature Commission of 1869, and the recommendations contained therein. In some of those recommendations he did not quite agree, and, he believed, the Bill itself, in some particulars, departed from them. The Attorney General divided the principal objects which the framers of the Bill intended to accomplish into three—he should rather say into four—branches. The first was the simplification of our legal system by the abolition of the Superior Courts of Justice which now existed, and the erection in their stead of one High Court of Justice in the First Instance. The Bill did not deal at all with the inferior Courts. The second object of the Bill was the amalgamation or blending of the various systems of Law which were now carried on in the Superior Courts of the country, by what was popularly called the fusion of Law and Equity. The third object was the erection of a more satisfactory tribunal of Appeal than the tribunals of Appeal which now existed. The fourth was to construct a system of practice and procedure that would be applicable to the Court so erected under this Bill, and that such system should be plain, simple, intelligible and untechnical. Now, if these or some of these objects were accomplished, he could not but think great good would be gained. There were several minor features in the Bill, some of which would be improvements—perhaps great improvements—in the Law; others would be anything but improvements. But as that part of the Bill could better be discussed in Committee he would not say much respecting them. He should, however, allude to two or three topics. In respect to the question of costs the Bill provided for the transfer of that question from the Courts to official referees or arbitrators, by whatever name they might be called. There was also a provision in the Bill in respect to the establishment of district Registrars. These were very important questions, and such as demanded serious consideration. Now, it appeared to him very essential that the outside public should understand the provisions of this Bill, inasmuch as they were much more interested in it than the lawyers. He knew of no Bill that came before the House that Session more deserving of careful attention than the present one. Let them consider the position of the Superior Courts of this country at the present time. We had the Courts of Equity, not only with an equitable, but, in some degree, a Common Law jurisdiction; our Common Law Courts possessed, on the other hand, not only a Common Law, but, to some extent, an equitable jurisdiction, though it was not much exercised. Then we had the Admiralty Court, the Probate, or Matrimonial Causes Court, and the Ecclesiastical Courts. These last were not particularly touched by the Bill, and he would pass them by; for were he to venture within their precincts he feared their proceedings would be so mysterious that he should not find his way out with a remnant of intelligence left. With respect to the Common Law Courts, it sometimes happened that they acted upon a system which he thought was a disgrace to the jurisprudence of any country. Those Courts had pronounced, after the consideration of the very same facts, different decisions, one of them deciding the law to be one thing, and another, acting upon the same principle precisely, declaring the law to be quite another thing. Then, again, there was a different procedure in one set of Courts from that of other Courts—different practices and different modes of taking evidence. He thought, then, that any Bill which abolished all those various jurisdictions, and erected one great Court, possessing the jurisdictions and powers of all those existing Courts, was one which would meet the approval of any person really anxious for a good, sound, sensible, and intelligible legal reform. But he could not help thinking, when they considered the many Divisions into which that one Court would be split up for the disposal of the various kinds of business contemplated by this Bill, that great object which it had in view would not be accomplished—he meant the fusion of Law and Equity. We should have, in the first instance, the High Court of Justice, split up into five divisions—namely, the Chancery Division, the Common Law Division, with the three Common Law Courts—the Admiralty Division, the Probate Division, and the Matrimonial Causes Division. Not only were the old names of the Courts to be retained, but the business would be so distributed that each of those Divisions would have that particular business which was peculiar to it, and the jurisdiction would be retained over all the cases in respect to which each of the old Courts had exclusive jurisdiction. It appeared, then to him, that practically we would have the same Courts as at present existed, possessing the same jurisdiction which they now enjoyed. And when they came to work this Bill they would find that things would go on pretty much the same as they had gone on before. If they wanted to amalgamate the present distinctions they ought to obliterate them altogether. If they wanted to fuse Law and Equity they must go about the matter differently than by the present Bill. The first thing the Legislature ought to do was to provide some means by which the Judges that were to preside on this tribunal should be equally conversant with the principles of Law and Equity, and with the various systems they would have ultimately to administer. In order to do that they must, so to speak, compel the Judges to investigate cases in which questions involving the principles of these various systems would arise. They must exercise and train them in the investigation of those systems, and until they were so trained they would not trouble themselves with systems which were novel to them, and which would impose considerable trouble and responsibility upon them. He did not for a moment intend to insinuate that the Judges were unwilling or incapable of engaging in the investigation of fresh systems and novel principles of jurisprudence, or that the Judges of the Common Law Courts were unable to fathom the depths of Equity, grapple with its principles, and deal out its remedies with the greatest possible satisfaction. Some members of the Equity Bar seemed to think that the principles of Equity were so abstruse, so recondite, and so mysterious, that it took a long time for the most brilliant intellect to master them, and they emitted the most pitiable cries at the idea of entrusting them to Common Law Judges. They regarded them pretty much as a lady did her pet dog, and they were afraid to let it out of the gates of Lincoln's Inn lest it should wander in the direction of Westminster, and some rude Common Law Judge should tread on its tail or give it a kick. He (Mr. Holker) believed that those fears were entirely unfounded. The principles of Equity were plain, simple, and intelligible, because founded upon the dictates of natural justice and sound common sense. But if even it were as abstruse, as refined, and shadowy as their Equity friends would have them believe, it would not be found too much for the very eminent men who presided over the Courts of Common Law. When Judges were obliged to investigate and administer a new system they had no difficulty in doing so. The system administered in the Probate and Matrimonial Court was new to Judges in that Court; and could it be said that Sir Cresswell Cresswell, Lord Penzance, and Sir James Hannan had not fully mastered its principles? The Equity Judges themselves had not always a Common Law Jurisdiction, but did they not soon overcome its difficulties and administer it with the greatest satisfaction? It constantly happened that Judges whose experience had been acquired solely as special pleaders or in civil cases went to the Assizes where they had to administer the criminal law, never, perhaps, having been engaged in a criminal case in their life, but did they fail in its administration on that account? In India, in the year 1862, they had amalgamated systems which before that time had been administered in separate Courts, and it was found that the Judges there had no difficulty in making themselves masters of the systems with which they had to deal. At the same time, while saying so much for the capacity of the Judges to master novel systems, he did not think they would do so unless they were obliged. Judges were mortal—at least, he hoped so—and, like other mortals, they gave the preference to subjects which they understood, and looked down upon systems which they did not thoroughly comprehend. If he had his way in the matter, he would abolish the proposed distinction between the various Divisions of the Court. Have one High Court of First Instance, with certain Divisions—as many as were required—retaining the old names if they liked, and let the business be divided between each without reference to its nature. They would find in a short time that if the Judges were obliged to exercise themselves in the investigation of new systems and branches of the science of Jurisprudence, they would do it with the most complete satisfaction. To his mind it was not a good thing that the same Judge should always be engaged investigating the same kind of case. Fresh streams of thought should from time to time be poured upon the subject to give it energy, and force, and power. The suitors of the First Division of the Court would not be prejudiced if the Judges were one day engaged in investigating a breach of coal contract, the next a breach of a specific performance of contract for the sale of property, the next a matrimonial, and the next a case of collision at sea. In the administration of the law, as in many other things, there was utility, as well as charm, in variety. On the grounds which he had stated he feared that the Bill would fall short of accomplishing one of its great objects; but its defects on that point could easily be removed either in Select Committee or in Committee of the Whole House, and he hoped to see it made, what it was in other respects, a really good Bill. He would now make a few remarks upon the Appellate tribunal. He was quite aware of the evils which flowed from their present system of appeal. These double appeals were a serious evil, and were a fruitful cause of expense, delay, and uncertainty. When the defendant was a rich man the snitor was dragged slowly from Court to Court until his resources and patience were exhausted. It was therefore most desirable to have a good tribunal of Appeal. Whether the tribunal constituted by this Bill was a good one or not he could not pause to consider; but he could not avoid thinking that if three Judges were to form a quorum, and were to decide cases, it would give little satisfaction to the suitor. He could not help expressing his regret that it was thought necessary to abolish the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords. He did not care what the House of Lords did or thought on the matter themselves. It was not a question for the House of Lords, but for the suitors of the country. He was not led astray by any view of the grandeur of the House of Lords or of its ancient prestige. He was too practical and utilitarian to treat the matter in that light, and the reason why he advocated in certain circumstances the retention of the Appellate Jurisdiction was the opinion which he had formed of its efficacy. They had been told by the Attorney and Solicitor General that the House of Lords was not a good tribunal, because there was only one Common Law Lord. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL dissented.] He was glad to hear that the Solicitor General was of opinion that the House of Lords was a good tribunal. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL: I never said it was a good one.] Then the hon. and learned Gentleman thought it a bad one. However that might be, his (Mr. Holker's) experience, as well as the testimony of a great many other persons, had led him to an opposite conclusion. He did not care what it formerly was, when there was only one Judge sitting in the other House. He took the House of Lords as it now was. Although there might be only one Common Law Judge in that House, there were Law Lords there who understood the Common Law and administered justice with the greatest possible satisfaction. He did not think that there was anybody who had experience in the administration of the Law by the House of Lords for some time past who was not of opinion that the way in which it had been administered by that august tribunal was, on the whole, very satisfactory, and had the unbounded confidence of the country. He did not say that it would not be easy to improve the Appellate tribunal of the House of Lords, for they might have more Law Lords; but because this improvement was required was it necessary that the House of Lords should be abolished? He did not advocate the retention of the House of Lords as a Court of immediate appeal from the Courts to be established under this Bill, for that would impose more business upon them than they could get through; but would it not be necessary in some cases where vast amounts of property were involved, or in other cases of great importance where the Supreme Court thought it necessary to have an appeal to the House of Lords, that there should be such appeal? Suppose the Appeal Court under the Bill should consist of three Judges, who overruled the decision of other three Judges in the Court of First Instance, would it be unjust to allow the matter to go up to the House of Lords? Would it not be most unjust to refuse to allow the suitor to go there? Again, where the Court to be established under this Bill should give leave, ought there not to be an appeal to the House of Lords? If the House of Lords was to continue as a Court of Appeal in Irish and Scotch cases, why should not such appeal be allowed in other cases? The question of establishing local Registries was one that had a great interest for people in the country. It was, in fact, a subject of disagreement between attorneys in the country and attorneys in London; but the House, without regarding one party or the other, should look to the interest of suitors alone; and if it should be shown in Committee that local Registries would produce a considerable saving of expense, or prevent delay, perhaps it might be well to establish them. There was one argument against them which he would bring to the attention of the House. The establishment of these Registries would, he feared, have a very evil effect upon the Junior Bar. He believed that there was nothing so essential to a perfect and satisfactory administration of justice as a good, strong, learned, and independent Bar; and if by this Bill they established local Registries, or erected Local Courts, they would in effect localize the Junior Bar, for the members of it must follow their business. This would withdraw them from London, and it would tend to deteriorate and degrade the Bar to a very great extent, which in itself would be a very great disaster. The question had been raised whether the Bill should be sent to a Select Committee; and surely a matter which was so technical as this should be examined with care. He could not see why the Government should object to a Select Committee, for there was no hurry. What evil would happen even if the Bill should not pass this Session? Surely hon. Members on the opposite benches were sufficiently bound with laurel that they could spare this Bill for a future Session, when they might be in want of a triumph. In his opinion, if it went to a Select Committee they would probably get a good useful measure of sound legal reform.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, that during the whole conversation upon the second reading of the Bill, no speaker had avowed an open hostility to the measure or expressed his intention to oppose the second reading. Many, however, had severely criticized the vital principles of the Bill, and there was a scarcely concealed intention as the part of some to attempt to throw it over indefinitely by referring it to a Select Committee. He had no hesitation in saying that if this Bill were referred to a Select Committee it would be lost for the Session, and no one could foresee when, if ever, it could be brought forward again. What, he would ask, was the necessity for sending this Bill to a Select Committee? For nearly 30 years many of them had been anxiously looking forward to the day when a Government would be found willing and also courageous enough to bring forward the great measure which was now before them for a second reading. The opinions of the most enlightened men in the profession had long been in favour of this reform. Royal Commissioners had reported in its favour; and the present Bill came before them recommended by the high authority of the Lord Chancellor and of Lords Cairns and Hatherley. He quite agreed that mere authority, however high, was not a sufficient argument in favour of any Bill; nor could the House of Commons relieve itself of responsibility in any act of legislation, upon the plea that it had been recommended by high authority, and he was glad, therefore, that there had been so full criticism on the Bill on this occasion. When the evils which it was intended to remedy, and the difficulties which stood in the way, were considered and appreciated, he ventured to think that the breadth and simplicity of design of this measure would strongly recommend it to the approval of the House. If the Bill was not perfect it was because the very nature and difficulties of the subject rendered it impossible to deal at once more completely and perfectly with the vast and deeply-rooted subjects which required to be dealt with. The evils to be dealt with were summed up in the dual jurisdiction and twofold litigation, with the mysterious and technical forms of pleading which had too long been a reproach to our judicial system. In no other civilized country was any system of jurisprudence thus artificially divided into what were technically known as Law and Equity, and with us it had been a process of slow and accidental growth. The principal difficulty in the way of reform was the vast machinery of Courts, officers, and of practitioners, which had grown up and adapted itself to the present systems, which it was impossible suddenly to sweep away, and almost as difficult to mould to the new order of things. The present measure was admirably designed to carry out practically the desired reform of fusing the various and sometimes conflicting doctrines and jurisdictions of our Courts, and of simplifying the procedure by gradually moulding the old machinery to the new work. The very objections which had been raised to the Bill illustrated and entirely confirmed this view; one class of objectors had told them that the Bill did absolutely nothing, that it left all the Courts exactly as they were before, each with its old name and old exclusive jurisdiction, and that if anyone went away and came back after five years he would still find the old familiar Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, and the Court of Chancery, each exercising its own jurisdiction with the same distinctions as at present. Another class of objectors complained that the Bill altered and revolutionized everything, that it abolished ancient and time-honoured institutions, and swept away great landmarks of the Constitution. Both these objections were untrue, but each contained an important truth, in which lay the real value and perfection of the Bill. The Bill, in fact, provided for a safe and gradual change, and contemplated a transitional period, during which the old order of things would be quietly and almost imperceptibly superseded by the new; and he ventured to say that although at first there would be scarcely any external or visible change, yet if the Judges loyally carried out the provisions of the Bill, many years could not pass without a more sweeping and comprehensive reform being accomplished than had ever resulted before from one single act of legislation. Great and sweeping and novel as were the changes contemplated, this important precaution was taken, that if any practical difficulty should present itself in the way of any Court exercising the novel jurisdiction conferred upon it, the old lines were not abandoned, and the matter or cause giving rise to the difficulty could be at once remitted to that Court which, from past experience, would be most familiar with it. This was exactly carrying out the recommendations of the Judicature Commissioners, who, in their Report of March, 1869, gave it as their opinion that—

“The first step towards meeting and surmounting the evils complained of would be the consolidation of all the Superior Courts of Law and Equity with the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty into one Court, to be called ‘Her Majesty’s Supreme Court,’ in which shall be vested all the jurisdiction which is now exercisable by each and all the Courts so consolidated. This consolidation would at once put an end to all conflicts of jurisdiction. No suitor could be defeated because he commenced his suit in the wrong Court, and sending the suitor from Equity to Law or from Law to Equity, to begin his suit over again in order to obtain redress, will be no longer possible. The Supreme Court thus constituted would, of course, be divided into as many Chambers or Divisions as the nature and extent or the convenient despatch of business might require. All suits, however, should be instituted in the Supreme Court, and not in any particular Chamber or Division of it, and each Chamber or Division should possess all the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court with respect to the subject-matter of the suit, and with respect to every defence which may be made thereto, whether on legal or equitable grounds, and should be enabled to grant such relief or to apply such remedies . . . as all the present Courts combined have now jurisdiction to administer. We consider it expedient, with a view to facilitate the transition from the old to the new system, and to make the proposed change at first as little inconvenient as possible, that the Courts of Chancery, Queen’s Bench, &c., should for the present retain their distinctive titles, and should constitute so many Chambers or Divisions of the Supreme Court.”

The Commissioners also recommended for the same reason that a classification of the business should, in the first instance, be made on the principle of assigning as nearly as practicable to those various Chambers such suits as would now be commenced in the respective Courts as at present constituted, with power to the Supreme Court to vary this classification as from time to time might be deemed expedient. An objection had been made to the Bill by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), who thought that the equitable jurisdiction conferred upon the new Supreme Court could not be efficiently exercised by the Common Law Judges, who would form an overwhelming majority of the Supreme Court, and he contended that it would be necessary to add new Judges so as to provide at least one Equity lawyer for each Division or Chamber of the Supreme Court. He could not concur in this view; but, on the contrary, thought that the number of the Judges was already larger than was necessary or desirable, and that with a better distribution of the business a fewer number could dispose of the whole work. As a Common lawyer himself, he would say if there was anything in the objection, which he did not believe there was, let it be met by filling the next few vacancies from the Equity Bar. There was a popular notion that there was something essentially and radically different between the doctrines of Law and Equity, and that those who were trained in the learning and practice of the Common Law would not be competent to deal with the sublime principles which regulated the decisions of the Court of Chancery. This was a gross fallacy, and one which could mislead those only who were ignorant of our Common Law and of our Constitutional history. The great leading principles both of Law and of Equity were the same; the law which governed the construction of contracts and wills, the interpretation of statutes, and the definition of duties between man and man, was the same in both—the law of evidence was the same in both—in short, there was no radical or fundamental distinction between the two great branches of jurisprudence known as Law and Equity. The distinction was mainly in the manner and kind of remedy which the different Courts had the power to apply, and which of necessity drew to each Court the class of case to which that remedy was most suitable. He felt confident that any man of intelligence and common sense and trained legal intellect would be equally competent to deal with any branch of jurisprudence, and, if he possessed the judicial faculty, would make a good Judge, otherwise he would not,

whatever amount of technical knowledge and dexterity he might have acquired in some particular branch of jurisprudence. Experience had proved that this was so, as in the familiar cases of Lord Kenyon and Lord Cranworth, Lord Lyndhurst, Sir William Grant, Sir Cresswell Cresswell, and Lord Penzance. The creation of the new Appellate Court was of the very essence of the Bill; without it the Bill must fail. He did not say that the decisions of the House of Lords had failed to give satisfaction, but the practical defect in the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal was the great delay, the enormous cost, and the uncertainty of its sittings, and the limitation of its sittings to the Session of Parliament. Now, the success of the new scheme was absolutely dependent upon having a speedy and economical appeal to a tribunal constantly at hand and continuously sitting. This Bill provided an Appellate Court of 14 Judges at the least, of the highest judicial experience and ability, who could sit in Divisions of not less than three Judges with power to have any appeal re-heard before the entire body if thought desirable. The inconvenient and unmanageable process of appealing by Bill of Exceptions or Special Case was abolished, and all appeals before this Court were to be by way of re-hearing and upon notice of motion, the importance of which in simplicity, expedition, and completeness would be understood by every man having practical acquaintance with the subject. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Matthews), having begun by approving of the Bill, and stating his intention to support the second reading, proceeded to attack the Bill in detail, and in a speech of great spirit and ability, which naturally produced a great effect upon the House, to demonstrate the uselessness or mischievous character of every important provision in the Bill. As he listened to the speech he scarcely knew whether he heard it with greater regret or astonishment. The learned Gentleman had raised a momentary laugh against his hon. and learned Friends the Attorney General and Solicitor General, whom he accused of not having sufficiently studied the Bill. But there was one fatal defect in the learned Gentleman's speech—namely, that there was not one of the telling arguments which he had addressed to the House which was founded on fact. The most charitable view he could take of his speech was, that he had never read the Bill himself. He would give one example of his inaccuracy. He had said that—

“The proposed system of official referees he looked upon with the greatest dread and dislike. That system came in effect to this—that they were creating a subordinate order of Judges. . . . who were to be judges of both law and fact, and from whom there would be no appeal, and over whom the Courts would have no manner of control.”—[3 Hansard, cxxvi. 679.]

It was impossible for any man who had read the Bill to have made that statement. Clauses 53, 45, and 55 made the referees officers of the Court, gave the Court complete control over them, and enacted that the Court might adopt their reports in whole or in part, or might set them aside or remit them back for further consideration; thus giving the Court, in fact, the most absolute and complete control over the referees. What, therefore, became of the hon. Gentleman's statements? The truth was, that next to the creation of the new Appeal Court, the institution of the trial by referees was the most valuable part of the Bill—a vast number of causes were unfit for any other mode of trial, and at present the parties were in such cases always ultimately driven to references after an enormous waste of time and money. Under this Bill the Courts had power, in the first instance, to determine the proper and suitable mode of trial. He ventured to express his opinion that the Bill was an admirable one, and fully carried out the recommendations of the Royal Commission; and he sincerely trusted that the House would not listen to the suggestions of sending it to a Select Committee, but would proceed without any unnecessary delay to pass into law one of the greatest measures that had ever been presented to Parliament, and, in spite of prejudice and in opposition to interest, would at last remove from our jurisprudence that which had too long been its reproach and disgrace, and would give us a grand and uniform system worthy of a great and civilized nation.

Dr. BALL said, the House had been engaged for two evenings in discussing not only the second reading and the provisions of the Bill, but also three propositions—two of which had been actually brought forward, and a third, which it was intended to bring forward after the question as to the second reading had been determined. There was, he apprehended, a concurrence of opinion on both sides of the House that the second reading of the Bill should be agreed to, and that it should afterwards receive the careful and attentive consideration of the House, with a view to any alterations which might appear to be real improvements. As to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley), he would suggest that it should not be pressed to a division, because on the second reading of the Bill it did not come before the House with that weight to which it might otherwise be entitled. It appeared to be antagonistic to the Bill—partly by reason of its inconsistency with the Bill, and partly because it interposed a question of, at least, as great magnitude as the whole Bill. If a division were to be taken at all on this point, it ought to be taken, not on the second reading, but on the clause which effected the alteration complained of in the Resolution. And here he must point out, as an additional reason for not pressing this Resolution at the present time, that the question of the Supreme Appeal to the House of Peers was wholly independent of every part of the Bill except one clause and a few words at the end of another. If, therefore, with the exception of that clause and part of a clause, the Bill became law, the Appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords might remain in perfect consistency and harmony with it. As to the second Amendment to the Bill—that of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan)—he hoped that that would not be pressed either, because it was entirely inconsistent with the whole principle, scope, intention, purport, and declaration of the Bill, for it proposed to proclaim that the man who practised in Equity, and the man who practised in Common Law, were separated by a line of demarcation which it was impossible to pass. The third Amendment, however—that for referring the Bill to a Select Committee—appeared to him to be well deserving of grave consideration. But it would, perhaps, be more convenient to show first in what respect the proposition would be useful, and in what respect it would be mischievous. No doubt the best course would be that which to some
